which I am an ambassador in chains; that in it I may speak boldly, as I ought to speak.

But that ye also may know my affairs, how I do, Tychicus, the beloved brother 21 and faithful minister in the Lord, shall make known to you all things: whom I have sent unto you for this very purpose, that ye may know our state, and that he may comfort your hearts.

Peace be to the brethren, and love with faith, from God the Father and 23 the Lord Jesus Christ. Grace be with all them that love our Lord Jesus Christ in uncorruptness.

THE EPISTLE TO THE COLOSSIANS

Paul, an Apostle of Christ Jesus through the will of God: and Timothy 1 our Brother: To the saints and faithful brethren in Christ which are at Colossæ: Grace to you and peace from God our Father.

We give thanks to God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, praying always 3 for you, having heard of your faith in Christ Jesus, and of the love which ye have toward all the saints, because of the hope which is laid up for you in the heavens, whereof ye heard before in the word of the truth of the gospel, which is come unto you; even as it is also in all the world bearing fruit and increasing, as it doth in you also, since the day ye heard and knew the grace of God in truth; even as ye learned of Epaphras our beloved fellow-servant, who is a faithful minister of Christ on our behalf, who also declared unto us your love in the Spirit. For this cause we also, 9 since the day we heard it, do not cease to pray and make request for you, that ye may be filled with the knowledge of his will in all spiritual wisdom and understand-10 ing, to walk worthily of the Lord unto all pleasing, bearing fruit in every good work, and increasing in the knowledge of God; strengthened with all power, according to the might of his glory, unto all patience and longsuffering with joy; giving thanks unto the Father, who made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light; who delivered us out of the power of darkness, and translated us into the 14 kingdom of the Son of his love; in whom we have our redemption, the forgiveness of our sins: who is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of all creation; for in him were all things created, in the heavens and upon the earth, things visible and things invisible, whether thrones or dominions or principalities or powers; all things have been created through him, and unto him; and he is before all things, and in 18 him all things consist. And he is the head of the body, the church: who is the beginning, the firstborn from the dead; that in all things he might have the preeminence.

For it was the good pleasure of the Father that in him should all the fulness dwell; and through him to reconcile all things unto himself, having made peace through the blood of his cross; through him, I say, whether things upon the earth, or things 21 in the heavens. And you, being in time past alienated and enemies in your mind in your evil works, yet now hath he reconciled in the body of his flesh through death, to present you holy and without blemish and unreproveable before him: if so be that ye continue in the faith, grounded and stedfast, and not moved away from the hope of the gospel which ye heard, which was preached in all creation under heaven; whereof I Paul was made a minister.

24 Now I rejoice in my sufferings for your sake, and fill up on my part that which is lacking of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh for his body's sake, which is the church; whereof I was made a minister, according to the dispensation of God which was given me to you-ward, to fulfil the word of God, even the mystery which hath been hid 27 from all ages and generations: but now hath it been manifested to his saints, to whom God was pleased to make known what is the riches of the glory of this mystery among the Gentiles, which is Christ in you, the hope of glory: whom we proclaim, admonishing every man and teaching every man in all wisdom, that we may present every man perfect in Christ; whereunto I labour also, striving according to his working, 2 which worketh in me mightily. For I would have you know how greatly I strive for you, and for them at Laodicea, and for as many as have not seen my face in the flesh; that their hearts may be comforted, they being knit together in love, and unto all riches of the full assurance of understanding, that they may know the mystery of God, even Christ, in whom are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge hidden.
4 This I say, that no one may delude you with persuasiveness of speech. For though I am absent in the flesh, yet am I with you in the spirit, joying and beholding your order, and the stedfastness of your faith in Christ. As therefore ye received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk in him, rooted and builded up in him, and stablished in your faith, even as ye were taught, abounding in thanksgiving.

8 Take heed lest there shall be any one that maketh spoil of you through his philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ: for in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily, and in him ye are made full, who is the head of all principality and power: in whom ye were also circumcised with a circumcision not made with hands, in the putting off 12 of the body of the flesh, in the circumcision of Christ; having been buried with him in baptism, wherein ye were also raised with him through faith in the working of God, who raised him from the dead. And you, being dead through your trespasses and the uncircumcision of your flesh, you, I say, did he quicken together with him, hav-14 ing forgiven us all our trespasses; having blotted out the bond written in ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us: and he hath taken it out of the way, nailing it to the cross; having put off from himself the principalities and the powers, he made a show of them openly, triumphing over them in it. Let no man therefore 16 judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of a feast day or a new moon or a sabbath day: which are a shadow of the things to come; but the body is Christ's. Let no man rob you of your prize by a voluntary humility and worshipping of the angels, dwelling in the things which he hath seen, vainly puffed up by his fleshly mind, and not holding fast the Head, from whom all the body, being supplied and knit together through the joints and bands, increaseth with the increase of God.

If ye died with Christ from the rudiments of the world, why, as though living in 20
the world, do ye subject yourselves to ordinances — Handle not, nor taste, nor touch (all which things are to perish with the using) — after the precepts and doctrines of men? Which things have indeed a show of wisdom in will-worship, and humility, and severity to the body; but are not of any value against the indulgence of the flesh. If then ye were raised together with Christ, seek the things that are above, where 3 Christ is, seated on the right hand of God. Set your mind on the things that are above, not on the things that are upon the earth. For ye died, and your life is hid with Christ in God: when Christ, who is our life, shall be manifested, then shall ye also with him be manifested in glory. Mortify therefore your members which are upon 5 the earth; fornication, uncleanness, passion, evil desire, and covetousness, the which is idolatry; for which things' sake cometh the wrath of God upon the sons of disobedience; in the which ye also walked aforetime, when ye lived in these things. But now put ye also away all these; anger, wrath, malice, railing, shameful speak- 8
ing out of your mouth: lie not one to another; seeing that ye have put off the old man with his doings, and have put on the new man, which is being renewed unto knowledge after the image of him that created him: where there cannot be Greek and Jew, circumcision and uncircumcision, barbarian, Scythian, bondman, freeman: but Christ is all, and in all. Put on therefore, as God's elect, holy and beloved, 12 a heart of compassion, kindness, humility, meekness, longsuffering; forbearing one another, and forgiving each other, if any man have a complaint against any; even as the Lord forgave you, so also do ye: and above all these things put on love, which is the bond of perfectness. And let the peace of Christ rule in your hearts, to the 15 which also ye were called in one body; and be ye thankful. Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom; teaching and admonishing one another with psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing with grace in your hearts unto God. And whatsoever ye do, in word or in deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God the Father through him.

Wives, be in subjection to your husbands, as is fitting in the Lord. Husbands, 18 love your wives, and be not bitter against them. Children, obey your parents in all things, for this is well-pleasing in the Lord. Fathers, provoke not your children, that they be not discouraged. Servants, obey in all things them that are your masters according to the flesh; not with eyeservice, as men-pleasers, but in singleness of heart, fearing the Lord: whatsoever ye do, work heartily, as unto the Lord, and 23 not unto men; knowing that from the Lord ye shall receive the recompense of the inheritance: ye serve the Lord Christ. For he that doeth wrong shall receive again for the wrong that he hath done: and there is no respect of persons. Masters, render 4 unto your servants that which is just and equal; knowing that ye also have a Master in heaven.

Continue stedfastly in prayer, watching therein with thanksgiving; withal pray- 2
ing for us also, that God may open unto us a door for the word, to speak the mystery of Christ, for which I am also in bonds; that I may make it manifest, as I ought to speak. Walk in wisdom toward them that are without, redeeming the time. Let your speech be always with grace, seasoned with salt, that ye may know how ye ought to answer each one.

7 All my affairs shall Tychicus make known unto you, the beloved brother and faithful minister and fellow-servant in the Lord: whom I have sent unto you for this very purpose, that ye may know our estate, and that he may comfort your hearts; together with Onesimus, the faithful and beloved brother, who is one of you. They shall make known unto you all things that are done here.

10 Aristarchus my fellow-prisoner saluteth you, and Mark, the cousin of Barnabas (touching whom ye received commandments; if he come unto you, receive him), and Jesus, which is called Justus, who are of the circumcision: these only are my fellow-workers unto the kingdom of God, men that have been a comfort unto me.

12 Epaphras, who is one of you, a servant of Christ Jesus, saluteth you, always striving for you in his prayers, that ye may stand perfect and fully assured in all the will of God. For I bear him witness, that he hath much labour for you, and for them in Laodicea, and for them in Hierapolis. Luke, the beloved physician, and Demas

15 salute you. Salute the brethren that are in Laodicea, and Nymphas, and the church that is in their house. And when this epistle hath been read among you, cause that it be read also in the church of the Laodiceans; and that ye also read the epistle from Laodicea. And say to Archippus, Take heed to the ministry which thou hast received in the Lord, that thou fulfil it.

18 The salutation of me Paul with mine own hand. Remember my bonds. Grace be with you.

THE EPISTLE TO PHILEMON

1 Paul, a prisoner of Christ Jesus: and Timothy our brother: To Philemon our beloved and fellow-worker, and to Apphia our sister, and to Archippus our fellow-soldier, and to the church in thy house: Grace to you and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.

4 I thank my God always, making mention of thee in my prayers, hearing of thy love, and of the faith which thou hast toward the Lord Jesus, and toward all the saints; that the fellowship of thy faith may become effectual, in the knowledge of every good thing which is in you, unto Christ. For I had much joy and comfort in thy love, because the hearts of the saints have been refreshed through thee, brother.

8 Wherefore, though I have all boldness in Christ to enjoin thee that which is befitting, yet for love's sake I rather beseech, being such a one as Paul the aged, and now a prisoner also of Christ Jesus: I beseech thee for my child, whom I have begotten in my bonds, Onesimus, who was aforetime unprofitable to thee, but now is profitable to thee and to me: whom I have sent back to thee in his own person, that is, my very

13 heart: whom I would fain have kept with me, that in thy behalf he might minister unto me in the bonds of the gospel: but without thy mind I would do nothing; that thy goodness should not be as of necessity, but of free will. For perhaps he was therefore parted from thee for a season, that thou shouldest have him for ever; no longer as a servant, but more than a servant, a brother beloved, specially to me, but

17 how much rather to thee, both in the flesh and in the Lord. If then thou countest me a partner, receive him as myself. But if he hath wronged thee at all, or oweth thee aught, put that to mine account; I Paul write it with mine own hand, I will repay it: that I say not unto thee how that thou owest to me even thine own self besides. Yea,

21 brother, let me have joy of thee in the Lord: refresh my heart in Christ. Having confidence in thine obedience I write unto thee, knowing that thou wilt do even beyond what I say. But withal prepare me also a lodging: for I hope that through your prayers I shall be granted unto you.

Epaphras, my fellow-prisoner in Christ Jesus, saluteth thee; and so do Mark, 23 Aristarchus, Demas, Luke, my fellow-workers. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit. Amen.

THE EPISTLE TO THE PHILIPPIANS

Paul and Timothy, Servants of Christ Jesus: To all the Saints in Christ 1
Jesus which are at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons: Grace to you and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.

I thank my God upon all my remembrance of you, always in every supplication 3 of mine on behalf of you all making my supplication with joy, for your fellowship in furtherance of the gospel from the first day until now; being confident of this very thing, that he which began a good work in you will perfect it until the day of Jesus Christ: even as it is right for me to be thus minded on behalf of you all, because I 7 have you in my heart, inasmuch as, both in my bonds and in the defence and confirmation of the gospel, ye all are partakers with me of grace. For God is my witness, how I long after you all in the tender mercies of Christ Jesus. And this I pray, that your love may abound yet more and more in knowledge and all discernment; so 10 that ye may approve the things that are excellent; that ye may be sincere and void of offence unto the day of Christ; being filled with the fruits of righteousness, which are through Jesus Christ, unto the glory and praise of God.

Now I would have you know, brethren, that the things which happened unto me 12 have fallen out rather unto the progress of the gospel; so that my bonds became manifest in Christ throughout the whole prætorian guard, and to all the rest; and that most of the brethren in the Lord, being confident through my bonds, are more abundantly bold to speak the word of God without fear. Some indeed preach Christ even 15 of envy and strife; and some also of good will: the one do it of love, knowing that I am set for the defence of the gospel: but the other proclaim Christ of faction, not sincerely, thinking to raise up affliction for me in my bonds. What then? only that in every way, whether in pretence or in truth, Christ is proclaimed; and therein I rejoice, yea, and will rejoice. For I know that this shall turn to my salvation, through 19 your supplication and the supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ, according to my earnest expectation and hope, that in nothing shall I be put to shame, but that with all boldness, as always, so now also Christ shall be magnified in my body, whether by life, or by death. For to me to live is Christ, and to die is gain. But if to live in the flesh, — if this is the fruit of my work, then what I shall choose I wot not. But I am 23 in a strait betwixt the two, having the desire to depart and be with Christ; for it is very far better: yet to abide in the flesh is more needful for your sake. And having this confidence, I know that I shall abide, yea, and abide with you all, for your progress and joy in the faith; that your glorying may abound in Christ Jesus in me through my presence with you again.

Only let your manner of life be worthy of the gospel of Christ: that, whether I 27 come and see you or be absent, I may hear of your state, that ye stand fast in one spirit, with one soul striving for the faith of the gospel; and in nothing affrighted by the adversaries: which is for them an evident token of perdition, but of your salvation, and that from God; because to you it hath been granted in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on him, but also to suffer in his behalf: having the same conflict which ye saw in me, and now hear to be in me. If there is therefore any comfort in 2 Christ, if any consolation of love, if any fellowship of the Spirit, if any tender mercies and compassions, fulfil ye my joy, that ye be of the same mind, having the same love, being of one accord, of one mind; doing nothing through faction or through vainglory, but in lowliness of mind each counting other better than himself; not looking 5 each of you to his own things, but each of you also to the things of others. Have this mind in you, which was also in Christ Jesus: who, being in the form of God, counted it not a prize to be on an equality with God, but emptied himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men; and being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, becoming obedient even unto death, yea, the death of 9 the cross. Wherefore also God highly exalted him, and gave unto him the name which is above every name; that in the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven and things on earth and things under the earth, and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father. So then, my beloved, even as ye have always obeyed, not as in my presence only, but now much 13 more in my absence, work out your own salvation with fear and trembling; for it is God which worketh in you both to will and to work, for his good pleasure. Do all things without murmurings and disputings; that ye may be blameless and harmless, children of God without blemish in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation, 16 among whom ye are seen as lights in the world, holding forth the word of life; that I may have whereof to glory in the day of Christ, that I did not run in vain neither labour in vain. Yea, and if I am offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith, I joy, and rejoice with you all: and in the same manner do ye also joy, and rejoice with me.

19 But I hope in the Lord Jesus to send Timothy shortly unto you, that I also may be of good comfort, when I know your state. For I have no man likeminded, who will care truly for your state. For they all seek their own, not the things of Jesus Christ. But ye know the proof of him, that, as a child serveth a father, so he served 23 with me in furtherance of the gospel. Him therefore I hope to send forthwith, so soon as I shall see how it will go with me: but I trust in the Lord that I myself also shall come shortly. But I counted it necessary to send to you Epaphroditus, my brother and fellow-worker and fellow-soldier, and your messenger and minister to my need; since he longed after you all, and was sore troubled, because ye had heard that he was sick: for indeed he was sick nigh unto death: but God had mercy on him; 28 and not on him only, but on me also, that I might not have sorrow upon sorrow. I have sent him therefore the more diligently, that, when ye see him again, ye may rejoice, and that I may be the less sorrowful. Receive him therefore in the Lord with all joy; and hold such in honour: because for the work of Christ he came nigh unto death, hazarding his life to supply that which was lacking in your service toward me.

3 Finally, my brethren, rejoice in the Lord. —

To write the same things to you, to me indeed is not irksome, but for you it is safe.
Beware of the dogs, beware of the evil workers, beware of the concision: for we are the circumcision, who worship by the Spirit of God, and glory in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh: though I myself might have confidence even in the flesh: if any other man thinketh to have confidence in the flesh, I yet more:
5 circumcised the eighth day, of the stock of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin, a Hebrew of Hebrews; as touching the law, a Pharisee; as touching zeal, persecuting the church; as touching the righteousness which is in the law, found blameless. Howbeit what things were gain to me, these have I counted loss for Christ. Yea verily, and I count all things to be loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord: for whom I suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but dung, 9 that I may gain Christ, and be found in him, not having a righteousness of mine own, even that which is of the law, but that which is through faith in Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith: that I may know him, and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, becoming conformed unto his death; if 12 by any means I may attain unto the resurrection from the dead. Not that I have already obtained, or am already made perfect: but I press on, if so be that I may apprehend that for which also I was apprehended by Christ Jesus. Brethren, I 13 count not myself yet to have apprehended: but one thing I do, forgetting the things which are behind, and stretching forward to the things which are before, I press on toward the goal unto the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. Let us therefore, as many as be perfect, be thus minded: and if in anything ye are otherwise minded, even this shall God reveal unto you: only, whereunto we have already 16 attained, by that same rule let us walk. Brethren, be ye imitators together of me, and mark them which so walk even as ye have us for an ensample. For many walk, of whom I told you often, and now tell you even weeping, that they are the enemies of the cross of Christ: whose end is perdition, whose god is the belly, and whose glory is in their shame, who mind earthly things. For our citizenship is in heaven; from 20 whence also we wait for a Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ: who shall fashion anew the body of our humiliation, that it may be conformed to the body of his glory, according to the working whereby he is able even to subject all things unto himself.

Wherefore, my brethren beloved and longed for, my joy and crown, so stand fast 4 in the Lord, my beloved.

I exhort Euodia, and I exhort Syntyche, to be of the same mind in the Lord.
Yea, I beseech thee also, true yokefellow, help these women, for they laboured with me in the gospel, with Clement also, and the rest of my fellow-workers, whose names are in the book of life.

Rejoice in the Lord alway: again I will say, Rejoice. Let your forbearance be 4 known unto all men. The Lord is at hand. In nothing be anxious; but in everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known unto God. And the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall guard your hearts and your thoughts in Christ Jesus. Finally, brethren, whatsoever 8 things are true, whatsoever things are honourable, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things.
The things which ye both learned and received and heard and saw in me, these things do: and the God of peace shall be with you.

But I rejoice in the Lord greatly, that now at length ye have revived your thought 10 for me; wherein ye did indeed take thought, but ye lacked opportunity. Not that I speak in respect of want: for I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therein to be content. I know how to be abased, and I know also how to abound: in everything and in all things have I learned the secret both to be filled and to be hungry, both to abound and to be in want. I can do all things in him that strengtheneth me. 13 Howbeit ye did well, that ye had fellowship with my affliction. And ye yourselves also know, ye Philippians, that in the beginning of the gospel, when I departed from Macedonia, no church had fellowship with me in the matter of giving and receiving, but ye only; for even in Thessalonica ye sent once and again unto my need. Not that I seek for the gift; but I seek for the fruit that increaseth to your account. But 18
I have all things, and abound: I am filled, having received from Epaphroditus the things that came from you, an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God. And my God shall fulfil every need of yours according to his riches in glory in Christ Jesus. Now unto our God and Father be the glory for ever and ever. Amen.

Salute every saint in Christ Jesus. The brethren which are with me salute you. 21
All the saints salute you, especially they that are of Cæsar's household. The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit.

LAST EPISTLES OF ST. PAUL

THE FIRST EPISTLE TO TIMOTHY

1 Paul, an Apostle of Christ Jesus according to the commandment of God our Saviour, and Christ Jesus our hope: Unto Timothy, my true child in faith: Grace, mercy, peace, from God the Father and Christ Jesus our Lord.

3 As I exhorted thee to tarry at Ephesus, when I was going into Macedonia, that thou mightest charge certain men not to teach a different doctrine, neither to give heed to fables and endless genealogies, the which minister questionings, rather than a dispensation of God which is in faith; so do I now. But the end of the charge 6 is love out of a pure heart and a good conscience and faith unfeigned: from which things some having swerved have turned aside unto vain talking; desiring to be teachers of the law, though they understand neither what they say, nor whereof they confidently affirm. But we know that the law is good, if a man use it lawfully, 9 as knowing this, that law is not made for a righteous man, but for the lawless and unruly, for the ungodly and sinners, for the unholy and profane, for murderers of fathers and murderers of mothers, for manslayers, for fornicators, for abusers of themselves with men, for men-stealers, for liars, for false swearers, and if there be any other thing contrary to the sound doctrine; according to the gospel of the glory of the blessed God, which was committed to my trust.

12 I thank him that enabled me, even Christ Jesus our Lord, for that he counted me faithful, appointing me to his service; though I was before a blasphemer, and a persecutor, and injurious: howbeit I obtained mercy, because I did it ignorantly in unbelief; and the grace of our Lord abounded exceedingly with faith and love 15 which is in Christ Jesus. Faithful is the saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners; of whom I am chief: howbeit for this cause I obtained mercy, that in me as chief might Jesus Christ shew forth all his longsuffering, for an ensample of them which should hereafter believe on him unto eternal life. Now unto the King eternal, incorruptible, invisible, the only God, be honour and glory for ever and ever. Amen.

18 This charge I commit unto thee, my child Timothy, according to the prophecies which led the way to thee, that by them thou mayest war the good warfare; holding faith and a good conscience; which some having thrust from them made shipwreck concerning the faith: of whom is Hymenæus and Alexander; whom I delivered unto Satan, that they might be taught not to blaspheme.

2 I exhort therefore, first of all, that supplications, prayers, intercessions, thanksgivings, be made for all men; for kings and all that are in high place; that we may lead a tranquil and quiet life in all godliness and gravity. This is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour; who willeth that all men should be saved, 5 and come to the knowledge of the truth. For there is one God, one mediator also between God and men, himself man, Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all; the testimony to be borne in its own times; whereunto I was appointed a preacher and an apostle (I speak the truth, I lie not), a teacher of the Gentiles in faith and truth.

8 I desire therefore that the men pray in every place, lifting up holy hands, without wrath and disputing. In like manner, that women adorn themselves in modest apparel, with shamefastness and sobriety; not with braided hair, and gold or pearls or costly raiment; but (which becometh women professing godliness) through good 12 works. Let a woman learn in quietness with all subjection. But I permit not a woman to teach, nor to have dominion over a man, but to be in quietness. For 13 Adam was first formed, then Eve; and Adam was not beguiled, but the woman being beguiled hath fallen into transgression: but she shall be saved through the childbearing, if they continue in faith and love and sanctification with sobriety.

Faithful is the saying, If a man seeketh the office of a bishop, he desireth a good 3 work. The bishop therefore must be without reproach, the husband of one wife, temperate, soberminded, orderly, given to hospitality, apt to teach; no brawler, no striker; but gentle, not contentious, no lover of money; one that ruleth well his own house, having his children in subjection with all gravity; (but if a man knoweth not how to rule his own house, how shall he take care of the church of God?) not a novice, lest being puffed up he fall into the condemnation of the devil. More- 7 over he must have good testimony from them that are without; lest he fall into reproach and the snare of the devil. Deacons in like manner must be grave, not doubletongued, not given to much wine, not greedy of filthy lucre; holding the mystery of the faith in a pure conscience. And let these also first be proved; then let them serve as deacons, if they be blameless. Women in like manner must be grave, 11 not slanderers, temperate, faithful in all things. Let deacons be husbands of one wife, ruling their children and their own houses well. For they that have served well as deacons gain to themselves a good standing, and great boldness in the faith which is in Christ Jesus.

These things write I unto thee, hoping to come unto thee shortly; but if I tarry 14 long, that thou mayest know how men ought to behave themselves in the house of God, which is the church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth. And without controversy great is the mystery of godliness:

He who was manifested in the flesh,
Justified in the spirit,
Seen of angels,
Preached among the nations,
Believed on in the world,
Received up in glory.

But the Spirit saith expressly, that in later times some shall fall away from the faith, 4 giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils, through the hypocrisy of men that speak lies, branded in their own conscience as with a hot iron; forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, which God created to be received with thanksgiving by them that believe and know the truth. For every creature of God is good, and nothing is to be rejected, if it be received with thanksgiving: for it is sanctified through the word of God and prayer.

If thou put the brethren in mind of these things, thou shalt be a good minister 6 of Christ Jesus, nourished in the words of the faith, and of the good doctrine which thou hast followed until now: but refuse profane and old wives' fables. And exercise thyself unto godliness: for bodily exercise is profitable for a little; but godliness is profitable for all things, having promise of the life which now is, and of that which is to come. Faithful is the saying, and worthy of all acceptation. For to this end we labour and strive, because we have our hope set on the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, specially of them that believe.

These things command and teach. Let no man despise thy youth; but be thou 11 an ensample to them that believe, in word, in manner of life, in love, in faith, in purity. Till I come, give heed to reading, to exhortation, to teaching. Neglect not the gift that is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy, with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery. Be diligent in these things; give thyself wholly 15 to them; that thy progress may be manifest unto all. Take heed to thyself, and to thy teaching. Continue in these things; for in doing this thou shalt save both thyself and them that hear thee.

5 Rebuke not an elder, but exhort him as a father; the younger men as brethren: the elder women as mothers; the younger as sisters, in all purity.

3 Honour widows that are widows indeed. But if any widow hath children or grandchildren, let them learn first to shew piety towards their own family, and to requite their parents: for this is acceptable in the sight of God. Now she that is a widow indeed, and desolate, hath her hope set on God, and continueth in supplications and prayers night and day. But she that giveth herself to pleasure is dead 7 while she liveth. These things also command, that they may be without reproach. But if any provideth not for his own, and specially his own household, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an unbeliever. Let none be enrolled as a widow under threescore years old, having been the wife of one man, well reported of for good works; if she hath brought up children, if she hath used hospitality to strangers, if she hath washed the saints' feet, if she hath relieved the afflicted, if she hath dili- 11 gently followed every good work. But younger widows refuse: for when they have waxed wanton against Christ, they desire to marry; having condemnation, because they have rejected their first faith. And withal they learn also to be idle, going about from house to house; and not only idle, but tattlers also and busybodies, speaking 14 things which they ought not. I desire therefore that the younger widows marry, bear children, rule the household, give none occasion to the adversary for reviling: for already some are turned aside after Satan. If any woman that believeth hath widows, let her relieve them, and let not the church be burdened; that it may relieve them that are widows indeed.

17 Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honour, especially those who labour in the word and in teaching. For the scripture saith, Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn. And, The labourer is worthy of his hire. Against an elder receive not an accusation, except at the mouth of two or three witnesses.

20 Them that sin reprove in the sight of all, that the rest also may be in fear.

I charge thee in the sight of God, and Christ Jesus, and the elect angels, that thou observe these things without prejudice, doing nothing by partiality.

Lay hands hastily on no man, neither be partaker of other men's sins: keep thyself pure.

23 Be no longer a drinker of water, but use a little wine for thy stomach's sake and thine often infirmities.

Some men's sins are evident, going before unto judgement; and some men also they follow after. In like manner also there are good works that are evident; and such as are otherwise cannot be hid.

6 Let as many as are servants under the yoke count their own masters worthy of all honour, that the name of God and the doctrine be not blasphemed. And they that have believing masters, let them not despise them, because they are brethren; but let them serve them the rather, because they that partake of the benefit are believing and beloved.

3 These things teach and exhort. If any man teacheth a different doctrine, and consenteth not to sound words, even the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to the doctrine which is according to godliness; he is puffed up, knowing nothing, but doting about questionings and disputes of words, whereof cometh envy, strife, railings, evil surmisings, wranglings of men corrupted in mind and bereft of the truth, 6 supposing that godliness is a way of gain. But godliness with contentment is great gain: for we brought nothing into the world, for neither can we carry anything out; but having food and covering we shall be therewith content. But they that desire to be rich fall into a temptation and a snare and many foolish and hurtful lusts, such as drown men in destruction and perdition. For the love of money is a root 10 of all kinds of evil: which some reaching after have been led astray from the faith, and have pierced themselves through with many sorrows. But thou, O man of God, flee these things; and follow after righteousness, godliness, faith, love, patience, meekness. Fight the good fight of the faith, lay hold on the life eternal, whereunto 12 thou wast called, and didst confess the good confession in the sight of many witnesses. I charge thee in the sight of God, who quickeneth all things, and of Christ Jesus, who before Pontius Pilate witnessed the good confession; that thou keep the commandment, without spot, without reproach, until the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ: which in its own times he shall shew, who is the blessed and only Po- 15 tentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords; who only hath immortality, dwelling in light unapproachable; whom no man hath seen, nor can see: to whom be honour and power eternal. Amen.

Charge them that are rich in this present world, that they be not highminded, 17 nor have their hope set on the uncertainty of riches, but on God, who giveth us richly all things to enjoy; that they do good, that they be rich in good works, that they be ready to distribute, willing to communicate; laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold on the life which is life indeed.

O Timothy, guard that which is committed unto thee, turning away from the 20 profane babblings and oppositions of the knowledge which is falsely so called; which some professing have erred concerning the faith. Grace be with you.

THE EPISTLE TO TITUS

Paul, a Servant of God, and an Apostle of Jesus Christ, according to 1 the faith of God's elect, and the knowledge of the truth which is according to godliness, in hope of eternal life, which God, who cannot lie, promised before times eternal; but in his own seasons manifested his word in the message, wherewith I was intrusted according to the command of God our Saviour: To Titus, my true child after a common faith: Grace and peace from God the Father and Christ Jesus our Saviour.

For this cause left I thee in Crete, that thou shouldest set in order the things that 5 were wanting, and appoint elders in every city, as I gave thee charge; if any man is blameless, the husband of one wife, having children that believe, who are not accused of riot or unruly. For the bishop must be blameless, as God's steward; not selfwilled, not soon angry, no brawler, no striker, not greedy of filthy lucre; but given to hospitality, a lover of good, soberminded, just, holy, temperate; holding to the 9 faithful word which is according to the teaching, that he may be able both to exhort in the sound doctrine, and to convict the gainsayers. For there are many unruly men, vain talkers and deceivers, specially they of the circumcision, whose mouths must be stopped; men who overthrow whole houses, teaching things which they ought not, for filthy lucre's sake. One of themselves, a prophet of their own, said, 12

Cretans are always liars, evil beasts, idle gluttons.

This testimony is true. For which cause reprove them sharply, that they may be sound in the faith, not giving heed to Jewish fables, and commandments of men who turn away from the truth. To the pure all things are pure: but to them that 15 are defiled and unbelieving nothing is pure; but both their mind and their conscience are defiled. They profess that they know God; but by their works they deny him, being abominable, and disobedient, and unto every good work reprobate.

2 But speak thou the things which befit the sound doctrine: that aged men be temperate, grave, soberminded, sound in faith, in love, in patience: that aged women likewise be reverent in demeanour, not slanderers nor enslaved to much wine, teachers of that which is good; that they may train the young women to love 5 their husbands, to love their children, to be soberminded, chaste, workers at home, kind, being in subjection to their own husbands, that the word of God be not blas-phemed: the younger men likewise exhort to be soberminded: in all things shewing thyself an ensample of good works; in thy doctrine shewing uncorruptness, gravity, sound speech, that cannot be condemned; that he that is of the contrary part may 9 be ashamed, having no evil thing to say of us. Exhort servants to be in subjection to their own masters, and to be well-pleasing to them in all things; not gainsaying; not purloining, but shewing all good fidelity; that they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things. For the grace of God hath appeared, bringing salvation to all men, instructing us, to the intent that, denying ungodliness and worldly 13 lusts, we should live soberly and righteously and godly in this present world; looking for the blessed hope and appearing of the glory of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ; who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a people for his own possession, zealous of good works. These things speak and exhort and reprove with all authority. Let no man despise thee.
3 Put them in mind to be in subjection to rulers, to authorities, to be obedient, to be ready unto every good work, to speak evil of no man, not to be contentious, to be gentle, shewing all meekness toward all men. For we also were aforetime foolish, disobedient, deceived, serving divers lusts and pleasures, living in malice and envy, 4 hateful, hating one another. But when the kindness of God our Saviour, and his love toward man, appeared, not by works done in righteousness, which we did ourselves, but according to his mercy he saved us, through the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost, which he poured out upon us richly, through Jesus Christ our Saviour; that, being justified by his grace, we might be made heirs 8 according to the hope of eternal life. Faithful is the saying, and concerning these things I will that thou affirm confidently, to the end that they which have believed God may be careful to maintain good works. These things are good and profitable unto men: but shun foolish questionings, and genealogies, and strifes, and fightings about the law; for they are unprofitable and vain. A man that is heretical after a first and second admonition refuse; knowing that such a one is perverted, and sinneth, being self-condemned.
12 When I shall send Artemas unto thee, or Tychicus, give diligence to come unto me to Nicopolis: for there I have determined to winter. Set forward Zenas the lawyer and Apollos on their journey diligently, that nothing be wanting unto them.
And let our people also learn to maintain good works for necessary uses, that they be not unfruitful.
15 All that are with me salute thee. Salute them that love us in faith. Grace be with you all.

THE SECOND EPISTLE TO TIMOTHY

1 Paul, an Apostle of Christ Jesus by the will of God, according to the promise of the life which is in Christ Jesus: To Timothy, my beloved child: Grace, mercy, peace, from God the Father and Christ Jesus our Lord.

3 I thank God, whom I serve from my forefathers in a pure conscience, how unceasing is my remembrance of thee in my supplications, night and day longing to see thee, remembering thy tears, that I may be filled with joy; having been reminded of the unfeigned faith that is in thee; which dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois, and thy mother Eunice; and, I am persuaded, in thee also. For the which cause 6

I put thee in remembrance that thou stir up the gift of God, which is in thee through the laying on of my hands. For God gave us not a spirit of fearfulness; but of power and love and discipline. Be not ashamed therefore of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me his prisoner: but suffer hardship with the gospel according to the power of God; who saved us, and called us with a holy calling, not according to our 9 works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before times eternal, but hath now been manifested by the appearing of our Saviour Christ Jesus, who abolished death, and brought life and incorruption to light through the gospel, whereunto I was appointed a preacher, and an apostle, and a teacher. For the which cause I suffer also these things: yet I am not ashamed; 12 for I know him whom I have believed, and I am persuaded that he is able to guard that which I have committed unto him against that day. Hold the pattern of sound words which thou hast heard from me, in faith and love which is in Christ Jesus.
That good thing which was committed unto thee guard through the Holy Ghost which dwelleth in us.

This thou knowest, that all that are in Asia turned away from me; of whom 15 are Phygelus and Hermogenes. The Lord grant mercy unto the house of Onesiphorus: for he oft refreshed me, and was not ashamed of my chain; but, when he was in Rome, he sought me diligently, and found me (the Lord grant unto him to find mercy of the Lord in that day); and in how many things he ministered at Ephesus, thou knowest very well.

Thou therefore, my child, be strengthened in the grace that is in Christ Jesus. 2
And the things which thou hast heard from me among many witnesses, the same commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also. Suffer hardship with me, as a good soldier of Christ Jesus. No soldier on service entangleth himself in the affairs of this life; that he may please him who enrolled him as a soldier. And if also a man contend in the games, he is not crowned, except he have 5 contended lawfully. The husbandman that laboureth must be the first to partake of the fruits. Consider what I say; for the Lord shall give thee understanding in all things.

Remember Jesus Christ, risen from the dead, of the seed of David, according to 8 my gospel: wherein I suffer hardship unto bonds, as a malefactor; but the word of God is not bound. Therefore I endure all things for the elect's sake, that they also may obtain the salvation which is in Christ Jesus with eternal glory. Faithful is 11 the saying:

For if we died with him,
We shall also live with him;
If we endure,
We shall also reign with him;
If we shall deny him,
He also will deny us;
If we are faithless,
He abideth faithful,
For he cannot deny himself.

Of these things put them in remembrance, charging them in the sight of the Lord, 14 that they strive not about words, to no profit, to the subverting of them that hear.
Give diligence to present thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, handling aright the word of truth. But shun profane babblings:
for they will proceed further in ungodliness, and their word will eat as doth a gan-

18 grene: of whom is Hymenæus and Philetus; men who concerning the truth have erred, saying that the resurrection is past already, and overthrow the faith of some.
Howbeit the firm foundation of God standeth, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his: and, Let every one that nameth the name of the Lord depart from 20 unrighteousness. Now in a great house there are not only vessels of gold and of silver, but also of wood and of earth; and some unto honour, and some unto dishonour. If a man therefore purge himself from these, he shall be a vessel unto honour, sanctified, meet for the master's use, prepared unto every good work. But flee youthful lusts, and follow after righteousness, faith, love, peace, with them that 23 call on the Lord out of a pure heart. But foolish and ignorant questionings refuse, knowing that they gender strifes. And the Lord's servant must not strive, but be gentle towards all, apt to teach, forbearing, in meekness correcting them that oppose themselves; if peradventure God may give them repentance unto the knowledge of the truth, and they may recover themselves out of the snare of the devil, having been taken captive by the Lord's servant unto the will of God.

3 But know this, that in the last days grievous times shall come. For men shall be lovers of self, lovers of money, boastful, haughty, railers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, implacable, slanderers, without self-control, fierce, no lovers of good, traitors, headstrong, puffed up, lovers of pleasure rather than lovers of God; holding a form of godliness, but having denied the 6 power thereof: from these also turn away. For of these are they that creep into houses, and take captive silly women laden with sins, led away by divers lusts, ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth. And like as Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses, so do these also withstand the truth; men corrupted in mind, reprobate concerning the faith. But they shall proceed no further: for 10 their folly shall be evident unto all men, as theirs also came to be. But thou didst follow my teaching, conduct, purpose, faith, longsuffering, love, patience, persecutions, sufferings; what things befell me at Antioch, at Iconium, at Lystra; what persecutions I endured: and out of them all the Lord delivered me. Yea, and all that would live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution. But evil men and 14 impostors shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived. But abide thou in the things which thou hast learned and hast been assured of, knowing of whom thou hast learned them; and that from a babe thou hast known the sacred writings which are able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus. Every scripture inspired of God is also profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for instruction which is in righteousness: that the man of God may be complete, furnished completely unto every good work.

4 I charge thee in the sight of God, and of Christ Jesus, who shall judge the quick and the dead, and by his appearing and his kingdom: preach the word; be instant in season, out of season; reprove, rebuke, exhort, with all longsuffering and teaching. For the time will come when they will not endure the sound doctrine; but, having itching ears, will heap to themselves teachers after their own lusts; and will turn away their ears from the truth, and turn aside unto fables. But be thou sober 6 in all things, suffer hardship, do the work of an evangelist, fulfil thy ministry. For I am already being offered, and the time of my departure is come. I have fought the good fight, I have finished the course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give to me at that day: and not only to me, but also to all them that have loved his appearing.

9 Do thy diligence to come shortly unto me: for Demas forsook me, having loved this present world, and went to Thessalonica; Crescens to Galatia, Titus to Dalmatia. Only Luke is with me. Take Mark, and bring him with thee: for he is useful to me for ministering. But Tychicus I sent to Ephesus. The cloke that I left at Troas with Carpus, bring when thou comest, and the books, especially the parchments. Alexander the coppersmith did me much evil: the Lord will render 14 to him according to his works: of whom be thou ware also; for he greatly withstood our words. At my first defence no one took my part, but all forsook me:

may it not be laid to their account. But the Lord stood by me, and strengthened me; that through me the message might be fully proclaimed, and that all the Gentiles might hear: and I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion. The Lord will 18 deliver me from every evil work, and will save me unto his heavenly kingdom: to whom be the glory for ever and ever. Amen.

Salute Prisca and Aquila, and the house of Onesiphorus. Erastus abode at Corinth: but Trophimus I left at Miletus sick. Do thy diligence to come before winter. 21 Eubulus saluteth thee, and Pudens, and Linus, and Claudia, and all the brethren.
The Lord be with thy spirit. Grace be with you.

Other New Testament Epistles

AN EPISTLE TO HEBREWS

I

God, having of old time spoken unto the fathers in the prophets by divers portions 1 and in divers manners, hath at the end of these days spoken unto us in a Son, whom he appointed heir of all things, through whom also he made the worlds; who, being the effulgence of his glory, and the very image of his substance, and upholding all things by the word of his power, when he had made purification of sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high; having become by so much better than the 4 angels, as he hath inherited a more excellent name than they.

For unto which of the angels said he at any time,

Thou art my Son,
This day have I begotten thee?

and again,

I will be to him a Father,
And he shall be to me a Son?

And when he again bringeth in the firstborn into the world he saith, And let all the 6 angels of God worship him. And of the angels he saith,

Who maketh his angels winds,
And his ministers a flame of fire:

but of the Son he saith, 8

Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever;
And the sceptre of uprightness is the sceptre of thy kingdom.
Thou hast loved righteousness, and hated iniquity;
Therefore God, thy God, hath anointed thee
With the oil of gladness above thy fellows.

10 And,

Thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth,
And the heavens are the works of thy hands:
They shall perish; but thou continuest:
And they all shall wax old as doth a garment;
And as a mantle shalt thou roll them up,
As a garment, and they shall be changed:
But thou art the same,
And thy years shall not fail.

13 But of which of the angels hath he said at any time,

Sit thou on my right hand,
Till I make thine enemies the footstool of thy feet?

Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to do service for the sake of them that shall inherit salvation?

2 Therefore we ought to give the more earnest heed to the things that were heard, lest haply we drift away. For if the word spoken through angels proved stedfast, and every transgression and disobedience received a just recompense of reward; how shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation? which having at the first been spoken through the Lord, was confirmed unto us by them that heard; God also bearing witness with them, both by signs and wonders, and by manifold powers, and by gifts of the Holy Ghost, according to his own will. For not unto angels did he subject the world
6 to come, whereof we speak. But one hath somewhere testified, saying,

What is man, that thou art mindful of him?
Or the son of man, that thou visitest him?
Thou madest him a little lower than the angels;
Thou crownedst him with glory and honour,
And didst set him over the works of thy hands:
Thou didst put all things in subjection under his feet.

For in that he subjected 'all things' unto him, he left nothing that is not subject to him.
9 But now we see not yet all things subjected to him. But we behold him who hath been made a little lower than the angels, even Jesus, because of the suffering of death crowned with glory and honour, that by the grace of God he should taste death for every man. For it became him, for whom are all things, and through whom are all things, in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the author of their salvation perfect 11 through sufferings. For both he that sanctifieth and they that are sanctified are all of one: for which cause he is not ashamed to call them brethren, saying,

I will declare thy name unto my brethren,
In the midst of the congregation will I sing thy praise.

And again, I will put my trust in him. And again, Behold, I and the children which 14 God hath given me. Since then the children are sharers in flesh and blood, he also himself in like manner partook of the same; that through death he might bring to nought him that had the power of death, that is, the devil; and might deliver all them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage. For verily not of angels doth he take hold, but he taketh hold of the seed of Abraham. Wherefore it behoved him in all things to be made like unto his brethren, that he might be a merciful and faithful HIGH PRIEST in things pertaining to God, to make propitiation for 18 the sins of the people. For in that he himself hath suffered being tempted, he is able to succour them that are tempted.

II

Wherefore, holy brethren, partakers of a heavenly calling, consider the Apostle 3 and High Priest of our confession, even Jesus; who was faithful to him that appointed him, as also was Moses 'in all His house.' For he hath been counted worthy of more glory than Moses, by so much as he that established the house hath more honour than the house. For every house is established by some one; but he that established all 4 things is God. And Moses indeed was 'faithful in all His house' as a servant, for a testimony of those things which were afterward to be spoken; but Christ as a son, over His house; whose house are we, if we hold fast our boldness and the glorying of our hope firm unto the end. Wherefore, even as the Holy Ghost saith, 7

To-day if ye shall hear his voice,
Harden not your hearts, as in the provocation,
Like as in the day of the temptation in the wilderness,
Where your fathers tempted me by proving me,
And saw my works forty years:

Wherefore 10

I was displeased with this generation,
And said, they do alway err in their heart:
But they did not know my ways;
As I sware in my wrath,
They shall not enter into my rest.

Take heed, brethren, lest haply there shall be in any one of you an evil heart of un- 12 belief, in falling away from the living God: but exhort one another day by day, so long as it is called To-day; lest any one of you be hardened by the deceitfulness of sin:
for we are become partakers of Christ, if we hold fast the beginning of our confidence firm unto the end, while it is said,

To-day if ye shall hear his voice,
Harden not your hearts, as in the provocation.

For who, when they heard, did provoke? nay, did not all they that came out of 16 Egypt by Moses? And with whom was he displeased forty years? was it not with them that sinned, whose carcases fell in the wilderness? And to whom sware he that they should not enter into his rest, but to them that were disobedient? And we see that they were not able to enter in because of unbelief. Let us fear therefore, lest 4 haply, a promise being left of entering into his rest, any one of you should seem to have come short of it. For indeed we have had good tidings preached unto us, even as also they: but the word of hearing did not profit them, because they were not united by faith with them that heard. For we which have believed do enter into that rest; 3 even as he hath said,

As I sware in my wrath,
They shall not enter into my rest:

although the works were finished from the foundation of the world. For he hath said 4 somewhere of the seventh day on this wise, And God rested on the seventh day from all his works; and in this place again,

They shall not enter into my rest.

Seeing therefore it remaineth that some should enter thereinto, and they to whom the 6 good tidings were before preached failed to enter in because of disobedience, he again defineth a certain day, saying in David, after so long a time, To-day, as it hath been before said,

To-day if ye shall hear his voice,
Harden not your hearts.

8 For if Joshua had given them rest, he would not have spoken afterward of another day.
There remaineth therefore a sabbath rest for the people of God. For he that is entered into his rest hath himself also rested from his works, as God did from his. Let us therefore give diligence to enter into that rest, that no man fall after the same 12 example of disobedience. For the word of God is living, and active, and sharper than any two-edged sword, and piercing even to the dividing of soul and spirit, of both joints and marrow, and quick to discern the thoughts and intents of the heart. And there is no creature that is not manifest in his sight: but all things are naked and laid open before the eyes of him with whom we have to do.

14 Having then a great high priest, who hath passed through the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast our confession. For we have not a high priest that cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but one that hath been in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin. Let us therefore draw near with boldness unto the throne of grace, that we may receive mercy, and may find grace to help us in time
5 of need. For every high priest, being taken from among men, is appointed for men in things pertaining to God, that he may offer both gifts and sacrifices for sins: who can bear gently with the ignorant and erring, for that he himself also is compassed with infirmity; and by reason thereof is bound, as for the people, so also for himself, to offer for sins. And no man taketh the honour unto himself, but when he is called of 5 God, even as was Aaron. So Christ also glorified not himself to be made a high priest, but he that spake unto him,

Thou art my Son,
This day have I begotten thee:

6 as he saith also in another place,

Thou art a priest for ever
After the order of Melchizedek.

7 Who in the days of his flesh, having offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears unto him that was able to save him out of death, and having been heard for his godly fear, though he was a Son, yet learned obedience by the things which he suffered; and having been made perfect, he became unto all them that obey him the author of eternal salvation; named of God A HIGH PRIEST AFTER THE ORDER OF MELCHIZEDEK.

11 Of which we have many things to say, and hard of interpretation, seeing ye are become dull of hearing. For when by reason of the time ye ought to be teachers, ye have need again that some one teach you the rudiments of the first principles of the oracles of God; and are become such as have need of milk, and not of solid food. For every one that partaketh of milk is without experience of the word of righteousness; for he is a babe. But solid food is for fullgrown men, even those who by reason of 6 use have their senses exercised to discern good and evil. Wherefore let us cease to speak of the first principles of Christ, and press on unto full growth; not laying again a foundation — of repentance from dead works, and of faith toward God, of the teaching of baptisms, and of laying on of hands, and of resurrection of the dead, and of 4 eternal judgement. And this will we do, if God permit. For as touching those who were once enlightened and tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and tasted the word of God that it is good, and the powers of the age to come, and then fell away, it is impossible to renew them again unto repentance; the while they crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame. For the land which hath drunk the rain that cometh oft upon it, and bringeth 7 forth herbs meet for them for whose sake it is also tilled, receiveth blessing from God:

but if it beareth thorns and thistles, it is rejected and nigh unto a curse; whose end is to be burned. But, beloved, we are persuaded better things of you, and things that accompany salvation, though we thus speak: for God is not unrighteous to forget your work and the love which ye shewed toward his name, in that ye ministered unto the saints, and still do minister. And we desire that each one of you may shew the same 11 diligence unto the fulness of hope even to the end: that ye be not sluggish, but imitators of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises. For when God made promise to Abraham, since he could swear by none greater, he sware by himself, saying, Surely blessing I will bless thee, and multiplying I will multiply thee. And thus, having patiently endured, he obtained the promise. For men swear by the greater: and in every dispute of theirs the oath is final for confirmation. Wherein 17 God, being minded to shew more abundantly unto the heirs of the promise the immutability of his counsel, interposed with an oath: that by two immutable things, in which it is impossible for God to lie, we may have a strong encouragement, who have fled for refuge to lay hold of the hope set before us; which we have as an anchor of the soul, a hope both sure and stedfast and entering into that which is within the veil; whither as a forerunner Jesus entered for us, having become a high priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek.

For this Melchizedek, king of Salem, priest of God Most High, who met Abraham 7 returning from the slaughter of the kings, and blessed him, to whom also Abraham divided a tenth part of all — being first, by interpretation, 'King of righteousness,' and then also 'King of Salem,' which is, 'King of peace'; without father, without mother, without genealogy, having neither beginning of days nor end of life, but made like unto the Son of God — ABIDETH A PRIEST CONTINUALLY. Now consider how great 4 this man was, unto whom Abraham, the patriarch, gave a tenth out of the chief spoils.
And they indeed of the sons of Levi that receive the priest's office have commandment to take tithes of the people according to the law, that is, of their brethren, though these have come out of the loins of Abraham: but he whose genealogy is not counted from them hath taken tithes of Abraham, and hath blessed him that hath the promises:
but without any dispute the less is blessed of the better. And here men that die 8 receive tithes; but there one, of whom it is witnessed that he liveth. And, so to say, through Abraham even Levi, who receiveth tithes, hath paid tithes; for he was yet in the loins of his father, when Melchizedek met him. Now if there was perfection through the Levitical priesthood (for under it hath the people received the law), what further need was there that another priest should arise after the order of Mel-chizedek, and not be reckoned after the order of Aaron? For the priesthood being 12 changed, there is made of necessity a change also of the law. For he of whom these things are said belongeth to another tribe, from which no man hath given attendance at the altar; for it is evident that our Lord hath sprung out of Judah, as to which tribe Moses spake nothing concerning priests. And what we say is yet more abundantly evident, if after the likeness of Melchizedek there ariseth another priest, who hath been made, not after the law of a carnal commandment, but after the power of an endless life:
for it is witnessed of him, 17

Thou art a priest for ever
After the order of Melchizedek.

For there is a disannulling of a foregoing commandment because of its weakness and unprofitableness (for the law made nothing perfect), and a bringing in thereupon of a better hope, through which we draw nigh unto God. And inasmuch as it is not with- 20 out the taking of an oath — for they indeed have been made priests without an oath;
but he with an oath by him that saith of him,

The Lord sware and will not repent himself,
Thou art a priest for ever —

22 by so much also hath Jesus become the surety of a better covenant. And they indeed have been made priests many in number, because that by death they are hindered from continuing: but he, because he abideth for ever, hath his priesthood unchangeable. Wherefore also he is able to save to the uttermost them that draw near unto God through him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them. For such a high priest became us, holy, guileless, undefiled, separated from sinners, and made 27 higher than the heavens; who needeth not daily, like those high priests, to offer up sacrifices, first for his own sins, and then for the sins of the people: for this he did once for all, when he offered up himself. For the law appointeth men high priests, having infirmity; but the word of the oath, which was after the law, appointeth a Son, perfected for evermore.

8 Now in the things which we are saying the chief point is this: We have such a high priest, who sat down on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens, a minister of the sanctuary, and of the TRUE TABERNACLE, which the Lord pitched, not man. For every high priest is appointed to offer both gifts and sacrifices: wherefore 4 it is necessary that this high priest also have somewhat to offer. Now if he were on earth, he would not be a priest at all, seeing there are those who offer the gifts according to the law; who serve that which is a copy and shadow of the heavenly things, even as Moses is warned of God when he is about to make the tabernacle: for, See, saith he, that thou make all things according to the pattern that was shewed thee in the 6 mount. But now hath he obtained a ministry the more excellent, by how much also he is the mediator of a better covenant, which hath been enacted upon better prom-9 ises.* Now even the first covenant had ordinances of divine service, and its sanctuary, a sanctuary of this world. For there was a tabernacle prepared, the first, wherein were the candlestick, and the table, and the shewbread; which is called the Holy place. And after the second veil, the tabernacle which is called the Holy of 4 holies; having a golden censer, and the ark of the covenant overlaid round about with gold, wherein is a golden pot holding the manna, and Aaron's rod that budded, and the tables of the covenant; and above it cherubim of glory overshadowing the mercy-seat; of which things we cannot now speak severally. Now these things having been thus prepared, the priests go in continually into the first tabernacle, accomplishing the services; but into the second the high priest alone, once in the year, not without 8 blood, which he offereth for himself, and for the errors of the people: the Holy Ghost this signifying, that the way into the holy place hath not yet been made manifest, while as the first tabernacle is yet standing. Which is a parable for the time now present: according to which are offered both gifts and sacrifices that cannot, as touching the conscience, make the worshipper perfect, being only (with meats and drinks 11 and divers washings) carnal ordinances, imposed until a time of reformation. But Christ having come a high priest of the good things to come, through the greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is to say, not of this creation, nor 7 * For if that first covenant had been faultless, then would no place have been sought for a second. For finding fault with them, he saith, Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah; not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day that I took them by the hond to lead them forth out of the land of Egypt; for they continued not in my covenant, and I regarded them not, saith the Lord. For this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, saith the Lord; I will put my laws into their mind, and on their heart also will I write them: and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people: and they shall not teach every man his fellow-citizen, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord: for all shall know me, from the least to the greatest of them. For I will be merciful to their iniquities, and their sins will I remember no more. In that he saith, A new covenant, he hath made the first old. But that which is becoming old and waxeth aged is nigh unto vanishing away.

yet through the blood of goats and calves, but through his own blood, entered in once for all into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption.

For if the blood of goats and bulls, and the ashes of a heifer sprinkling them that 13 have been defiled, sanctify unto the cleanness of the flesh: how much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without blemish unto God, cleanse your conscience from dead works to serve the living God? And for this cause he is the MEDIATOR OF A NEW COVENANT, that a death having taken place for the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first covenant, they that have been called may receive the promise of the eternal inheritance. For where a covenant 16 is, there must of necessity be the death of him that made it. For a covenant is of force where there hath been death: for doth it ever avail while he that made it liveth? Wherefore even the first covenant hath not been dedicated without blood. For when every commandment had been spoken by Moses unto all the people according to the law, he took the blood of the calves and the goats, with water and scarlet wool and hyssop, and sprinkled both the book itself, and all the people, saying, This is the blood 20 of the covenant which God commanded to you-ward. Moreover the tabernacle and all the vessels of the ministry he sprinkled in like manner with the blood. And according to the law, I may almost say, all things are cleansed with blood, and apart from shedding of blood there is no remission. It was necessary therefore that the copies of the things in the heavens should be cleansed with these; but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these. For Christ entered not into a 24 holy place made with hands, like in pattern to the true; but into heaven itself, now to appear before the face of God for us: nor yet that he should offer himself often; as the high priest entereth into the holy place year by year with blood not his own; else must he often have suffered since the foundation of the world: but now once at the end of the ages hath he been manifested to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself. And inasmuch as it is appointed unto men once to die, and after this cometh judgement; so Christ also, having been once offered 'to bear the sins of many,' shall appear a second time, apart from sin, to them that wait for him, unto salvation. For 10 the law having a shadow of the good things to come, not the very image of the things, they can never with the same sacrifices year by year, which they offer continually, make perfect them that draw nigh. Else would they not have ceased to be offered, because the worshippers, having been once cleansed, would have had no more conscience of sins? But in those sacrifices there is a remembrance made of sins year 3 by year. For it is impossible that the blood of bulls and goats should take away sins. Wherefore when he cometh into the world, he saith,

Sacrifice and offering thou wouldest not,
But a body didst thou prepare for me;
In whole burnt offerings and sacrifices for sin thou hadst no pleasure:
Then said I, Lo, I am come (In the roll of the book it is written of me)
To do thy will, O God.

Saying above, Sacrifices and offerings and whole burnt offerings and sacrifices for sin 8 thou wouldest not, neither hadst pleasure therein (the which are offered according to the law), then hath he said, Lo, I am come to do thy will. He taketh away the first, that he may establish the second. In which 'will' we have been sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all. And every priest indeed standeth 11 day by day ministering and offering oftentimes the same sacrifices, the which can never take away sins: but he, when he had offered one sacrifice for sins for ever, sat down on the right hand of God; from henceforth expecting till his enemies be made the footstool of his feet. For by one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are sancti- 14

15 fied. And the Holy Ghost also beareth witness to us: for after he hath said, This is the covenant that I will make with them after those days, saith the Lord; I will put my laws on their heart, and upon their mind also will I write them; then saith he, And their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more. Now where remission of these is, there is no more offering for sin.

III

19 Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holy place by the blood of Jesus, by the way which he dedicated for us, a new and living way, through the veil, that is to say, his flesh; and having a great priest over the house of God; let us draw near with a true heart in fulness of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from 23 an evil conscience, and our body washed with pure water: let us hold fast the confession of our hope that it waver not; for he is faithful that promised: and let us consider one another to provoke unto love and good works; not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as the custom of some is, but exhorting one another.
26 And so much the more, as ye see the day drawing nigh. For if we sin wilfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more a sacrifice for sins, but a certain fearful expectation of judgement, and a jealousy of fire which shall devour the adversaries. A man that hath set at nought Moses' law
29 dieth without compassion on the word of two or three witnesses: of how much sorer punishment, think ye, shall he be judged worthy, who hath trodden under foot the Son of God, and hath counted the blood of the covenant, wherewith he was sanctified, an unholy thing, and hath done despite unto the Spirit of grace? For we know him that said, Vengeance belongeth unto me, I will recompense. And again,
31 The Lord shall judge his people. It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God. But call to remembrance the former days, in which, after ye were enlightened, ye endured a great conflict of sufferings; partly, being made a gazingstock both by reproaches and afflictions; and partly, becoming partakers with them 34 that were so used. For ye both had compassion on them that were in bonds, and took joyfully the spoiling of your possessions, knowing that ye have your own selves for a better possession and an abiding one. Cast not away therefore your boldness, which hath great recompense of reward. For ye have need of patience, that,
37 having done the will of God, ye may receive the promise. For yet a very little while, he that cometh shall come, and shall not tarry. But my righteous one shall live BY FAITH: and if he shrink back, my soul hath no pleasure in him. But we are not of them that shrink back unto perdition; but of them that have faith unto the saving of the soul.

11 Now faith is the giving substance to things hoped for, the proving of things not seen. For therein the elders had witness borne to them. By faith we understand that the worlds have been framed by the word of God, so that what is seen hath not
4 been made out of things which do appear. By faith Abel offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain, through which he had witness borne to him that he was righteous, God bearing witness in respect of his gifts: and through it he being dead yet speaketh. By faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death; and he was not found, because God translated him: for before his translation he hath had
6 witness borne to him that he had been well-pleasing unto God: and without faith it is impossible to be well-pleasing unto him: for he that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that seek after him. By faith Noah, being warned of God concerning things not seen as yet, moved with godly fear, prepared an ark to the saving of his house; through which he condemned the world,
8 and became heir of the righteousness which is according to faith. By faith Abraham, when he was called, obeyed to go out unto a place which he was to receive for an inheritance; and he went out, not knowing whither he went. By faith he became a sojourner in the land of promise, as in a land not his own, dwelling in tents, with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise: for he looked for the city which hath the foundations, whose architect and maker is God. By 11 faith even Sarah herself received power to conceive seed when she was past age, since she counted him faithful who had promised: wherefore also there sprang of one, and him as good as dead, so many as the stars of heaven in multitude, and as the sand, which is by the sea shore, innumerable. These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them and greeted them from afar, and having confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth. For they 14 that say such things make it manifest that they are seeking after a country of their own. And if indeed they had been mindful of that country from which they went out, they would have had opportunity to return. But now they desire a better country, that is, a heavenly: wherefore God is not ashamed of them, to be called 17 their God: for he hath prepared for them a city. By faith Abraham, being tried, offered up Isaac: yea, he that had gladly received the promises was offering up his only begotten son; even he to whom it was said, In Isaac shall thy seed be called: accounting that God is able to raise up, even from the dead; from whence he did 20 also in a parable receive him back. By faith Isaac blessed Jacob and Esau, even concerning things to come. By faith Jacob, when he was a dying, blessed each of the sons of Joseph; and worshipped, leaning upon the top of his staff. By faith Joseph, when his end was nigh, made mention of the departure of the children of 23

Israel; and gave commandment concerning his bones. By faith Moses, when he was born, was hid three months by his parents, because they saw he was a goodly child; and they were not afraid of the king's commandment. By faith Moses, when he was grown up, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter; choosing rather to be evil entreated with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin 26 for a season; accounting the reproach of the Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt: for he looked unto the recompense of reward. By faith he forsook Egypt, not fearing the wrath of the king: for he endured, as seeing him who is invisible. By faith he kept the passover, and the sprinkling of the blood, that the destroyer of the firstborn should not touch them. By faith they passed through the Red sea as by dry land: which the Egyptians assaying to do were swallowed up. By 30 faith the walls of Jericho fell down, after they had been compassed about for seven days. By faith Rahab the harlot perished not with them that were disobedient, having received the spies with peace. And what shall I more say? for the time will fail me if I tell of Gideon, Barak, Samson, Jephthah; of David and Samuel and the prophets: who through faith subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, 33 obtained promises, stopped the mouths of lions, quenched the power of fire, escaped the edge of the sword, from weakness were made strong, waxed mighty in war, turned to flight armies of aliens. Women received their dead by a resurrection: and others were tortured, not accepting their deliverance; that they might obtain a better resurrection: and others had trial of mockings and scourgings, yea, more- 36 over of bonds and imprisonment: they were stoned, they were sawn asunder, they were tempted, they were slain with the sword: they went about in sheepskins, in goatskins; being destitute, afflicted, evil entreated (of whom the world was not worthy), wandering in deserts and mountains and caves, and the holes of the earth. And these all, having had witness borne to them through their faith, received not the 39 promise, God having provided some better thing concerning us, that apart from us they should not be made perfect.

Therefore let us also, seeing we are compassed about with so great a cloud of 12 witnesses, lay aside all cumbrance, and the sin which is admired of many, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus the author and perfecter of our faith, who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, despising shame, and hath sat down at the right hand of the throne of God. For consider him that hath endured such gainsaying of sinners against themselves, that ye wax not weary, fainting in your souls. Ye have not yet resisted unto blood, striving against sin: and ye have forgotten the exhortation, which reasoneth with you as with sons,

My son, regard not lightly the chastening of the Lord,
Nor faint when thou art reproved of him;
For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth,
And scourgeth every son whom he receiveth.

Endure unto chastening: God dealeth with you as with sons; for what son is there whom his father chasteneth not? But if ye are without chastening, whereof all have been partakers, then are ye bastards, and not sons. Furthermore, we had the fathers of our flesh to chasten us, and we gave them reverence: shall we not much rather be in subjection unto the Father of spirits, and live? For they verily for a few days chastened us as seemed good to them; but he for our profit, that we may be partakers of his holiness. All chastening seemeth for the present to be not joyous, but grievous: yet afterward it yieldeth peaceable fruit unto them that have been exercised thereby, even the fruit of righteousness. Wherefore lift up the hands that hang down, and the palsied knees; and make straight paths for your feet, that that which is lame be not put out of joint, but rather be healed. Follow after peace with all men, and the sanctification without which no man shall see the Lord: looking carefully whether there be any man that falleth short of the grace of God; lest any root of bitterness springing up trouble you, and thereby the many be defiled; whether there be any fornicator, or profane person, as Esau, who for one mess of meat sold his own birthright: for ye know that even when he afterward desired to inherit the blessing, he was rejected (for he found no place of repentance), though he sought it diligently with tears.

For ye are not come unto a palpable and kindled fire, and unto blackness, and darkness, and tempest, and the sound of a trumpet, and the voice of words; which voice they that heard intreated that no word more should be spoken unto them: for they could not endure that which was enjoined, If even a beast touch the mountain, it shall be stoned; and (so fearful was the appearance), Moses said, I exceedingly fear and quake: but ye are come unto mount Zion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to innumerable hosts of angels, to the general assembly and church of the firstborn who are enrolled in heaven, and to God the Judge of all, and to the spirits of just men made perfect, and to Jesus the mediator of a new covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling that speaketh better than Abel. See that ye refuse not him that speaketh: for if they escaped not, when they refused him that warned them on earth, much more shall not we escape, who turn away from him that warneth from heaven. Whose voice then shook the earth; but now he hath promised, saying, Yet once more will I make to tremble not the earth only, but also the heaven: and this word, Yet once more, signifieth the removing of those things that are shaken, as of things that have been made, that those things which are not shaken may remain. Wherefore, receiving a kingdom that cannot be shaken, let us have grace, whereby we may offer service well-pleasing to God with reverence and awe: for our God is a consuming fire.

IV

13 Let love of the brethren continue. Forget not to shew love unto strangers: for thereby some have entertained angels unawares. Remember them that are in bonds, as bound with them; them that are evil entreated, as being yourselves also in the body. Let marriage be had in honour among all, and let the bed be undefiled: for fornicators and adulterers God will judge. Be ye free from the love of 5 money; content with such things as ye have: for himself hath said, I will in no wise fail thee, neither will I in any wise forsake thee. So that with good courage we say,

The Lord is my helper; I will not fear:
What shall man do unto me?

Remember them that had the rule over you, which spake unto you the word of 7
God; and considering the issue of their life, imitate their faith. Jesus Christ is the same yesterday and to-day, yea and for ever. Be not carried away by divers and strange teachings: for it is good that the heart be stablished by grace; not by meats, wherein they that occupied themselves were not profited. We have an altar, whereof they have no right to eat which serve the tabernacle. For the bodies of those beasts, whose blood is brought into the holy place by the high priest as an offering for sin, are burned without the camp. Wherefore Jesus also, that he might sanctify the 12 people through his own blood, suffered without the gate. Let us therefore go forth unto him without the camp, bearing his reproach. For we have not here an abiding city, but we seek after the city which is to come. Through him then let us offer up a sacrifice of praise to God continually, that is, the fruit of lips which make confession to his name. But to do good and to communicate forget not: for with such sacrifices God is well pleased. Obey them that have the rule over you, and submit 17 to them: for they watch in behalf of your souls, as they that shall give account; that they may do this with joy, and not with grief: for this were unprofitable for you.

Pray for us: for we are persuaded that we have a good conscience, desiring to live honestly in all things. And I exhort you the more exceedingly to do this, that I may be restored to you the sooner.

Now the God of peace, who brought again from the dead the great shepherd 20 of the sheep with the blood of the eternal covenant, even our Lord Jesus, make you perfect in every good thing to do his will, working in us that which is well-pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ; to whom be the glory for ever and ever. Amen.

But I exhort you, brethren, bear with the word of exhortation: for I have 22 written unto you in few words. Know ye that our brother Timothy hath been set at liberty; with whom, if he come shortly, I will see you.

Salute all them that have the rule over you, and all the saints. They of Italy salute you. Grace be with you all. Amen.

THE WISDOM EPISTLE OF ST. JAMES

James, a Servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ: To the Twelve 1 Tribes which are of the Dispersion: Greeting.

The Joy of Temptation. — A Paradox

Count it all joy, my brethren, when ye fall into manifold temptations: knowing 2 that the proof of your faith worketh patience. And let patience have its perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, lacking in nothing.

Maxim: The Prayer for Wisdom

5 But if any of you lacketh wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all liberally and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him. But let him ask in faith, nothing doubting: for he that doubteth is like the surge of the sea driven by the wind and tossed. For let not that man think that he shall receive anything of the Lord; a doubleminded man, unstable in all his ways.

A Paradox of High and Low

9 But let the brother of low degree glory in his high estate: and the rich, in that he is made low: because as the flower of the grass he shall pass away. For the sun ariseth with the scorching wind, and withereth the grass; and the flower thereof falleth, and the grace of the fashion of it perisheth: so also shall the rich man fade away in his goings.

Essay: On the Sources of the Evil and the Good in us

12 Blessed is the man that endureth temptation: for when he hath been approved, he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord promised to them that love him.
Let no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God: for God cannot be tempted with evil, and he himself tempteth no man: but each man is tempted, when he is drawn away by his own lust, and enticed. Then the lust, when it hath conceived, beareth sin: and the sin, when it is fullgrown, bringeth forth death. Be not deceived, my beloved brethren.
17 Every good gift and every perfect boon is from above, coming down from the Father of lights, with whom can be no variation, neither shadow that is cast by turning. Of his own will he brought us forth by the word of truth, that we should be a kind of firstfruits of his creatures. Know ye this, my beloved brethren. But let every man be swift to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath: for the wrath of man worketh
21 not the righteousness of God. Wherefore putting away all filthiness and overflowing of wickedness, receive with meekness the inborn word, which is able to save your souls. But be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only, deluding your own selves. For if any one is a hearer of the word, and not a doer, he is like unto a man beholding his natural face in a mirror: for he beholdeth himself, and goeth away, and straight-
25 way forgetteth what manner of man he was. But he that looketh into the perfect law, the law of liberty, and so continueth, being not a hearer that forgetteth, but a doer that worketh, this man shall be blessed in his doing. If any man thinketh himself to be religious, while he bridleth not his tongue but deceiveth his heart, this 27 man's religion is vain. Pure religion and undefiled before our God and Father is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world.

Essay: On Respect of Persons

2 My brethren, hold not the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory, with respect of persons. For if there come into your synagogue a man with a gold ring, in fine clothing, and there come in also a poor man in vile clothing; and ye have regard to him that weareth the fine clothing, and say, Sit thou here in a good place; and ye say to the poor man, Stand thou there, or sit under my footstool; do ye not 5 make distinctions among yourselves, and become judges with evil thoughts? Hearken, my beloved brethren; did not God choose them that are poor as to the world to be rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which he promised to them that love him? But ye have dishonoured the poor man. Do not the rich oppress you, and themselves drag you before the judgement-seats? Do not they blaspheme the honourable name by the which ye are called? Howbeit if ye fulfil the royal law, according to the 8 scripture, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself, ye do well: but if ye have respect of persons, ye commit sin, being convicted by the law as transgressors. For whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet stumble in one point, he is become guilty of all. For he that said, Do not commit adultery, said also, Do not kill. Now if thou dost not commit adultery, but killest, thou art become a transgressor of the law.

So speak ye, and so do, as men that are to be judged by a law of liberty. For judge- 12 ment is without mercy to him that hath shewed no mercy: mercy glorieth against judgement.

Faith and Works. — An Essay

What doth it profit, my brethren, if a man say he hath faith, but have not works? 14 can that faith save him? If a brother or sister be naked, and in lack of daily food, and one of you say unto them, Go in peace, be ye warmed and filled; and yet ye give them not the things needful to the body; what doth it profit? Even so faith, if it have not works, is dead in itself. Yea, a man will say, Thou hast faith, and I have works: shew me thy faith apart from thy works, and I by my works will shew thee my faith. Thou believest that God is one; thou doest well: the devils also believe, 19 and shudder. But wilt thou know, O vain man, that faith apart from works is barren?
Was not Abraham our father justified by works, in that he offered up Isaac his son upon the altar? Thou seest that faith wrought with his works, and by works was faith made perfect; and the scripture was fulfilled which saith, And Abraham be- lieved God, and it was reckoned unto him for righteousness; and he was called the friend of God. Ye see that by works a man is justified, and not only by faith. And 24 in like manner was not also Rahab the harlot justified by works, in that she received the messengers, and sent them out another way? For as the body apart from the spirit is dead, even so faith apart from works is dead.

Essay: The Responsibility of Speech

Be not many teachers, my brethren, knowing that we shall receive heavier judge- 3 ment. For in many things we all stumble. If any stumbleth not in word, the same is a perfect man, able to bridle the whole body also. Now if we put the horses' bridles into their mouths, that they may obey us, we turn about their whole body also. Behold, the ships also, though they are so great, and are driven by rough winds, 4 are yet turned about by a very small rudder, whither the impulse of the steersman willeth. So the tongue also is a little member, and boasteth great things. Behold, how much wood is kindled by how small a fire! And the tongue is a fire: the world of iniquity among our members is the tongue, which defileth the whole body, and setteth on fire the wheel of nature, and is set on fire by hell. For every kind of beasts 7 and birds, of creeping things and things in the sea, is tamed, and hath been tamed by mankind: but the tongue can no man tame; it is a restless evil, it is full of deadly poison. Therewith bless we the Lord and Father; and therewith curse we men, which are made after the likeness of God: out of the same mouth cometh forth blessing and cursing. My brethren, these things ought not so to be. Doth the fountain 11 send forth from the same opening sweet water and bitter? can a fig tree, my brethren, yield olives, or a vine figs? neither can salt water yield sweet.

Essay. — The Earthly Wisdom and the Wisdom from Above

Who is wise and understanding among you? let him shew by his good life his 13 works in meekness of wisdom. But if ye have bitter jealousy and faction in your heart, glory not and lie not against the truth. This wisdom is not a wisdom that cometh down from above, but is earthly, sensual, devilish. For where jealousy and 17 faction are, there is confusion and every vile deed. But the wisdom that is from above is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, easy to be intreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without variance, without hypocrisy. And the fruit of righteousness is sown in peace for them that make peace.

A Discourse: On Worldly Pleasures

4 Whence come wars and whence come fightings among you? come they not hence, even of your pleasures that war in your members? Ye lust, and have not: ye kill, and covet, and cannot obtain: ye fight and war; ye have not, because ye ask not. 3 Ye ask, and receive not, because ye ask amiss, that ye may spend it in your pleasures. 4 Ye adulteresses, know ye not that the friendship of the world is enmity with God? Whosoever therefore would be a friend of the world maketh himself an enemy of God. 5 Or think ye that the scripture speaketh in vain? Doth the spirit which he made to dwell in us long unto envying? 6 But he giveth more grace. Wherefore the scripture saith, God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to the humble. 7 Be subject therefore unto God; but resist the devil, and he will flee from you. 8 Draw nigh to God, and he will draw nigh to you. Cleanse your hands, ye sinners; and purify your hearts, ye doubleminded. 9 Be afflicted, and mourn, and weep: let your laughter be turned 10 to mourning, and your joy to heaviness. Humble yourselves in the sight of the Lord, and he shall exalt you.

A Maxim against Judging

11 Speak not one against another, brethren. He that speaketh against a brother, or judgeth his brother, speaketh against the law, and judgeth the law: but if thou judgest the law, thou art not a doer of the law, but a judge. 12 One only is the lawgiver and judge, even he who is able to save and to destroy: but who art thou that thou judgest thy neighbour?

A Discourse: The Judgement to Come

13 Go to now, ye that say, To-day or to-morrow we will go into this city, and spend a year there, and trade, and get gain: 14 whereas ye know not what shall be on the morrow. What is your life? For ye are a vapour, that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away. 15 For that ye ought to say, If the Lord will, we shall both live, and do this or that. 16 But now ye glory in your vauntings: all such glorying is evil. 17 To him therefore that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin.

5 Go to now, ye rich, weep and howl for your miseries that are coming upon you. 2 Your riches are corrupted, and your garments are moth-eaten. 3 Your gold and your silver are rusted; and their rust shall be for a testimony against you, and shall eat your flesh as fire. Ye have laid up your treasure in the last days. 4 Behold, the hire of the labourers who mowed your fields, which is of you kept back by fraud, crieth out: and the cries of them that reaped have entered into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth. 5 Ye have lived delicately on the earth, and taken your pleasure; ye have nourished your hearts in a day of slaughter. 6 Ye have condemned, ye have killed the righteous one; he doth not resist you.

7 Be patient therefore, brethren, until the coming of the Lord. Behold, the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, being patient over it, until it receive the early and latter rain. 8 Be ye also patient; stablish your hearts: for the coming of the Lord is at hand. 9 Murmur not, brethren, one against another, that ye be not judged: behold, the judge standeth before the doors. 10 Take, brethren, for an example of suffering and of patience, the prophets who spake in the name of the 11 Lord. Behold, we call them blessed which endured: ye have heard of the patience of Job, and have seen the end of the Lord, how that the Lord is full of pity, and merciful.

But above all things, my brethren, swear not, neither by the heaven, nor by the 12 earth, nor by any other oath: but let your yea be yea, and your nay, nay; that ye fall not under judgement.

Is any among you suffering? let him pray. Is any cheerful? let him sing praise. 13
Is any among you sick? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord: and the prayer of faith shall save him that is sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he have committed sins, it shall be forgiven him. Confess therefore your sins one to another, and pray one for another, that ye may be healed. The supplication of a righteous man availeth much in its working. Elijah was a man of like passions with us, and he prayed 17 fervently that it might not rain; and it rained not on the earth for three years and six months. And he prayed again; and the heaven gave rain, and the earth brought forth her fruit.

Maxim: The Blessed Work of Converting

My brethren, if any among you do err from the truth, and one convert him; let 19 him know, that he which converteth a sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death, and shall cover a multitude of sins.

THE FIRST EPISTLE OF ST. PETER

Peter, an Apostle of Jesus Christ: To the Elect who are sojourners of the 1
Dispersion in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia: according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, in sanctification of the Spirit, unto obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ: Grace to you and peace be multiplied.

I

Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who according to his 3 great mercy begat us again unto a living hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, unto an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you, who by the power of God are guarded through faith unto a salvation ready to be revealed in the last time. Wherein ye greatly rejoice, though 6 now for a little while, if need be, ye have been put to grief in manifold temptations, that the proof of your faith, being more precious than gold that perisheth though it is proved by fire, might be found unto praise and glory and honour at the revelation of Jesus Christ: whom not having seen ye love; on whom, though now ye see him not, yet believing, ye rejoice greatly with joy unspeakable and full of glory: receiving 9 the end of your faith, even the salvation of your souls. Concerning which salvation the prophets sought and searched diligently, who prophesied of the grace that should come unto you: searching what time or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did point unto, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glories that should follow them. To whom it was revealed, that not 12 unto themselves, but unto you, did they minister these things, which now have been announced unto you through them that preached the gospel unto you by the Holy Ghost sent forth from heaven; which things angels desire to look into.

Wherefore girding up the loins of your mind, be sober and set your hope perfectly 13 on the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ; as children of obedience, not fashioning yourselves according to your former lusts in the time of your ignorance: but like as he which called you is holy, be ye yourselves also holy in all manner of living; because it is written, Ye shall be holy; for I am

17 holy. And if ye call on him as Father, who without respect of persons judgeth according to each man's work, pass the time of your sojourning in fear: knowing that ye were redeemed, not with corruptible things, with silver or gold, from your vain manner of life handed down from your fathers; but with precious blood, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot, even the blood of Christ: who was foreknown indeed before the foundation of the world, but was manifested at the end of the times 21 for your sake, who through him are believers in God, which raised him from the dead, and gave him glory; so that your faith and hope might be in God. Seeing ye have purified your souls in your obedience to the truth unto unfeigned love of the brethren, love one another from the heart fervently. Having been begotten again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, through the word of God, which liveth and 24 abideth: — for,

All flesh is as grass,
And all the glory thereof as the flower of grass;
The grass withereth, and the flower falleth,
But the word of the Lord abideth for ever:

2 and this is the word of good tidings which was preached unto you: — putting away therefore all wickedness, and all guile, and hypocrisies, and envies, and all evil speakings, as newborn babes, long for the spiritual milk which is without guile, that ye may grow thereby unto salvation; if ye have tasted that the Lord is gracious: unto whom coming, a living stone, rejected indeed of men, but with God elect, precious,
5 ye also, as living stones, are built up a spiritual house, to be a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God through Jesus Christ. Because it is contained in scripture,

Behold, I lay in Zion a chief corner stone, elect, precious:
And he that believeth on him shall not be put to shame.

7 For you therefore which believe is the preciousness: but for such as disbelieve,

The stone which the builders rejected,
The same was made the head of the corner;

and,

A stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence;

for they stumble at the word, being disobedient: whereunto also they were appointed.
9 But ye are an elect race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people for God's own possession, that ye may shew forth the excellencies of him who called you out of darkness into his marvellous light: which in time past were no people, but now are the people of God: which had not obtained mercy, but now have obtained mercy.

II

11 Beloved, I beseech you as sojourners and pilgrims, to abstain from fleshly lusts, which war against the soul; having your behaviour seemly among the Gentiles; that, wherein they speak against you as evil-doers, they may by your good works, which they behold, glorify God in the day of visitation. Be subject to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake: whether it be to the king, as supreme; or unto governors, as sent by him for vengeance on evil-doers and for praise to them that do well.
For so is the will of God, that by well-doing ye should put to silence the ignorance of foolish men: as free, and not using your freedom for a cloke of wickedness, but 17 as bondservants of God. Honour all men. Love the brotherhood. Fear God. Honour the king. Servants, be in subjection to your masters with all fear; not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward. For this is acceptable, if for conscience 19 toward God a man endureth griefs, suffering wrongfully. For what glory is it, if, when ye sin, and are buffeted for it, ye shall take it patiently? but if, when ye do well, and suffer for it, ye shall take it patiently, this is acceptable with God. For hereunto were ye called: because Christ also suffered for you, leaving you an example, that ye should follow his steps: who did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth: who, 23 when he was reviled, reviled not again; when he suffered, threatened not; but committed himself to him that judgeth righteously: who his own self bare our sins in his body upon the tree, that we, having died unto sins, might live unto righteousness; by whose stripes ye were healed. For ye were going astray like sheep; but are now returned unto the Shepherd and Bishop of your souls. In like manner, ye wives, be 3 in subjection to your own husbands; that, even if any obey not the word, they may without the word be gained by the behaviour of their wives; beholding your chaste behaviour coupled with fear. Whose adorning let it not be the outward adorning of plaiting the hair, and of wearing jewels of gold, or of putting on apparel; but let it be the hidden man of the heart, in the incorruptible apparel of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price. For after this manner aforetime 5 the holy women also, who hoped in God, adorned themselves, being in subjection to their own husbands: as Sarah obeyed Abraham, calling him lord: whose children ye now are, if ye do well, and are not put in fear by any terror. Ye husbands, in like manner, dwell with your wives according to knowledge, giving honour unto the woman, as unto the weaker vessel, as being also joint-heirs of the grace of life; to the end that your prayers be not hindered.

Finally, be ye all likeminded, compassionate, loving as brethren, tenderhearted, 8 humbleminded: not rendering evil for evil, or reviling for reviling; but contrariwise blessing; for hereunto were ye called, that ye should inherit a blessing. For,

> He that would love life,
> And see good days,
> Let him refrain his tongue from evil,
> And his lips that they speak no guile:
> And let him turn away from evil, and do good; 11
> Let him seek peace, and pursue it.
> For the eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous,
> And his ears unto their supplication:
> But the face of the Lord is upon them that do evil.

And who is he that will harm you, if ye be zealous of that which is good? But and 13 if ye should suffer for righteousness' sake, blessed are ye: and fear not their fear, neither be troubled; but sanctify in your hearts Christ as Lord: being ready always to give answer to every man that asketh you a reason concerning the hope that is in you, yet with meekness and fear: having a good conscience; that, wherein ye are spoken against, they may be put to shame who revile your good manner of life in Christ. For it is better, if the will of God should so will, that ye suffer for well-doing than for evil-doing. Because Christ also suffered for sins once, the righteous 18 for the unrighteous, that he might bring us to God; being put to death in the flesh — but quickened in the spirit: in which also he went and preached unto the spirits in prison, which aforetime were disobedient, when the longsuffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the ark was a preparing, wherein few, that is, eight souls, were saved through water: (which also after a true likeness doth now save you, even bap- 21 tism, not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the interrogation of a good conscience toward God, through the resurrection of Jesus Christ; who is on the right hand of God, having gone into heaven; angels and authorities and powers being made

4 subject unto him:) — forasmuch then as Christ suffered in the flesh, arm ye yourselves also with the same mind (for he that hath suffered in the flesh hath ceased from sin) that ye no longer should live the rest of your time in the flesh to the lusts of men, but to the will of God. For the time past may suffice to have wrought the desire of the Gentiles, and to have walked in lasciviousness, lusts, winebibbings, revellings, carous-4 ings, and abominable idolatries: wherein they think it strange that ye run not with them into the same excess of riot, speaking evil of you: who shall give account to him that is ready to judge the quick and the dead. For unto this end was the gospel preached even to the dead, that they might be judged according to men in the flesh, but live according to God in the spirit.

III

7 But the end of all things is at hand: be ye therefore of sound mind, and be sober unto prayer: above all things being fervent in your love among yourselves; for love covereth a multitude of sins: using hospitality one to another without murmuring:
according as each hath received a gift, ministering it among yourselves, as good stewards of the manifold grace of God; if any man speaketh, speaking as it were oracles of God; if any man ministereth, ministering as of the strength which God supplieth: that in all things God may be glorified through Jesus Christ, whose is the 12 glory and the dominion for ever and ever. Amen. Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial among you, which cometh upon you to prove you, as though a strange thing happened unto you: but insomuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings, rejoice; that at the revelation of his glory also ye may rejoice with exceeding joy. If ye are reproached for the name of Christ, blessed are ye; because the 15 Spirit of glory and the Spirit of God resteth upon you. For let none of you suffer as a murderer, or a thief, or an evil-doer, or as a meddler in other men's matters: but if a man suffer as a Christian, let him not be ashamed; but let him glorify God in this name. For the time is come for judgement to begin at the house of God: and if it begin first at us, what shall be the end of them that obey not the gospel of God? And if the righteous is scarcely saved, where shall the ungodly and sinner appear? Wherefore let them also that suffer according to the will of God commit their souls in well-5 doing unto a faithful Creator. The elders therefore among you I exhort, who am a fellow-elder, and a witness of the sufferings of Christ, who am also a partaker of the glory that shall be revealed: Tend the flock of God which is among you, exercising the oversight, not of constraint, but willingly, according unto God; nor yet for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind; neither as lording it over the charge allotted to you, 4 but making yourselves ensamples to the flock. And when the chief Shepherd shall be manifested, ye shall receive the crown of glory that fadeth not away. Likewise, ye younger, be subject unto the elder. Yea, all of you gird yourselves with humility, to serve one another: for God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to the humble.
6 Humble yourselves therefore under the mighty hand of God, that he may exalt you in due time; casting all your anxiety upon him, because he careth for you. Be sober, be watchful: your adversary the devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about, seeking whom he may devour: whom withstand stedfast in your faith, knowing that the same 10 sufferings are accomplished in your brethren who are in the world. And the God of all grace, who called you unto his eternal glory in Christ, after that ye have suffered a little while, shall himself perfect, stablish, strengthen you. To him be the dominion for ever and ever. Amen.

12 By Silvanus, our faithful brother, as I account him, I have written unto you briefly, exhorting, and testifying that this is the true grace of God: stand ye fast therein. She that is in Babylon, elect together with you, saluteth you: and so doth Mark my son. Salute one another with a kiss of love. Peace be unto you all that are in Christ.

THE SECOND EPISTLE OF ST. PETER

Simon Peter, a Servant and Apostle of Jesus Christ: To them that 1 have obtained a like precious faith with us in the righteousness of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ:

Grace to you and peace be multiplied in the knowledge of God and of Jesus our Lord; 2 seeing that his divine power hath granted unto us all things that pertain unto life and godliness, through the knowledge of him that called us by his own glory and virtue; whereby he hath granted unto us his precious and exceeding great promises; that through these ye may become partakers of the divine nature, having escaped from the corruption that is in the world by lust. Yea, and for this very cause adding 5 on your part all diligence, in your faith supply virtue; and in your virtue knowledge; and in your knowledge temperance; and in your temperance patience; and in your patience godliness; and in your godliness love of the brethren; and in your love of the brethren love. For if these things are yours and abound, they make you to be not idle nor unfruitful unto the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ. For he that 9 lacketh these things is blind, seeing only what is near, having forgotten the cleansing from his old sins. Wherefore, brethren, give the more diligence to make your calling and election sure: for if ye do these things, ye shall never stumble: for thus shall be richly supplied unto you the entrance into the eternal kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

Wherefore I shall be ready always to put you in remembrance of these things, 12 though ye know them, and are established in the truth which is with you. And I think it right, as long as I am in this tabernacle, to stir you up by putting you in remembrance; knowing that the putting off of my tabernacle cometh swiftly, even as our Lord Jesus Christ signified unto me. Yea, I will give diligence that at every time ye may be able after my decease to call these things to remembrance. For we 16 did not follow cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but we were eyewitnesses of his majesty. For he received from God the Father honour and glory, when there came such a voice to him from the excellent glory, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased:
and this voice we ourselves heard come out of heaven, when we were with him in 18 the holy mount. And we have the word of prophecy made more sure; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a lamp shining in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day-star arise in your hearts: knowing this first, that no prophecy of scripture is of private interpretation; for no prophecy ever came by the will of man, but men spake from God, being moved by the Holy Ghost. But there arose 2 false prophets also among the people, as among you also there shall be false teachers, who shall privily bring in destructive heresies, denying even the Master that bought them, bringing upon themselves swift destruction. And many shall follow their lascivious doings, by reason of whom the way of the truth shall be evil spoken of;
and in covetousness shall they with feigned words make merchandise of you. Whose 3 sentence now from of old lingereth not, and their destruction slumbereth not. For if God spared not angels when they sinned, but cast them down to hell, and committed them to pits of darkness, to be reserved unto judgement; and spared not the ancient world, but preserved Noah with seven others, a preacher of righteousness, when he brought a flood upon the world of the ungodly; and turning the cities of Sodom and 6 Gomorrah into ashes condemned them with an overthrow, having made them an example unto those that should live ungodly; and delivered righteous Lot, sore distressed by the lascivious life of the wicked (for that righteous man dwelling among them, in seeing and hearing, vexed his righteous soul from day to day with their lawless deeds): the Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptation, and 9

10 to keep the unrighteous under punishment unto the day of judgement; but chiefly them that walk after the flesh in the lust of defilement, and despise dominion. Daring, selfwilled, they tremble not to rail at dignities: whereas angels, though greater in might and power, bring not a railing judgement against them before the Lord.
But these, as creatures without reason, born mere animals to be taken and destroyed, railing in matters whereof they are ignorant, shall in their destroying surely be de-13 stroyed, suffering wrong as the hire of wrong-doing; men that count it pleasure to revel in the day-time, spots and blemishes, revelling in their love-feasts while they feast with you; having eyes full of adultery, and that cannot cease from sin; enticing unstedfast souls; having a heart exercised in covetousness; children of cursing; forsaking the right way, they went astray, having followed the way of Balaam the son of Beor, who loved the hire of wrong-doing, but he was rebuked for his own transgression — a dumb ass spake with man's voice and stayed the madness of the prophet.
17 These are springs without water, and mists driven by a storm; for whom the blackness of darkness hath been reserved. For, uttering great swelling words of vanity, they entice in the lusts of the flesh, by lasciviousness, those who are just escaping from them that live in error; promising them liberty, while they themselves are bondservants of corruption: for of whom a man is overcome, of the same is he also brought into bondage. For if, after they have escaped the defilements of the world through the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, they are again entangled 21 therein and overcome, the last state is become worse with them than the first. For it were better for them not to have known the way of righteousness, than, after knowing it, to turn back from the holy commandment delivered unto them. It has happened unto them according to the true proverb, The dog turning to his own vomit again, and the sow that had washed to wallowing in the mire.

3 This is now, beloved, the second epistle that I write unto you; and in both of them
I stir up your sincere mind by putting you in remembrance; that ye should remember the words which were spoken before by the holy prophets, and the commandment of the Lord and Saviour through your apostles: knowing this first, that in the last days mockers shall come with mockery, walking after their own lusts, and saying,
Where is the promise of his coming? for, from the day that the fathers fell asleep, 5 all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation. For this they wilfully forget, that there were heavens from of old, and an earth compacted out of water and amidst water, by the word of God; by which means the world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished: but the heavens that now are, and the earth, by the same word have been stored up for fire, being reserved against the day of judgement and destruction of ungodly men. But forget not this one thing, beloved, that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as 9 one day. The Lord is not slack concerning his promise, as some count slackness; but is longsuffering to you-ward, not wishing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance. But the day of the Lord will come as a thief; in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall be dissolved with fervent heat, and the earth and the works that are therein shall be burned 11 up. Seeing that these things are thus all to be dissolved, what manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy living and godliness, looking for and earnestly desiring the coming of the day of God, by reason of which the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat? But, according to his promise, we look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. Wherefore, beloved, seeing that ye look for these things, give diligence that ye may be found 15 in peace, without spot and blameless in his sight. And account that the longsuffering of our Lord is salvation; even as our beloved brother Paul also, according to the wisdom given to him, wrote unto you; as also in all his epistles, speaking in them of these things; wherein are some things hard to be understood, which the ignorant and unstedfast wrest, as they do also the other scriptures, unto their own destruction.

Ye therefore, beloved, knowing these things beforehand, beware lest, being carried away with the error of the wicked, ye fall from your own stedfastness. But grow in 18 the grace and knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. To him be the glory both now and for ever. Amen.

AN EPISTLE GENERAL OF ST. JUDE

Judas, a Servant of Jesus Christ and brother of James: To them that 1 are called, beloved in God the Father, and kept for Jesus Christ: Mercy unto you and peace and love be multiplied.

Beloved, while I was giving all diligence to write unto you of our common sal- 3 vation, I was constrained to write unto you exhorting you to contend earnestly for the faith which was once for all delivered unto the saints. For there are certain men crept in privily, even they who were of old set forth unto this condemnation, ungodly men, turning the grace of our God into lasciviousness, and denying our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ.

Now I desire to put you in remembrance, though ye know all things once for all, 5 how that the Lord, having saved a people out of the land of Egypt, afterward destroyed them that believed not. And angels which kept not their own principality, but left their proper habitation, he hath kept in everlasting bonds under darkness unto the judgement of the great day. Even as Sodom and Gomorrah, and the cities about 7 them, having in like manner with these given themselves over to fornication, and gone after strange flesh, are set forth as an example, suffering the punishment of eternal fire. Yet in like manner these also in their dreamings defile the flesh, and set at nought dominion, and rail at dignities. But Michael the archangel, when con- 9 tending with the devil he disputed about the body of Moses, durst not bring against him a railing judgement, but said, The Lord rebuke thee. But these rail at whatsoever things they know not: and what they understand naturally, like the creatures without reason, in these things are they destroyed. Woe unto them! for they went 11 in the way of Cain, and ran riotously in the error of Balaam for hire, and perished in the gainsaying of Korah. These are they who are hidden rocks in your love-feasts when they feast with you, shepherds that without fear feed themselves; clouds without water, carried along by winds; autumn trees without fruit, twice dead, plucked up by the roots; wild waves of the sea, foaming out their own shame; wandering stars, 13 for whom the blackness of darkness hath been reserved for ever. And to these also Enoch, the seventh from Adam, prophesied, saying, Behold, the Lord came with ten thousands of his holy ones, to execute judgement upon all, and to convict all the ungodly of all their works of ungodliness which they have ungodly wrought, and of all the hard things which ungodly sinners have spoken against him. These are 16 murmurers, complainers, walking after their lusts (and their mouth speaketh great swelling words), shewing respect of persons for the sake of advantage. But ye, beloved, remember ye the words which have been spoken before by the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ; how that they said to you, In the last time there shall be mock-ers, walking after their own ungodly lusts. These are they who make separations, 19 sensual, having not the Spirit. But ye, beloved, building up yourselves on your most holy faith, praying in the Holy Spirit, keep yourselves in the love of God, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life. And on some have mercy, who are in doubt; and some save, snatching them out of the fire; and on some have mercy with fear; hating even the garment spotted by the flesh.

24 Now unto him that is able to guard you from stumbling, and to set you before the presence of his glory without blemish in exceeding joy, to the only God our Saviour, through Jesus Christ our Lord, be glory, majesty, dominion and power, before all time, and now, and for evermore. Amen.

THE WISDOM OF ST. JOHN

commonly known as the First Epistle of St. John

Prologue

1 That which was from the beginning, that which we have heard, that which we have seen with our eyes, that which we beheld, and our hands handled, concerning the Word of life: (and the life was manifested, and we have seen, and bear witness, and declare unto you the life, the eternal life, which was with the Father, and was manifested unto
3 us:) that which we have seen and heard declare we unto you also, that ye also may have fellowship with us: yea, and our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ: and these things we write that our joy may be fulfilled.

God is Light

5 And this is the message which we have heard from him, and announce unto you, that God is light, and in him is no darkness at all. If we say that we have fellowship with him, and walk in the darkness, we lie, and do not the truth; but if we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus his Son cleanseth us from all sin.

Cleansing from Sin

8 If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. If we confess our sins, he is faithful and righteous to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness. If we say that we have not sinned, we make him a 2 liar, and his word is not in us. My little children, these things write I unto you that ye may not sin. And if any man sin, we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous: and he is the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for the whole world.

The Commandments our Surety

3 And hereby know we that we know him, if we keep his commandments. He that saith, I know him, and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him: but whoso keepeth his word, in him verily hath the love of God been perfected. Hereby know we that we are in him: he that saith he abideth in him ought himself also to walk even as he walked.

The Old Commandment and the New

7 Beloved, no new commandment write I unto you, but an old commandment which ye had from the beginning: the old commandment is the word which ye heard. Again, a new commandment write I unto you, which thing is true in him and in you: because the darkness is passing away, and the true light already shineth. He that saith he is in the light, and hateth his brother, is in the darkness even until now.
10 He that loveth his brother abideth in the light, and there is none occasion of stumbling in him. But he that hateth his brother is in the darkness, and walketh in the darkness, and knoweth not whither he goeth, because the darkness hath blinded his eyes.

The Three Ages

I write unto you, little children, because your sins are forgiven you for his name's 12 sake. I write unto you, fathers, because ye know him which is from the beginning.
I write unto you, young men, because ye have overcome the evil one.

I have written unto you, little children, because ye know the Father. I have written unto you, fathers, because ye know him which is from the beginning. I have written unto you, young men, because ye are strong, and the word of God abideth in you, and ye have overcome the evil one.

Love of the World

Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the 15 world, the love of the Father is not in him. For all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the vainglory of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world. And the world passeth away, and the lust thereof: but he that doeth the will of God abideth for ever.

Antichrist

Little children, it is the last hour: and as ye heard that antichrist cometh, even now 18 have there arisen many antichrists; whereby we know that it is the last hour. They went out from us, but they were not of us; for if they had been of us, they would have continued with us: but they went out that they might be made manifest how that they all are not of us. And ye have an anointing from the Holy One, and ye know all things. I have not written unto you because ye know not the truth, but because ye know it, and that no lie is of the truth. Who is the liar but he that denieth that 22
Jesus is the Christ? This is the antichrist, even he that denieth the Father and the Son. Whosoever denieth the Son, the same hath not the Father: he that confesseth the Son hath the Father also. As for you, let that abide in you which ye heard from the beginning. If that which ye heard from the beginning abide in you, ye also shall abide in the Son, and in the Father. And this is the promise which he promised us, the life eternal. These things have I written unto you concerning them that would 26 lead you astray. And as for you, the anointing which ye received of him abideth in you, and ye need not that any one teach you; but as his anointing teacheth you concerning all things, and is true, and is no lie, and even as it taught you, ye abide in him. And now, little children, abide in him; that, if he shall be manifested, we may have boldness, and not be ashamed before him at his coming.

Sons of God

If ye know that he is righteous, ye know that every one also that doeth righteous- 29 ness is begotten of him. Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed 3 upon us, that we should be called children of God: and such we are. For this cause the world knoweth us not, because it knew him not. Beloved, now are we children of God, and it is not yet made manifest what we shall be. We know that, if he shall be manifested, we shall be like him; for we shall see him even as he is. And every one that hath this hope set on him purifieth himself, even as he is pure. Every one that doeth sin doeth also lawlessness: and sin is lawlessness. And ye know that he was mani- 5 fested to take away sins; and in him is no sin. Whosoever abideth in him sinneth not: whosoever sinneth hath not seen him, neither knoweth him. Little children, let no man lead you astray: he that doeth righteousness is righteous, even as he is righteous: he that doeth sin is of the devil; for the devil sinneth from the beginning. To this end was the Son of God manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil. Whosoever is begotten of God doeth no sin, because his seed abideth in him: 9 and he cannot sin, because he is begotten of God. In this the children of God are manifest, and the children of the devil: whosoever doeth not righteousness is not of 11 God, neither he that loveth not his brother. For this is the message which ye heard from the beginning, that we should love one another: not as Cain was of the evil one, and slew his brother. And wherefore slew he him? Because his works were evil, and his brother's righteous.

Love of the Brethren

13 Marvel not, brethren, if the world hateth you. We know that we have passed out of death into life, because we love the brethren. He that loveth not abideth in death. Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer: and ye know that no murderer hath eternal life abiding in him. Hereby know we love, because he laid down his life for us: and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren. But whoso hath the world's goods, and beholdeth his brother in need, and shutteth up his compassion 18 from him, how doth the love of God abide in him? Little children, let us not love in word, neither with the tongue; but in deed and truth. Hereby shall we know that we are of the truth, and shall assure our heart before him, whereinsoever our heart condemn us; because God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things.
Beloved, if our heart condemn us not, we have boldness toward God; and whatsoever
we ask, we receive of him, because we keep his commandments, and do the things 23 that are pleasing in his sight. And this is his commandment, that we should believe in the name of his Son Jesus Christ, and love one another, even as he gave us commandment.

The Spirit our Surety

24 And he that keepeth his commandments abideth in him, and he in him. And 4 hereby we know that he abideth in us, by the Spirit which he gave us. Beloved, believe not every spirit, but prove the spirits, whether they are of God: because many false prophets are gone out into the world. Hereby know ye the Spirit of God: every spirit which confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is of God:
and every spirit which confesseth not Jesus is not of God: and this is the spirit of the antichrist, whereof ye have heard that it cometh; and now it is in the world 4 already. Ye are of God, little children, and have overcome them: because greater is he that is in you than he that is in the world. They are of the world: therefore speak they as of the world, and the world heareth them. We are of God: he that knoweth God heareth us; he who is not of God heareth us not. By this we know the spirit of truth, and the spirit of error.

Love

7 Beloved, let us love one another: for love is of God; and every one that loveth is begotten of God, and knoweth God. He that loveth not knoweth not God; for God is love. Herein was the love of God manifested in us, that God hath sent his only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through him. Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation 11 for our sins. Beloved, if God so loved us, we also ought to love one another. No man hath beheld God at any time: if we love one another, God abideth in us, and his love is perfected in us: hereby know we that we abide in him, and he in us, because he hath given us of his Spirit. And we have beheld and bear witness that the 15 Father hath sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world. Whosoever shall confess that Jesus is the Son of God, God abideth in him, and he in God. And we know and have believed the love which God hath in us. God is love; and he that abideth in love abideth in God, and God abideth in him. Herein is love made perfect with us, that we may have boldness in the day of judgement; because as he is, even so are we in this world. There is no fear in love: but perfect love casteth out fear, because 18 fear hath punishment; and he that feareth is not made perfect in love. We love, because he first loved us. If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a 20 liar: for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, cannot love God whom he hath not seen. And this commandment have we from him, that he who loveth God love his brother also.

Faith

Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is begotten of God: and whosoever 5 loveth him that begat loveth him also that is begotten of him. Hereby we know that we love the children of God, when we love God, and do his commandments. For this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments: and his commandments are not grievous. For whatsoever is begotten of God overcometh the world: and 4 this is the victory that hath overcome the world, even our faith. And who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God?

The Three who bear witness

This is he that came by water and blood, even Jesus Christ; not with the water 6 only, but with the water and with the blood. And it is the Spirit that beareth witness, because the Spirit is the truth. For there are three who bear witness, the Spirit, and the water, and the blood: and the three agree in one. If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater: for the witness of God is this, that he hath borne witness concerning his Son. He that believeth on the Son of God hath the 10 witness in him: he that believeth not God hath made him a liar; because he hath not believed in the witness that God hath borne concerning his Son. And the witness is this, that God gave unto us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son hath the life; he that hath not the Son of God hath not the life. These 13 things have I written unto you, that ye may know that ye have eternal life, even unto you that believe on the name of the Son of God.

Boldness in asking

And this is the boldness which we have toward him, that, if we ask anything 14 according to his will, he heareth us: and if we know that he heareth us whatsoever we ask, we know that we have the petitions which we have asked of him. If any man see his brother sinning a sin not unto death, he shall ask, and God will give him life for them that sin not unto death. There is a sin unto death: not concerning this do I say that he should make request. All unrighteousness is sin: and there 17 is a sin not unto death.

Epilogue

WE KNOW that whosoever is begotten of God sinneth not; but he that was begotten 18 of God keepeth him, and the evil one toucheth him not.

WE KNOW that we are of God, and the whole world lieth in the evil one.

And WE KNOW that the Son of God is come, and hath given us an understanding, that 20
we know him that is true, and we are in him that is true, even in his Son Jesus Christ.

This is the true God, and eternal life. Little children, guard yourselves from idols. 21

THE SECOND EPISTLE OF ST. JOHN

1 The Elder: Unto the Elect Lady and her children: whom I love in truth; and not I only, but also all they that know the truth; for the truth's sake which abideth in us, and it shall be with us for ever: Grace, mercy, peace shall be with us, from God the Father, and from Jesus Christ, the Son of the Father, in truth and love.

4 I rejoice greatly that I have found certain of thy children walking in truth, even as we received commandment from the Father. And now I beseech thee, lady, not as though I wrote to thee a new commandment, but that which we had from the beginning, that we love one another. And this is love, that we should walk after his commandments. This is the commandment, even as ye heard from the beginning, that ye should walk in it. For many deceivers are gone forth into the world, even they that confess not that Jesus Christ cometh in the flesh. This is the deceiver
8 and the antichrist. Look to yourselves, that ye lose not the things which we have wrought, but that ye receive a full reward. Whosoever goeth onward and abideth not in the teaching of Christ, hath not God: he that abideth in the teaching, the same hath both the Father and the Son. If any one cometh unto you, and bringeth not this teaching, receive him not into your house, and give him no greeting: for he that giveth him greeting partaketh in his evil works.
12 Having many things to write unto you, I would not write them with paper and ink: but I hope to come unto you, and to speak face to face, that your joy may be fulfilled. The children of thine elect sister salute thee.

THE THIRD EPISTLE OF ST. JOHN

1 The Elder: Unto Gaius, the beloved, whom I love in truth: Beloved, I pray that in all things thou mayest prosper and be in health, even as thy soul prospereth.

3 For I rejoiced greatly when brethren came and bare witness unto thy truth, even as thou walkest in truth. Greater joy have I none than this, to hear of my children walking in the truth.

Beloved, thou doest a faithful work in whatsoever thou doest toward them that are brethren and strangers withal; who bare witness to thy love before the church; whom thou wilt do well to set forward on their journey worthily of God; because that for the sake of the Name they went forth, taking nothing of the Gentiles. We therefore ought to welcome such, that we may be fellow-workers with the truth.
9 I wrote somewhat unto the church; but Diotrephes, who loveth to have the pre-eminence among them, receiveth us not. Therefore, if I come, I will bring to remembrance his works which he doeth, prating against us with wicked words; and not content therewith, neither doth he himself receive the brethren, and them that would he forbiddeth, and casteth them out of the church. Beloved, imitate not that which is evil, but that which is good. He that doeth good is of God; he that doeth evil hath not seen God. Demetrius hath the witness of all men, and of the truth itself; yea, we also bear witness, and thou knowest that our witness is true.
13 I had many things to write unto thee, but I am unwilling to write them to thee with ink and pen; but I hope shortly to see thee, and we shall speak face to face. Peace be unto thee. The friends salute thee. Salute the friends by name.

I

1 THE BIRTH OF JESUS

18 Now the birth of Jesus Christ was on this wise: When his mother Mary had been betrothed to Joseph, before they came together she was found with child of the Holy Ghost. And Joseph her husband, being a righteous man, and not willing to make her a public example, was minded to put her away privily. But when he thought on these things, behold, an angel of the Lord appeared unto him in a dream, saying, Joseph, thou son of David, fear not to take unto thee Mary thy wife: for that which is conceived in her is of the Holy 21 Ghost. And she shall bring forth a son; and thou shalt call his name Jesus; for it is he that shall 'save' his people from their sins. Now all this is come to pass, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the Lord through the prophet, saying: Behold, the virgin shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son, and they shall call his name 'Immanuel'; which is, being interpreted, 'God with us.' And Joseph arose from his sleep, and did as the angel of the Lord commanded him, and took unto him his wife; and knew her not till she had brought forth a son: and he called his name Jesus.

Now when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judæa in the days of Herod the king, behold, Wise men from the east came to Jerusalem, saying, Where is he that is born King of the Jews? for we saw his star in the east, and are come to worship him. And when Herod the king heard it, he was troubled, and all Jerusalem with him. And gathering together all the chief priests and scribes of the people, he inquired of them where the Christ should 5 be born. And they said unto him, In Bethlehem of Judæa: for thus it is written by the prophet: And thou Bethlehem, land of Judah, art in no wise least among the princes of Judah: for out of thee shall come forth a governor, which shall be shepherd of my people Israel. Then Herod privily called the Wise men, and learned of them 8 carefully what time the star appeared. And he sent them to Bethlehem, and said, Go and search out carefully concerning the young child; and when ye have found him, bring me word, that I also may come and worship him. And they, having heard the king, went their way; and lo, the star, which they saw in the east, went before them, till it came and stood over where the young child was. And when they 11 saw the star, they rejoiced with exceeding great joy. And they came into the house and saw the young child with Mary his mother; and they fell down and worshipped him; and opening their treasures they offered unto him gifts, gold and frankincense and myrrh. And being warned of God in a dream that they should not return to Herod, they departed into their own country another way.

Visit of the Magi—flight into Egypt

13 Now when they were departed, behold, an angel of the Lord appeareth to Joseph in a dream, saying, Arise and take the young child and his mother, and flee into Egypt, and be thou there until I tell thee: for Herod will seek the young child to destroy him. And he arose and took the young child and his mother by night, and 15 departed into Egypt; and was there until the death of Herod: that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the Lord through the prophet, saying, Out of Egypt did I call my son. Then Herod, when he saw that he was mocked of the Wise men, was exceeding wroth, and sent forth, and slew all the male children that were in Bethlehem, and in all the borders thereof, from two years old and under, according 17 to the time which he had carefully learned of the Wise men. Then was fulfilled that which was spoken by Jeremiah the prophet, saying: A voice was heard in Ramah, weeping and great mourning, Rachel weeping for her children; and she would not be comforted, because they are not.

19 But when Herod was dead, behold, an angel of the Lord appeareth in a dream to Joseph in Egypt, saying, Arise and take the young child and his mother, and 20 go into the land of Israel: for they are dead that sought the young child's life. And he arose and took the young child and his mother, and came into the land of Israel.

But when he heard that Archelaus was reigning over Judæa in the room of his father Herod, he was afraid to go thither; and being warned of God in a dream, he withdrew into the parts of Galilee, and came and dwelt in a city called Nazareth: that 23 it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophets, that he should be called a Nazarene.

II

JOHN THE BAPTIST AND THE APPEARANCE OF JESUS IN PUBLIC

And in those days cometh John the Baptist, preaching in the wilderness of Judæa, 3 saying, Repent ye; for the kingdom of heaven is at hand. For this is he that was spoken of by Isaiah the prophet, saying: The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Make ye ready the way of the Lord, make his paths straight. John the Baptist Now John himself had his raiment of camel's hair, and a leathern girdle about his loins; and his food was locusts and wild honey. Then went out unto him 5 Jerusalem, and all Judæa, and all the region round about Jordan; and they were baptized of him in the river Jordan, confessing their sins. But when he saw many of the Pharisees and Sadducees coming to his baptism, he said unto them, Ye offspring of vipers, who warned you to flee from the wrath to come? Bring forth therefore 8 fruit worthy of repentance: and think not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father: for I say unto you, that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham. And even now is the axe laid unto the root of the trees:
every tree therefore that bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire. I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance: but he that cometh after 11 me is mightier than I, whose shoes I am not worthy to bear: he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire: whose fan is in his hand, and he will throughly cleanse his threshing-floor; and he will gather his wheat into the garner, but the chaff he will burn up with unquenchable fire.

Then cometh Jesus from Galilee to the Jordan unto John, to be baptized of him. 13
But John would have hindered him, saying, I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me? But Jesus answering said unto him, Suffer me now: for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness. Then he Baptism of Jesus suffereth him. And Jesus, when he was baptized, went up straightway from the water: and lo, the heavens were opened unto him, and he saw the Spirit of God descending as a dove, and coming upon him; and lo, a voice out of 17 the heavens, saying, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.

Then was Jesus led up of the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil. 4 And when he had fasted forty days and forty nights, he afterward hungered. And the tempter came and said unto him, If thou art the Son of God, command that these stones become bread. But he answered and said, It The Temptation in the wilderness is written, Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. Then the devil taketh him into the holy city; and he set him on the pinnacle of the temple, and saith unto him, 6
If thou art the Son of God, cast thyself down: for it is written,

He shall give his angels charge concerning thee:
And on their hands they shall bear thee up,
Lest haply thou dash thy foot against a stone.

7 Jesus said unto him, Again it is written, Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God. Again, the devil taketh him unto an exceeding high mountain, and sheweth him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them; and he said unto him, All these things 10 will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me. Then saith Jesus unto him, Get thee hence, Satan: for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve. Then the devil leaveth him; and behold, angels came and ministered unto him.
12 Now when he heard that John was delivered up, he withdrew into Galilee; and leaving Nazareth, he came and dwelt in Capernaum, which is by the sea, in the borders of Zebulun and Naphtali: that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Isaiah the prophet, saying:

15 The land of Zebulun and the land of Naphtali,
Toward the sea, beyond Jordan, Galilee of the Gentiles,
The people which sat in darkness
Saw a great light,
And to them which sat in the region and shadow of death,
To them did light spring up.

III

OPENING OF THE MINISTRY OF JESUS AND THE SEVENFOLD DISCOURSE

17 From that time began Jesus to preach, and to say, Repent ye; for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.
And walking by the sea of Galilee, he saw two brethren, Simon who is called Peter, and Andrew his brother, casting a net into the sea; for they were fishers. And he saith unto them. Come ye after me, and I will make you fishers of men. And they 21 straightway left the nets, and followed him. And going on from thence he saw other two brethren, James the son of Zebedee, and John his brother, in the boat with Zebedee their father, mending their nets; and he called them. And they straightway left the boat and their father, and followed him.
23 And Jesus went about in all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom, and healing all manner of disease and all manner of sickness among the people. And the report of him went forth into all Syria: and they brought unto him all that were sick, holden with divers diseases and torments, possessed with devils, and epileptic, and palsied; and he healed them. And there followed him great multitudes from Galilee and Decapolis and Jerusalem and Judæa and from beyond Jordan.
5 And seeing the multitudes, he went up into the mountain: and when he had sat down, his disciples came unto him: and he opened his mouth and taught them, saying:

i

Blessed are the poor in spirit:
For theirs is the kingdom of heaven.

4 Blessed are they that mourn: for they shall be comforted. Blessed are the meek:
for they shall inherit the earth. Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled. Blessed are the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy. Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God. Blessed are the peace-10 makers: for they shall be called sons of God. Blessed are they that have been persecuted for righteousness' sake: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are ye when men shall reproach you, and persecute you, and say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake. Rejoice, and be exeeeding glad: for great is your reward 12 in heaven: for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you.

ii

Ye are the salt of the earth. 13

But if the salt have lost its savour, wherewith shall it be salted? it is thenceforth good for nothing, but to be cast out and trodden under foot of men.

iii

Ye are the light of the world. 14

A city set on a hill cannot be hid. Neither do men light a lamp, and put it under the bushel, but on the stand; and it shineth unto all that are in the house. Even so let your light shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven.

iv

Think not that I came to destroy the law or the prophets: 17
I came not to destroy, but to fulfil.

For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass away, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass away from the law, till all things be accomplished. Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, shall be called least in the kingdom of heaven: but whosoever shall do and teach them, he shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven.

For I say unto you, that except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness 20 of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven. Ye have heard that it was said to them of old time, Thou shalt not kill; and whosoever shall kill shall be in danger of the judgement: but I say unto you, that every one who is angry with his brother shall be in danger of the judgement; and whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be in danger of the council; and whosoever shall say, Thou fool, shall be in danger of the hell of fire. If therefore thou art 23 offering thy gift at the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath aught against thee, leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way, first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift. Agree with thine adversary quickly, whiles thou art with him in the way; lest haply the adversary deliver thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the officer, and thou be cast into prison: verily I say unto thee, Thou shalt by no means come out thence, till thou have paid the last farthing. Ye have heard that it was said, Thou shalt not commit adultery: but I 27 say unto you, that every one that looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart. And if thy right eye causeth thee to stumble, pluck it out, and cast it from thee: for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not thy whole body be cast into hell. And if thy right hand causeth thee to stumble, cut it off, and cast it from thee: for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not thy whole body go into hell. It was said also, 31 Whosoever shall put away his wife, let him give her a writing of divorcement: but I say unto you, that every one that putteth away his wife, saving for the cause of fornication, maketh her an adulteress: and whosoever shall marry her when she is put away committeth adultery. Again, ye have heard that it was said to them of 33 old time, Thou shalt not forswear thyself, but shalt perform unto the Lord thine oaths:

34 but I say unto you, Swear not at all; neither by the heaven, for it is the throne of God, nor by the earth, for it is the footstool of his feet; nor by Jerusalem, for it is the city of the great King; neither shalt thou swear by thy head, for thou canst not make one hair white or black. But let your speech be, Yea, yea; Nay, nay: and whatsoever 38 is more than these is of the evil one. Ye have heard that it was said, An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth: but I say unto you, Resist not him that is evil: but whosoever smiteth thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also. And if any man would go to law with thee, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloke also. And whosoever shall compel thee to go one mile, go with him twain. Give to him that 43 asketh thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away. Ye have heard that it was said, Thou shalt love thy neighbour, and hate thine enemy: but I say unto you, Love your enemies, and pray for them that persecute you; that ye may be sons of your Father which is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to rise on the 46 evil and the good, and sendeth rain on the just and the unjust. For if ye love them that love you, what reward have ye? do not even the publicans the same? And if ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others? do not even the Gentiles the same? Ye therefore shall be perfect, as your heavenly Father is perfect.

6 Take heed that ye do not your righteousness before men, to be seen of them:
Else ye have no reward with your Father which is in heaven.

When therefore thou doest alms, sound not a trumpet before thee, as the hypocrites do in the synagogues and in the streets, that they may have glory of men. Verily 3 I say unto you, They have received their reward. But when thou doest alms, let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth: that thine alms may be in secret:
and thy Father which seeth in secret shall recompense thee. And when ye pray, ye shall not be as the hypocrites: for they love to stand and pray in the synagogues and in the corners of the streets, that they may be seen of men. Verily I say unto 6 you, They have received their reward. But thou, when thou prayest, enter into thine inner chamber, and having shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret, and thy Father which seeth in secret shall recompense thee. And in praying use not vain repetitions, as the Gentiles do: for they think that they shall be heard for their much speaking. Be not therefore like unto them: for your Father knoweth what 9 things ye have need of, before ye ask him. After this manner therefore pray ye:

Our Father which art in heaven:
Hallowed be thy name,
Thy kingdom come,
Thy will be done,
As in heaven, so on earth.

11 Give us this day
Our daily bread.
And forgive us our debts,
As we also have forgiven our debtors.
And bring us not into temptation,
But deliver us from the evil one.

14 For if ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you.
But if ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses. Moreover when ye fast, be not, as the hypocrites, of a sad countenance: for they disfigure their faces, that they may be seen of men to fast. Verily I say unto you, They have received their reward. But thou, when thou fastest, anoint thy head, 17 and wash thy face; that thou be not seen of men to fast, but of thy Father which is in secret: and thy Father, which seeth in secret, shall recompense thee.

vi

Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon the earth, 19
Where moth and rust doth consume,
And where thieves break through and steal:
But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven,
Where neither moth nor rust doth consume,
And where thieves do not break through nor steal.

For where thy treasure is, there will thy heart be also. The lamp of the body is 21 the eye: if therefore thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light; but if thine eye be evil, thy whole body shall be full of darkness; if therefore the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is the darkness! No man can serve two masters:
for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon. Therefore I say unto you, be 25 not anxious for your life, what shall ye eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on. Is not the life more than the food, and the body than the raiment? Behold the birds of the heaven, that they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; and your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are not ye of much more value than they? And which of you by being anxious can add one cubit unto 27 his stature? And why are ye anxious concerning raiment? Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin: yet I say unto you, that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. But if God doth so clothe the grass of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith? Be not therefore anxious, 31 saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed?—for after all these things do the Gentiles seek—for your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things. But seek ye first his kingdom, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you. Be not therefore anxious 34 for the morrow: for the morrow will be anxious for itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.

vii 7

Judge not:
That ye be not judged.

For with what judgement ye judge, ye shall be judged: and with what measure ye 2 mete, it shall be measured unto you. And why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye? Or how wilt thou say to thy brother, Let me cast out the mote out of thine eye; and lo, the beam is in thine own eye? Thou hypocrite, cast out first the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye.

Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, 6
Neither cast your pearls before the swine:
Lest haply they trample them under their feet,
And turn and rend you.

7 Ask, and it shall be given you;
Seek, and ye shall find;
Knock, and it shall be opened unto you:
For every one that asketh receiveth,
And he that seeketh findeth,
And to him that knocketh it shall be opened.

9 Or what man is there of you, who, if his son shall ask him for a loaf, will give him a stone; or if he shall ask for a fish, will give him a serpent? If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that ask him?

12 All things therefore whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, even so do ye also unto them: for this is the law and the prophets.

13 Enter ye in by the narrow gate.

For wide is the gate, and broad is the way, that leadeth to destruction, and many be they that enter in thereby. For narrow is the gate, and straitened the way, that leadeth unto life, and few be they that find it.

15 Beware of false prophets,
Which come to you in sheep's clothing,
But inwardly are ravening wolves.

16 By their fruits ye shall know them. Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles? Even so every good tree bringeth forth good fruit; but the corrupt tree bringeth forth evil fruit. A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit. Every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire. Therefore by their fruits ye shall know them.

21 Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven. Many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, did we not prophesy by thy name, and by thy name cast out devils, and by thy name do many mighty works? And then will I profess 24 unto them, I never knew you: depart from me, ye that work iniquity. Every one therefore which heareth these words of mine, and doeth them, shall be likened unto a wise man, which built his house upon the rock: and the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell not: for it was 26 founded upon the rock. And every one that heareth these words of mine, and doeth them not, shall be likened unto a foolish man, which built his house upon the sand: and the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and smote upon that house; and it fell: and great was the fall thereof.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS: GATHERING OF DISCIPLES AND HINTS 28 OF ANTAGONISM

And it came to pass, when Jesus ended these words, the multitudes were astonished at his teaching: for he taught them as one having authority, and not as their scribes.

And when he was come down from the mountain, great multitudes followed him. 8
And behold, there came to him a leper and worshipped him, saying, Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean. And he stretched forth his hand, and touched him, saying, I will; be thou made clean. And straightway his leprosy was cleansed. And Jesus saith unto him, See thou tell no man; but go thy way, shew thyself to the priest, and offer the gift that Moses commanded, for a testimony unto them.

Gathering of Disciples

And when he was entered into Capernaum, there came unto him a centurion, 5 beseeching him, and saying, Lord, my servant lieth in the house sick of the palsy, grievously tormented. And he saith unto him, I will come and heal him. And the centurion answered and said, Lord, I am not worthy that thou shouldest come under my roof: but only say the word, and my servant shall be healed. For I also am a man under authority, having under myself soldiers: and I say to this one, Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh; and to my servant, Do this, and he doeth it. And when Jesus heard it, he marvelled, and said to them that followed, Verily I say unto you, I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel. And I 11 say unto you, that many shall come from the east and the west, and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven: but the sons of the kingdom shall be cast forth into the outer darkness: there shall be the weeping and gnashing of teeth. And Jesus said unto the centurion, Go thy way; as thou hast believed, so be it done unto thee. And the servant was healed in that hour.

The Centurion and the Sons of the Kingdom

And when Jesus was come into Peter's house, he saw his wife's mother lying sick 14 of a fever. And he touched her hand, and the fever left her; and she arose, and ministered unto him. And when even was come, they brought unto him many possessed with devils: and he cast out the spirits with a word, and healed all that were sick: that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Isaiah the prophet, saying, Himself took our infirmities, and bare our diseases.

Now when Jesus saw great multitudes about him, he gave commandment to 18 depart unto the other side. And there came a scribe, and said unto him, Master, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest. And Jesus saith unto him, The foxes have holes, and the birds of the heaven have nests; but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head. And another of the disciples said unto him, Lord, suffer me first to go and bury my father. But Jesus saith unto him, Follow me; and leave the dead to bury their own dead.

And when he was entered into a boat, his disciples followed him. And behold, 23 there arose a great tempest in the sea, insomuch that the boat was covered with the waves: but he was asleep. And they came to him, and awoke him, saying, Save, Lord; we perish. And he saith unto them, Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith? Then he arose, and rebuked the winds and the sea; and there was a great calm. And the men marvelled, saying, What manner of man is this, that even the winds and the sea obey him?

And when he was come to the other side into the country of the Gadarenes, there 28 met him two possessed with devils, coming forth out of the tombs, exceeding fierce, so that no man could pass by that way. And behold, they cried out, saying, What have we to do with thee, thou Son of God? art thou come hither to torment us before the time? Now there was afar off from them a herd of many swine feeding. And the devils besought him, saying, If thou cast us out, send us away into the herd of swine. And he said unto them, Go. And they came out, and went into the swine: 32 and behold, the whole herd rushed down the steep into the sea, and perished in the waters. And they that fed them fled, and went away into the city, and told everything, and what was befallen to them that were possessed with devils. And behold, all the city came out to meet

A City offended

Jesus: and when they saw him, they besought him that he would depart from their borders.

9 And he entered into a boat, and crossed over, and came into his own city. And behold, they brought to him a man sick of the palsy, lying on a bed: and Jesus seeing their faith said unto the sick of the palsy, Son, be of good cheer; thy sins are forgiven. And behold, certain of the scribes said within themselves, This man blasphemeth. And Jesus knowing their thoughts said, Wherefore think ye evil in your hearts? For whether is easier, to say, Thy sins are 6 forgiven; or to say, Arise, and walk? But that ye may know that the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins (then saith he to the sick of the palsy), Arise, and take up thy bed, and go unto thy house. And he arose, and departed to his house. But when the multitudes saw it, they were afraid, and glorified God, which had given such power unto men.

9 And as Jesus passed by from thence, he saw a man, called Matthew, sitting at the place of toll: and he saith unto him, Follow me. And he arose, and followed him. And it came to pass, as he sat at meat in the house, behold, many publicans and sinners came and sat down with Jesus and his disciples. And when the Pharisees saw it, they said unto his disciples, Why eateth your Master with the publicans and sinners? But when he heard it, he said, They that are whole have no need of a physician, but they that are sick. But go ye and learn what this meaneth, I desire mercy, and not sacrifice: for I came not to call the righteous, but sinners.

14 Then come to him the disciples of John, saying, Why do we and the Pharisees fast oft, but thy disciples fast not? And Jesus said unto them: Can the sons of the bridechamber mourn, as long as the bridegroom is with them? but the days will come, when the bridegroom shall be taken away from them, and then will they fast. And no man putteth a piece of undressed cloth upon an old garment; for that which should fill it up taketh from the garment, and a worse rent is made. Neither do men put new wine into old wine-skins: else the skins burst, and the wine is spilled, and the skins perish: but they put new wine into fresh wine-skins, and both are preserved.

18 While he spake these things unto them, behold, there came a ruler, and worshipped him, saying, My daughter is even now dead: but come and lay thy hand upon her, and she shall live. And Jesus arose, and followed him, and so did his disciples. And behold, a woman, who had an issue of blood twelve years, came behind him, and touched the border of his garment: for she said within herself, If I do but touch his garment, I shall be made whole. But Jesus turning and seeing her said, Daughter, be of good cheer; thy faith hath made thee whole. And the 23 woman was made whole from that hour. And when Jesus came into the ruler's house, and saw the flute-players, and the crowd making a tumult, he said, Give place: for the damsel is not dead, but sleepeth. And they laughed him to scorn. But when the crowd was put forth, he entered in, and took her by the hand; and the damsel arose. And the fame hereof went forth into all that land.

27 And as Jesus passed by from thence, two blind men followed him, crying out, and saying, Have mercy on us, thou son of David. And when he was come into the house, the blind men came to him: and Jesus saith unto them, Believe ye that I am able to do this? They say unto him, Yea, Lord. Then touched he their eyes, saying, According to your faith be it done unto you. And their eyes were opened. And Jesus sternly charged them, saying, See that no man know it. But they went forth, and spread abroad his fame in all that land.

32 And as they went forth, behold, there was brought to him a dumb man possessed with a devil. And when the devil was cast out, the dumb man spake: and the multitudes marvelled, saying, It was never so seen in Israel. But the Pharisees said, By the prince of the devils casteth he out devils.

Opposite impressions of Jesus

ORGANIZATION OF APOSTLES AND THE SEVENFOLD COMMISSION

And Jesus went about all the cities and the villages, teaching in their synagogues, 35 and preaching the gospel of the kingdom, and healing all manner of disease and all manner of sickness. But when he saw the multitudes, he was moved with compassion for them, because they were distressed and scattered, as sheep not having a shepherd. Then saith he unto his disciples, The harvest truly is plenteous, but the labourers are few. Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest, that he send forth labourers into his harvest.

And he called unto him his twelve disciples, and gave them authority over unclean 10 spirits, to cast them out, and to heal all manner of disease and all manner of sickness. Now the names of the twelve apostles are these: The first, Simon, who is called Peter, and Andrew his brother; James the son of Zebedee, and John his brother; Philip, and Bartholomew; Thomas, and Matthew the publican; James the son of Alphæus, and Thaddæus; Simon the Cananæan, and Judas Iscariot, who also betrayed him. These twelve Jesus sent forth, and charged them, saying: 5 Go not into any way of the Gentiles, and enter not into any city of the Samaritans: but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel.

And as ye go, preach, saying, The kingdom of heaven is at hand. Heal the sick, 7 raise the dead, cleanse the lepers, cast out devils.

Freely ye received, freely give.

Get you no gold, nor silver, nor brass in your purses; no wallet for your journey, 9 neither two coats, nor shoes, nor staff: for the labourer is worthy of his food. And into whatsoever city or village ye shall enter, search out who in it is worthy; and there abide till ye go forth. And as ye enter into the house, salute it. And if the house be worthy, let your peace come upon it: but if it be not worthy, let your peace return to you. And whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear your words, as ye 14 go forth out of that house or that city, shake off the dust of your feet. Verily I say unto you, It shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgement, than for that city.

Behold, I send you forth as sheep in the midst of wolves: be ye therefore wise 16 as serpents, and harmless as doves. But beware of men: for they will deliver you up to councils, and in their synagogues they will scourge you; yea and before governors and kings shall ye be brought for my sake, for a testimony to them and to the Gentiles. But when they deliver you up, be not anxious how or what ye shall speak: 19 for it shall be given you in that hour what ye shall speak: for it is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father that speaketh in you. And brother shall deliver up brother to death, and the father his child: and children shall rise up against parents, and cause them to be put to death. And ye shall be hated of all men for my name's 22 sake: but he that endureth to the end, the same shall be saved. But when they persecute you in this city, flee into the next: for verily I say unto you, Ye shall not have gone through the cities of Israel, till the Son of man be come. A disciple is not above his master, nor a servant above his lord; it is enough for the disciple that he be as his master, and the servant as his lord: if they have called the master of the house Beelzebub, how much more shall they call them of his household! Fear them not therefore. For there is nothing covered, that shall not be revealed; and 27 hid, that shall not be known: what I tell you in the darkness, speak ye in the light; and what ye hear in the ear, proclaim upon the housetops. And be not afraid of them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul: but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell. Are not two sparrows sold for a farth-

31 ing? and not one of them shall fall on the ground without your Father: but the very hairs of your head are all numbered. Fear not therefore; ye are of more value than many sparrows. Every one therefore who shall confess me before men, him will I also confess before my Father which is in heaven. But whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father which is in heaven.

34 Think not that I came to send peace on the earth: I came not to send peace, but a sword. For I came to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter in law against her mother in law: and a man's foes shall be they of his own household. He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me; and he that loveth son or daughter more than me is not 38 worthy of me. And he that doth not take his cross and follow after me, is not worthy of me. He that findeth his life shall lose it; and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it.

40 He that receiveth you receiveth me, and he that receiveth me receiveth him that sent me. He that receiveth a prophet in the name of a prophet shall receive a prophet's reward; and he that receiveth a righteous man in the name of a righteous man 42 shall receive a righteous man's reward. And whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only, in the name of a disciple, verily I say unto you, he shall in no wise lose his reward.

11 And it came to pass, when Jesus had made an end of commanding his twelve disciples, he departed thence to teach and preach in their cities.

VI

GROWING ISOLATION OF JESUS AND HIS MINISTRY

2 Now when John heard in the prison the works of the Christ, he sent by his disciples, and said unto him, Art thou he that cometh, or look we for another? And Jesus answered and said unto them, Go your way and tell John the things which ye do hear and see: the blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, and the dead are raised up, and the poor have good
6 tidings preached to them. And blessed is he, whosoever shall find none occasion of stumbling in me. And as these went their way, Jesus began to say unto the multitudes concerning John: What went ye out into the wilderness to behold? a reed shaken with the wind? But what went ye out for to see? a man clothed in soft raiment? Behold, they that wear soft raiment are in kings' houses. But wherefore went ye out? to see a 10 prophet? Yea, I say unto you, and much more than a prophet. This is he, of whom it is written, Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, who shall prepare thy way before thee. Verily I say unto you, Among them that are born of women there hath not arisen a greater than John the Baptist: yet he that is but little in the 12 kingdom of heaven is greater than he. And from the days of John the Baptist until now the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and men of violence take it by force. For all the prophets and the law prophesied until John. And if ye are willing to receive it, this is Elijah, which is to come. He that hath ears to hear, let him hear. But whereunto shall I liken this generation? It is like unto children sitting in the marketplaces, which call unto their fellows, and say, We piped 17 unto you, and ye did not dance; we wailed, and ye did not mourn. For John came neither eating nor drinking, and they say, He hath a devil. The Son of man came eating and drinking, and they say, Behold, a gluttonous man, and a wine-bibber, a friend of publicans and sinners! And wisdom is justified by her children.

Then began he to upbraid the cities wherein most of his mighty works were done, 20 because they repented not. Woe unto thee, Chorazin! woe unto thee, Bethsaida! for if the mighty works had been done in Tyre and Sidon which were done in you, they would have repented long ago in sackcloth and ashes. Howbeit I say unto you, it shall be more tolerable for Tyre and Sidon in the day of judgement than for you. And thou, Capernaum, shalt thou be exalted unto heaven? thou shalt go down unto Hades: for if the mighty works had been done in Sodom which were done in thee, it would have remained until this day. Howbeit I say unto you, that it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom in the day of judgement than for thee.

At that season Jesus answered and said: I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven 25 and earth, that thou didst hide these things from the wise and understanding, and didst reveal them unto babes: yea, Father, for so it was well-pleasing in thy sight. All things have been delivered unto me of my Father: and no one knoweth the Son, save the Father; neither doth any know the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him. Come unto me, all ye that labour and are 28 heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light.

At that season Jesus went on the sabbath day through the cornfields; and his 12 disciples were an hungred, and began to pluck ears of corn, and to eat. But the Pharisees, when they saw it, said unto him, Behold, thy disciples do that which it is not lawful to do upon the sabbath. But he said unto them: Have ye not read what David did, when he was an hungred, and they that were with him, how he entered into the house of God, and did eat the shewbread, which it was not lawful for him to eat, neither for them that were with him; but only for the priests? Or have ye not read in the law, how 5 that on the sabbath day the priests in the temple profane the sabbath, and are guiltless? But I say unto you, that one greater than the temple is here. But if ye had known what this meaneth, I desire mercy, and not sacrifice, ye would not have condemned the guiltless. For the Son of man is lord of the sabbath.

From the Pharisaic Sabbath

And he departed thence, and went into their synagogue: and behold, a man hav- 9 ing a withered hand. And they asked him, saying, Is it lawful to heal on the sabbath day? that they might accuse him. And he said unto them: What man shall there be of you, that shall have one sheep, and if this fall into a pit on the sabbath day, will he not lay hold on it, and lift it out? How much then is a man of more value 12 than a sheep! Wherefore it is lawful to do good on the sabbath day. Then saith he to the man, Stretch forth thy hand. And he stretched it forth; and it was restored whole, as the other.

But the Pharisees went out, and took counsel against him, how they might destroy 14 him. And Jesus perceiving it withdrew from thence: and many followed him; and he healed them all, and charged them that they should not make him known; that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Isaiah the prophet, saying, Behold, my servant whom I have chosen: my beloved in whom my soul is well pleased: I will put my Spirit upon him, and he shall declare judgement to the Gentiles. He shall not strive, nor cry 19 aloud; neither shall any one hear his voice in the streets; a bruised reed shall he not break, and smoking flax shall he not quench, till he send forth judgement unto victory: and in his name shall the Gentiles hope.

22 Then was brought unto him one possessed with a devil, blind and dumb: and he healed him, insomuch that the dumb man spake and saw. And all the multitudes were amazed, and said, Is this the son of David? But when the Pharisees heard it, they said, This man doth not cast out devils, but by Beelzebub the prince of the devils. And knowing their thoughts he said unto them: Every kingdom divided against itself is brought to desola-
26 tion; and every city or house divided against itself shall not stand: and if Satan casteth out Satan, he is divided against himself; how then shall his kingdom stand? And if I by Beelzebub cast out devils, by whom do your sons cast them out? therefore shall they be your judges. But if I by the Spirit of God cast out devils, then is 29 the kingdom of God come upon you. Or how can one enter into the house of the strong man, and spoil his goods, except he first bind the strong man? and then he will spoil his house. He that is not with me is against me; and he that gathereth not with me scattereth. Therefore I say unto you, Every sin and blasphemy shall be 32 forgiven unto men; but the blasphemy against the Spirit shall not be forgiven. And whosoever shall speak a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven him; but whosoever shall speak against the Holy Spirit, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, nor in that which is to come. Either make the tree good, and its fruit good; or make the tree corrupt, and its fruit corrupt: for the tree is known by its fruit. Ye offspring of vipers, how can ye, being evil, speak good things? for out of 35 the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh. The good man out of his good treasure bringeth forth good things: and the evil man out of his evil treasure bringeth forth evil things. And I say unto you, that every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgement. For by thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned.

Open antagonism of the Pharisees

38 Then certain of the scribes and Pharisees answered him, saying, Master, we would see a sign from thee. But he answered and said unto them: An evil and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign; and there shall no sign be given to it but the sign of 41 Jonah the prophet.[1] The men of Nineveh shall stand up in the judgement with this generation, and shall condemn it: for they repented at the preaching of Jonah; and behold, a greater than Jonah is here. The queen of the south shall rise up in the judgement with this generation, and shall condemn it: for she came from the ends of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon; and behold, a greater than Solomon is 43 here. But the unclean spirit, when he is gone out of the man, passeth through waterless places, seeking rest, and findeth it not. Then he saith, I will return into my house whence I came out; and when he is come, he findeth it empty, swept, and garnished. Then goeth he, and taketh with himself seven other spirits more evil than himself, and they enter in and dwell there: and the last state of that man becometh worse than the first. Even so shall it be also unto this evil generation.

46 While he was yet speaking to the multitudes, behold, his mother and his brethren stood without, seeking to speak to him. And one said unto him, Behold, thy mother and thy brethren stand without, seeking to speak to thee. But he answered and said unto him that told him, Who is my mother? and who are my brethren? And he stretched forth his hand towards his disciples, and said, Behold, my mother and my brethren! For whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, he is my brother, and sister, and mother.

[1] For as Jonah was three days and three nights in the belly of the whale, so shall the Son of man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth.

THE PUBLIC PARABLE AND THE PRIVATE INTERPRETATION

On that day went Jesus out of the house, and sat by the sea side. And there were 13 gathered unto him great multitudes, so that he entered into a boat, and sat; and all the multitude stood on the beach. And he spake to them many things in parables, saying:

Behold, the sower went forth to sow; and as he sowed, some seeds fell by the 4 way side, and the birds came and devoured them: and others fell upon the rocky places, where they had not much earth: and straightway they sprang up, because they had no deepness of earth: and when the sun was Seven Parables risen, they were scorched; and because they had no root, they withered away. And others fell upon the thorns; and the thorns grew up, and 7 choked them: and others fell upon the good ground, and yielded fruit, some a hundredfold, some sixty, some thirty. He that hath ears, let him hear.

And the disciples came, and said unto him, Why speakest thou unto them in parables? And he answered and said unto them: Unto you it is given to know 11 the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it is not given. For whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have abundance: but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away even that which he hath. Therefore speak I to them in parables; because seeing they see not, and hearing they hear not, neither do they understand. And unto them is fulfilled the prophecy of Isaiah, which saith: By 14 hearing ye shall hear, and shall in no wise understand; and seeing ye shall see, and shall in no wise perceive: for this people's heart is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes they have closed; lest haply they should perceive with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and should turn again, and I should heal them. But blessed are your eyes, for they see; and your ears, for they 10 hear. For verily I say unto you, that many prophets and righteous men desired to see the things which ye see, and saw them not; and to hear the things which ye hear, and heard them not. Hear then ye the parable of the sower. When any one heareth the word of the kingdom, and understandeth it not, then cometh the evil one, and snatcheth away that which hath been sown in his heart. This is he that was sown by the way side. And he that was sown upon the rocky places, this is he 20 that heareth the word, and straightway with joy receiveth it; yet hath he not root in himself, but endureth for a while; and when tribulation or persecution ariseth because of the word, straightway he stumbleth. And he that was sown among the thorns, this is he that heareth the word; and the care of the world, and the deceit-fulness of riches, choke the word, and he becometh unfruitful. And he that was 22 sown upon the good ground, this is he that heareth the word, and understandeth it; who verily beareth fruit, and bringeth forth, some a hundredfold, some sixty, some thirty.

Another parable set he before them, saying: The kingdom of heaven is likened 24 unto a man that sowed good seed in his field: but while men slept, his enemy came and sowed tares also among the wheat, and went away. But when the blade sprang up, and brought forth fruit, then appeared the tares also. And the servants of the householder came and said unto him, Sir, didst thou not sow good seed in thy field? whence then hath it tares? And he said unto them, An enemy hath done this. And the servants say unto him, Wilt thou then that we go and gather them 29 up? But he saith, Nay; lest haply while ye gather up the tares, ye root up the wheat with them. Let both grow together until the harvest: and in the time of the harvest I will say to the reapers, Gather up first the tares, and bind them in bundles to burn them: but gather the wheat into my barn.

31 Another parable set he before them, saying: The kingdom of heaven is like unto a grain of mustard seed, which a man took, and sowed in his field: which indeed is less than all seeds; but when it is grown, it is greater than the herbs, and becometh a tree, so that the birds of the heaven come and lodge in the branches thereof.

33 Another parable spake he unto them: The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven, which a woman took, and hid in three measures of meal, till it was all leavened.

34 All these things spake Jesus in parables unto the multitudes; and without a parable spake he nothing unto them: that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, saying,

I will open my mouth in parables;
I will utter things hidden from the foundation of the world.

36 Then he left the multitudes, and went into the house: and his disciples came unto him, saying, Explain unto us the parable of the tares of the field. And he answered and said: He that soweth the good seed is the Son of man; and the field is the world; and the good seed, these are the sons of the kingdom; and the tares are the sons of the evil one; and the enemy that sowed them is the devil: and the harvest is the 40 end of the world; and the reapers are angels. As therefore the tares are gathered up and burned with fire; so shall it be in the end of the world. The Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that cause stumbling, and them that do iniquity, and shall cast them into the furnace 43 of fire: there shall be the weeping and gnashing of teeth. Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father. He that hath ears, let him hear.

44 The kingdom of heaven is like unto a treasure hidden in the field; which a man found, and hid; and in his joy he goeth and selleth all that he hath, and buyeth that field.

Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto a man that is a merchant seeking goodly pearls: and having found one pearl of great price, he went and sold all that he had, and bought it.

47 Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto a net, that was cast into the sea, and gathered of every kind: which, when it was filled, they drew up on the beach; and they sat down, and gathered the good into vessels, but the bad they cast away.
So shall it be in the end of the world: the angels shall come forth, and sever the wicked from among the righteous, and shall cast them into the furnace of fire: there shall be the weeping and gnashing of teeth.

51 Have ye understood all these things? They say unto him, Yea. And he said unto them: Therefore every scribe who hath been made a disciple to the kingdom of heaven is like unto a man that is a householder, which bringeth forth out of his treasure things new and old.

THE GREATER MIRACLES AND THE GROWING ANTAGONISM

And it came to pass, when Jesus had finished these parables, he departed thence. 53
And coming into his own country he taught them in their synagogue, insomuch that they were astonished, and said, Whence hath this man this wisdom, and these mighty works? Is not this the carpenter's son? is not his mother called Mary? and his brethren, James, and Joseph, and Simon, and Judas? And his sisters, are they not all with us? Whence then hath this man all these things? And they were offended in him. But Jesus said unto them, A prophet is not without honour, save in his own country, and in his own house. And he did not many mighty works there because of their unbelief.

His own country offended

At that season Herod the tetrarch heard the report concerning Jesus, and said 14 unto his servants, This is John the Baptist; he is risen from the dead; and therefore do these powers work in him. For Herod had laid hold on John, and bound him, and put him in prison for the sake of Herodias, his brother Philip's wife; for John said unto him, It is not lawful for thee to have her. And when he would have put him to death, he feared the multitude, because they counted him as a prophet. But 6 when Herod's birthday came, the daughter of Herodias danced in the midst, and pleased Herod; whereupon he promised with an oath to give her whatsoever she should ask. And she, being put forward by her mother, saith, Give me here in a charger the head of John the Baptist. And the king was grieved; but for the sake 9 of his oaths, and of them which sat at meat with him, he commanded it to be given; and he sent, and beheaded John in the prison. And his head was brought in a charger, and given to the damsel: and she brought it to her mother. And his disciples came, and took up the corpse, and buried him; and they went and told Jesus.

Now when Jesus heard it, he withdrew from thence in a boat, to a desert place 13
apart: and when the multitudes heard thereof, they followed him on foot from the cities. And he came forth, and saw a great multitude, and he had compassion on them, and healed their sick. And when even was come, the disciples came to him, saying, The place is desert, and the time is already past; send the multitudes away, that they may go into the villages, and buy themselves food. But Jesus said unto 16 them, They have no need to go away; give ye them to eat. And they say unto him, We have here but five loaves, and two fishes. And he said, Bring them hither to me. And he commanded the multitudes to sit down on the grass; and he took the five loaves, and the two fishes, and looking up to heaven, he blessed, and brake and gave the loaves to the disciples, and the disciples to the multitudes. And they did all eat, and were filled: and they took up that which remained 20 over of the broken pieces, twelve baskets full. And they that did eat were about five thousand men, beside women and children.

A miracle of feeding

And straightway he constrained the disciples to enter into the boat, and to go before him unto the other side, till he should send the multitudes away. And after 23 he had sent the multitudes away, he went up into the mountain apart to pray: and when even was come, he was there alone. But the boat was now in the midst of the sea, distressed by the waves; for the wind was contrary. And in the fourth watch of the night he came unto them, walking upon the sea. And when the disciples saw him walking on the sea, they were troubled, saying, It is an apparition; and they cried out for fear. But straightway Jesus spake unto 27 them, saying, Be of good cheer; it is I; be not afraid. And Peter answered him and said, Lord, if it be thou, bid me come unto thee upon the waters. And he said, Come. And Peter went down from the boat, and walked upon the waters, to come

A miracle on the sea

30 to Jesus. But when he saw the wind, he was afraid; and beginning to sink, he cried out, saying, Lord, save me. And immediately Jesus stretched forth his hand, and took hold of him, and saith unto him, O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt? And when they were gone up into the boat, the wind ceased. And they that were in the boat worshipped him, saying, Of a truth thou art the Son of God

34 And when they had crossed over, they came to the land, unto Gennesaret. And when the men of that place knew him, they sent into all that region round about, and brought unto him all that were sick; and they besought him that they might only touch the border of his garment: and as many as touched were made whole.

15 Then there come to Jesus from Jerusalem Pharisees and scribes, saying, Why do thy disciples transgress the Tradition of the Elders? for they wash not their hands when they eat bread. And he answered and said unto them: Why do ye also transgress the commandment of God because of your tradition? For God said, Honour thy father and thy mother: and, He that speaketh evil of father or mother, let him die the death. But ye say, Whosoever shall say to his father or his mother, That wherewith thou mightest have been profited 6 by me is given to God; he shall not honour his father. And ye have made void the word of God because of your tradition. Ye hypocrites, well did Isaiah prophesy of you, saying: This people honoureth me with their lips; but their heart is far from me. But 9 in vain do they worship me, teaching as their doctrines the precepts of men. And he called 11 to him the multitude, and said unto them: Hear, and understand: Not that which entereth into the mouth defileth the man; but that which proceedeth out of the mouth, this defileth the man. Then came the disciples, and said unto him, Knowest thou that the Pharisees were offended, when they heard this saying? But he answered and said, Every plant which my heavenly Father planted not, shall be rooted up. 14 Let them alone: they are blind guides. And if the blind guide the blind, both shall fall into a pit. And Peter answered and said unto him, Declare unto us the parable. And he said: Are ye also even yet without understanding? Perceive ye not, that whatsoever goeth into the mouth passeth into the belly, and is cast out into the 18 draught? But the things which proceed out of the mouth come forth out of the heart; and they defile the man. For out of the heart come forth evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, railings: these are the things which defile the man: but to eat with unwashen hands defileth not the man.

Attack on the Tradition of the Elders

21 And Jesus went out thence, and withdrew into the parts of Tyre and Sidon. And behold, a Canaanitish woman came out from those borders, and cried, saying, Have mercy on me, O Lord, thou son of David; my daughter is grievously vexed with a devil. But he answered her not a word. And his disciples came and besought him, saying, Send her away; for she crieth after us. But he answered and said, I was not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel. 25 But she came and worshipped him, saying, Lord, help me. And he answered and said, It is not meet to take the children's bread and cast it to the dogs. But she said, Yea, Lord: for even the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their masters' table. Then Jesus answered and said unto her, O woman, great is thy faith: be it done unto thee even as thou wilt. And her daughter was healed from that hour.

A Canaanitish woman

29 And Jesus departed thence, and came nigh unto the sea of Galilee; and he went up into the mountain, and sat there. And there came unto him great multitudes, having with them the lame, blind, dumb, maimed, and many others, and they cast them down at his feet; and he healed them: insomuch that the multitude wondered, when they saw the dumb speaking, the maimed whole, and the lame walking, and the blind seeing: and they glorified the God of Israel.

32 And Jesus called unto him his disciples, and said, I have compassion on the multitude, because they continue with me now three days and have nothing to eat:

and I would not send them away fasting, lest haply they faint in the way. And the 33 disciples say unto him, Whence should we have so many loaves in a desert place, as to fill so great a multitude? And Jesus saith unto them, A miraculous feeding and How many loaves have ye? And they said, Seven, and a few small fishes.
And he commanded the multitude to sit down on the ground; and he took the seven loaves and the fishes; and he gave thanks and brake, and gave to the disciples, and the disciples to the multitudes. And they did all eat, and were filled: and 37 they took up that which remained over of the broken pieces, seven baskets full. And they that did eat were four thousand men, beside women and children. And he sent away the multitudes, and entered into the boat, and came into the borders of Magadan.

And the Pharisees and Sadducees came, and tempting him asked him to shew 16 them a sign from heaven. But he answered and said unto them: When it is evening, ye say, It will be fair weather: for the heaven is red. And in the morning, It will be foul weather to-day: for the heaven is red and Pharisaic 'Leaven' lowring. Ye know how to discern the face of the heaven; but ye cannot discern the signs of the times. An evil and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign; and there shall no sign be given unto it, but the sign of Jonah. And he left them, and departed.

And the disciples came to the other side and forgot to take bread. And Jesus 5 said unto them, Take heed and beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees.
And they reasoned among themselves, saying, We took no bread. And Jesus perceiving it said: O ye of little faith, why reason ye among yourselves, because ye have no bread? Do ye not yet perceive, neither remember the five loaves of the five thousand, and how many baskets ye took up? Neither the seven loaves of the four thousand, and how many baskets ye took up? How is it that ye do not perceive that I spake 11 not to you concerning bread? But beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees. Then understood they how that he bade them not beware of the leaven of bread, but of the teaching of the Pharisees and Sadducees.

FULLER RECOGNITION BY THE DISCIPLES OF THE KINGDOM AND QUESTIONS ARISING THEREUPON

Now when Jesus came into the parts of Cæsarea Philippi, he asked his disciples, 13 saying, Who do men say that the Son of man is? And they said, Some say John the Baptist; some, Elijah: and others, Jeremiah, or one of the prophets.
He saith unto them, But who say ye that I am? And Simon Peter an- Cæsarea: Recognition of the Christ swered and said, Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God. And Jesus answered and said unto him: Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-Jonah:
for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven.
And I also say unto thee, that thou art 'Peter,' and upon this 'rock' I will build my 18 church; and the gates of Hades shall not prevail against it. I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven. Then charged he the disciples that they should tell no man that he was the Christ.

From that time began Jesus to shew unto his disciples, how that he must go unto 21
Jerusalem, and suffer many things of the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and the third day be raised up. And Peter took him, and began to rebuke him, 22 saying, Be it far from thee, Lord: this shall never be unto thee. But he and Revelation of his Sufferings turned, and said unto Peter, Get thee behind me, Satan: thou art a stumblingblock unto me: for thou mindest not the things of God, but the things of men. Then said Jesus unto his disciples: If any man would come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me. For whosoever would save his life shall lose it: and whosoever shall lose his life for my sake shall 26 find it. For what shall a man be profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and forfeit his life? or what shall a man give in exchange for his life? For the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father with his angels; and then shall he render unto every man according to his deeds. Verily I say unto you, There be some of them that stand here, which shall in no wise taste of death, till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom.

17 And after six days Jesus taketh with him Peter, and James, and John his brother, and bringeth them up into a high mountain apart: and he was transfigured before them: and his face did shine as the sun, and his garments became white as the light.
The Transfiguration
And behold, there appeared unto them Moses and Elijah talking with him. And Peter answered, and said unto Jesus, Lord, it is good for us to be here: if thou wilt, I will make here three tabernacles; one for thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elijah. While he was yet speaking, behold, a bright 5 cloud overshadowed them: and behold, a voice out of the cloud, saying, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; hear ye him. And when the disciples heard it, they fell on their face, and were sore afraid. And Jesus came and touched them and said, Arise, and be not afraid. And lifting up their eyes, they saw no one, save Jesus only.

9 And as they were coming down from the mountain, Jesus commanded them, saying, Tell the vision to no man, until the Son of man be risen from the dead. And his disciples asked him, saying, Why then say the scribes that Elijah must first come? And he answered and said: Elijah indeed cometh, and shall restore all 12 things: but I say unto you, that Elijah is come already, and they knew him not, but did unto him whatsoever they listed. Even so shall the Son of man also suffer of them. Then understood the disciples that he spake unto them of John the Baptist.

14 And when they were come to the multitude, there came to him a man, kneeling to him, and saying, Lord, have mercy on my son: for he is epileptic, and suffereth grievously: for oft-times he falleth into the fire, and oft-times into the water. And I brought him to thy disciples, and they could not cure him. And Jesus answered and said, O faithless and perverse generation, how long shall I be with you? how 18 long shall I bear with you? bring him hither to me. And Jesus rebuked him; and the devil went out from him: and the boy was cured from that hour. Then came the disciples to Jesus apart, and said, Why could not we cast it out? And he saith unto them, Because of your little faith. For verily I say unto you, If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place; and it shall remove; and nothing shall be impossible unto you.

22 And while they abode in Galilee, Jesus said unto them, The Son of man shall be delivered up into the hands of men; and they shall kill him, and the third day he shall be raised up. And they were exceeding sorry.

24 And when they were come to Capernaum, they that received the half-shekel came Galilee: Questions of the kingdom to Peter, and said, Doth not your master pay the half-shekel? He saith, Yea. And when he came into the house, Jesus spake first to him, saying, What thinkest thou, Simon? the kings of the earth, from whom do they receive toll or tribute? from their sons, or from strangers? And when he said, From strangers, Jesus said unto him, Therefore the sons are free.

But, lest we cause them to stumble, go thou to the sea, and cast a hook, and take up 27 the fish that first cometh up; and when thou hast opened his mouth, thou shalt find a shekel: that take, and give unto them for me and thee.

In that hour came the disciples unto Jesus, saying, Who then is greatest in the 18 kingdom of heaven? And he called to him a little child, and set him in the midst of them, and said: Verily I say unto you, Except ye turn, and become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven. Whosoever therefore shall humble himself as this little child, the same is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven. And whoso shall receive one such little child in my name receiveth me: but 5 whoso shall cause one of these little ones which believe on me to stumble, it is profitable for him that a great millstone should be hanged about his neck, and that he should be sunk in the depth of the sea. Woe unto the world because of occasions of stumbling! for it must needs be that the occasions come; but woe to that man through whom the occasion cometh! And if thy hand or thy foot causeth thee to 8 stumble, cut it off, and cast it from thee: it is good for thee to enter into life maimed or halt, rather than having two hands or two feet to be cast into the eternal fire.
And if thine eye causeth thee to stumble, pluck it out, and cast it from thee: it is good for thee to enter into life with one eye, rather than having two eyes to be cast into the hell of fire. See that ye despise not one of these little ones; for I say 10 unto you, that in heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father which is in heaven. How think ye? if any man have a hundred sheep, and one of them be gone astray, doth he not leave the ninety and nine, and go unto the mountains, and seek that which goeth astray? And if so be that he find it, verily 13
I say unto you, he rejoiceth over it more than over the ninety and nine which have not gone astray. Even so it is not the will of your Father which is in heaven, that one of these little ones should perish.

And if thy brother sin against thee, go, shew him his fault between thee and him 15 alone: if he hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother. But if he hear thee not, take with thee one or two more, that at the mouth of two witnesses or three every word may be established. And if he refuse to hear them, tell it unto the church: and if he refuse to hear the church also, let him be unto thee as the Gentile and the publican. Verily I say unto you, What things soever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and what things soever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven. Again I say unto you, 19 that if two of you shall agree on earth as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father which is in heaven. For where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them.

Treatment of sin in the kingdom

Then came Peter, and said to him, Lord, how oft shall my brother sin against me, and I forgive him? until seven times? Jesus saith unto him, I say not unto thee, Until seven times; but, Until seventy times and seven. Therefore is the kingdom of 23 heaven likened unto a certain king, which would make a reckoning with his servants.
And when he had begun to reckon, one was brought unto him, which owed him ten thousand talents. But forasmuch as he had not wherewith to pay, his lord commanded him to be sold, and his wife, and children, and all that he had, and payment to be made. The servant therefore fell down and worshipped him, saying, Lord, have patience with me, and I will pay thee all. And the lord of that servant, being moved with compassion, released him, 27 and forgave him the debt. But that servant went out, and found one of his fellow-servants, which owed him a hundred pence: and he laid hold on him, and took him by the throat, saying, Pay what thou owest. So his fellow-servant fell down and besought him, saying, Have patience with me, and I will pay thee. And he 30 would not: but went and cast him into prison, till he should pay that which was due. So when his fellow-servants saw what was done, they were exceeding sorry,

Parable of the Fellow-Servants

32 and came and told unto their lord all that was done. Then his lord called him unto him, and saith to him, Thou wicked servant, I forgave thee all that debt, because thou besoughtest me: shouldest not thou also have had mercy on thy fellow-servant, even as I had mercy on thee? And his lord was wroth, and delivered him to the tormentors, till he should pay all that was due. So shall also my heavenly Father do unto you, if ye forgive not every one his brother from your hearts.

19 And it came to pass when Jesus had finished these words, he departed from Galilee, and came into the borders of Judæa beyond Jordan; and great multitudes followed him; and he healed them there.

Beyond Jordan: more questions

And there came unto him Pharisees, tempting him, and saying, Is it lawful for a 4 man to put away his wife for every cause? And he answered and said: Have ye not read, that he which made them from the beginning made them male and female, and said, For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife; and the twain shall become one flesh? So that they are no more twain, but one flesh. What therefore 7 God hath joined together, let not man put asunder. They say unto him, Why then did Moses command to give a bill of divorcement, and to put her away? He saith unto them: Moses for your hardness of heart suffered you to put away your wives: but from the beginning it hath not been so. And I say unto you, Whosoever shall put away his wife, except for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth 10 adultery: and he that marrieth her when she is put away committeth adultery. The disciples say unto him, If the case of the man is so with his wife, it is not expedient to marry. But he said unto them: All men cannot receive this saying, but they to whom it is given. For there are eunuchs, which were so born from their mother's womb: and there are eunuchs, which were made eunuchs by men: and there are eunuchs, which made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake. He that is able to receive it, let him receive it.

13 Then were there brought unto him little children, that he should lay his hands on them, and pray: and the disciples rebuked them. But Jesus said, Suffer the little children, and forbid them not, to come unto me: for of such is the kingdom of heaven. And he laid his hands on them, and departed thence.

16 And behold, one came to him and said, Master, what good thing shall I do, that I may have eternal life? And he said unto him, Why askest thou me concerning that which is good? One there is who is good: but if thou wouldest enter into life, keep the commandments. He saith unto him, Which? And Jesus said, Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not bear false witness, Honour thy father and thy mother: and, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as 20 thyself. The young man saith unto him, All these things have I observed: what lack I yet? Jesus said unto him, If thou wouldest be perfect, go, sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and come, follow me. But when the young man heard the saying, he went away sorrowful: for he was one that had great possessions.

23 And Jesus said unto his disciples: Verily I say unto you, It is hard for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven. And again I say unto you, It is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God. And when the disciples heard it, they were astonished exceedingly, saying, Who then can be saved? And Jesus looking upon them said to them, With men this is impossible; but with God all things are possible. Then answered Peter and said unto him, Lo, we have left all, and 28 followed thee; what then shall we have? And Jesus said unto them: Verily I say unto you, that ye which have followed me, in the regeneration when the Son of man shall sit on the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. And every one that hath left houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or children, or lands, for my name's sake, shall receive a hundredfold, and shall inherit eternal life. But many shall be last that are first; and first that are last. For the kingdom of heaven is like unto a 20 man that is a householder, which went out early in the morning to hire labourers into his vineyard. And when he had agreed with the labourers for a penny a day, he sent them into his vineyard. And he went out about the third hour, and saw others standing in the marketplace idle; and to them he said, Go ye also into the vineyard, and whatsoever is right I will give you. And they went their way. Again he went out about the sixth and the ninth hour, and did likewise. 5

And about the eleventh hour he went out, and found others standing; and he saith unto them, Why stand ye here all the day idle? They say unto him, Because no man hath hired us. He saith unto them, Go ye also into the vineyard. And when even was come, the lord of the vineyard saith unto his steward, Call the labourers, and pay them their hire, beginning from the last unto the first. And when they came that 9 were hired about the eleventh hour, they received every man a penny. And when the first came, they supposed that they would receive more; and they likewise received every man a penny. And when they received it, they murmured against the householder, saying, These last have spent but one hour, and thou hast made them equal unto us, which have borne the burden of the day and the scorching heat. But he 13 answered and said to one of them, Friend, I do thee no wrong: didst not thou agree with me for a penny? Take up that which is thine, and go thy way; it is my will to give unto this last, even as unto thee. Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own? or is thine eye evil, because I am good? So the last shall be first, and the first last.

Parable of the Hired Labourers

And as Jesus was going up to Jerusalem, he took the twelve disciples apart, and 17 in the way he said unto them, Behold, we go up to Jerusalem; and the Son of man shall be delivered unto the chief priests and scribes; and they shall condemn him to death, and shall deliver him unto the Gentiles to mock, and to scourge, and to crucify: and the third day he shall be raised up.

Journey to Jerusalem

Then came to him the mother of the sons of Zebedee with her sons, worshipping him, and asking a certain thing of him. And he said unto her, What wouldest thou? 21
She saith unto him, Command that these my two sons may sit, one on thy right hand, and one on thy left hand, in thy kingdom. But Jesus answered and said, Ye know not what ye ask. Are ye able to drink the cup that I am about to drink? They say unto him, We are able. He saith unto them, My cup indeed ye shall drink: but to sit on my right hand, and on my left hand, is not mine to give, but it is for them for whom it hath been prepared of my Father. And when the ten heard it, they were 24 moved with indignation concerning the two brethren. But Jesus called them unto him, and said: Ye know that the rulers of the Gentiles lord it over them, and their great ones exercise authority over them. Not so shall it be among you: but whosoever would become great among you shall be your minister; and whosoever would be first among you shall be your servant: even as the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many.

Lordship in the kingdom is service

And as they went out from Jericho, a great multitude followed him. And behold, 29 two blind men sitting by the way side, when they heard that Jesus was passing by, cried out, saying, Lord, have mercy on us, thou son of David. And the multitude rebuked them, that they should hold their peace: but they cried out the more, saying, Lord, have mercy on us, thou son of David. And Jesus stood still, and called them, and said, What will ye that I should do unto you? They say unto him, Lord, that 33 our eyes may be opened. And Jesus, being moved with compassion, touched their eyes: and straightway they received their sight, and followed him.

ENTRY INTO JERUSALEM AND FINAL BREACH WITH THE RULING CLASSES

A Royal Entry

21 And when they drew nigh unto Jerusalem, and came unto Bethphage, unto the mount of Olives, then Jesus sent two disciples, saying unto them, Go into the village that is over against you, and straightway ye shall find an ass tied, and a colt with her: loose them, and bring them unto me. And if any one say aught unto you, ye shall say, The Lord hath need of them; and 4 straightway he will send them. Now this is come to pass, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, saying:

Tell ye the daughter of Zion,
Behold, thy King cometh unto thee,
Meek, and riding upon an ass,
And upon a colt the foal of an ass.

6 And the disciples went, and did even as Jesus appointed them, and brought the ass, and the colt, and put on them their garments; and he sat thereon. And the most part of the multitude spread their garments in the way; and others cut branches from the trees, and spread them in the way. And the multitudes that went before him, and that followed, cried, saying, 'Hosanna to the son of David' — 'Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord' — 'Hosanna in the highest.' And when he was come into Jerusalem, all the city was stirred, saying, Who is this? And the multitudes said, This is the prophet, Jesus, from Nazareth of Galilee.

Cleansing of the Temple

12 And Jesus entered into the temple of God, and cast out all them that sold and bought in the temple, and overthrew the tables of the money-changers, and the seats of them that sold the doves; and he saith unto them, It is written, My house shall be called a house of prayer: but ye make it a den of robbers. And the blind and the lame came to him in the temple: and he healed them.
15 But when the chief priests and the scribes saw the wonderful things that he did, and the children that were crying in the temple and saying, 'Hosanna to the son of David'; they were moved with indignation, and said unto him, Hearest thou what these are saying? And Jesus saith unto them, Yea: did ye never read, Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings thou hast perfected praise? And he left them, and went forth out of the city to Bethany, and lodged there.

Incident of the Fig Tree

18 Now in the morning as he returned to the city, he hungered. And seeing a fig tree by the way side, he came to it, and found nothing thereon, but leaves only; and he saith unto it, Let there be no fruit from thee henceforward for ever. And immediately the fig tree withered away. And when the disciples saw it, they marvelled, saying, How did the fig tree immediately wither 21 away? And Jesus answered and said unto them: Verily I say unto you, If ye have faith, and doubt not, ye shall not only do what is done to the fig tree, but even if ye shall say unto this mountain, Be thou taken up and cast into the sea, it shall be done. And all things, whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive.

The Authority of Jesus challenged

23 And when he was come into the temple, the chief priests and the elders of the people came unto him as he was teaching, and said, By what authority doest thou these things? and who gave thee this authority? And Jesus answered and said unto them, I also will ask you one question, which if ye tell me, I likewise will tell you by what authority I do these things 25 The baptism of John, whence was it? from heaven or from men? And they reasoned with themselves, saying, If we shall say, From heaven; he will say unto us, Why then did ye not believe him? But if we shall say, From men; we fear the 26 multitude; for all hold John as a prophet. And they answered Jesus, and said, We know not. He also said unto them, Neither tell I you by what authority I do these things.

But what think ye? A man had two sons; and he came to the first, and said, Son, 28 go work to-day in the vineyard. And he answered and said, I will not: but afterward he repented himself, and went. And he came to the second, and said likewise. And he answered and said, I go, sir: and went not. Whether of the twain did the will of his father? They say, The first. Jesus saith unto them: Verily I say unto you, that the publicans and the harlots go into the kingdom of God before you. For John came unto you in the way of 32 righteousness, and ye believed him not: but the publicans and the harlots believed him: and ye, when ye saw it, did not even repent yourselves afterward, that ye might believe him.

Parable of Two Sons

Hear another parable: There was a man that was a householder, which planted 33 a vineyard, and set a hedge about it, and digged a winepress in it, and built a tower, and let it out to husbandmen, and went into another country. And when the season of the fruits drew near, he sent his servants to the husbandmen, to receive his fruits. And the husbandmen took his servants, and beat one, and killed another, and stoned another. Again, he sent other servants more than the first: and they did unto them in like manner. But afterward he sent unto them his son, saying, They will reverence my son. But the husband- 38 men, when they saw the son, said among themselves, This is the heir; come, let us kill him, and take his inheritance. And they took him, and cast him forth out of the vineyard, and killed him. When therefore the lord of the vineyard shall come, what will he do unto those husbandmen? They say unto him, He will miserably destroy those miserable men, and will let out the vineyard unto other husbandmen, which shall render him the fruits in their seasons. Jesus saith unto them, Did ye 42 never read in the scriptures,

The same was made the head of the corner:
This was from the Lord,
And it is marvellous in our eyes?

Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken away from you, and 43 shall be given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof. And he that falleth on this stone shall be broken to pieces: but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will scatter him as dust.

And when the chief priests and the Pharisees heard his parables, they perceived that he spake of them. And when they sought to lay hold on him, they feared the multitudes, because they took him for a prophet.

And Jesus answered and spake again in parables unto them, saying: The kingdom 22 of heaven is likened unto a certain king, which made a marriage feast for his son, and sent forth his servants to call them that were bidden to the marriage feast: and they would not come. Again he sent forth other servants, saying, Tell them that are bidden, Behold, I have made ready my dinner: my oxen and my fatlings are killed, and all things are ready: come to the marriage feast. But they made light of it, and went their ways, one to his 5 own farm, another to his merchandise: and the rest laid hold on his servants, and entreated them shamefully, and killed them. But the king was wroth; and he sent his armies, and destroyed those murderers, and burned their city. Then saith he

Parable of the Marriage Feast

to his servants, The wedding is ready, but they that were bidden were not worthy.
9 Go ye therefore unto the partings of the highways, and as many as ye shall find, bid to the marriage feast. And those servants went out into the highways, and gathered together all as many as they found, both bad and good: and the wedding was filled with guests. But when the king came in to behold the guests, he saw there a man 12 which had not on a wedding-garment: and he saith unto him, Friend, how camest thou in hither not having a wedding-garment? And he was speechless. Then the king said to the servants, Bind him hand and foot, and cast him out into the outer darkness; there shall be the weeping and gnashing of teeth. For many are called, but few chosen.

15 Then went the Pharisees, and took counsel how they might ensnare him in his talk. And they send to him their disciples, with the Herodians, saying, Master, we know that thou art true, and teachest the way of God in truth, and Clash with religious leaders carest not for any one: for thou regardest not the person of men. Tell us therefore, What thinkest thou? Is it lawful to give tribute unto Cæsar, or not? But Jesus perceived their wickedness, and said, Why tempt ye 19 me, ye hypocrites? Shew me the tribute money. And they brought unto him a penny. And he saith unto them, Whose is this image and superscription? They say unto him, Cæsar's. Then saith he unto them, Render therefore unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's; and unto God the things that are God's. And when they heard it, they marvelled, and left him, and went their way.

23 On that day there came to him Sadducees, which say that there is no resurrection:
and they asked him, saying, Master, Moses said, If a man die, having no children, his brother shall marry his wife, and raise up seed unto his brother. Now there were with us seven brethren: and the first married and deceased, and having no seed left his wife unto his brother; in like manner the second also, and the third, unto the seventh. And after them all the woman died. In the resurrection therefore whose 29 wife shall she be of the seven? for they all had her. But Jesus answered and said unto them: Ye do err, not knowing the scriptures, nor the power of God. For in the resurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are as angels in heaven. But as touching the resurrection of the dead, have ye not read that which was spoken unto you by God, saying, I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob? God is not the God of the dead, but of the living. And when the multitudes heard it, they were astonished at his teaching.

34 But the Pharisees, when they heard that he had put the Sadducees to silence, gathered themselves together. And one of them, a lawyer, asked him a question, tempting him, Master, which is the great commandment in the law? And he said unto him: Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the great and first commandment. And a second like unto it is this, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. On these two commandments hangeth the whole law, and the prophets.

41 Now while the Pharisees were gathered together, Jesus asked them a question, saying, What think ye of the Christ? whose son is he? They say unto him, The son of David. He saith unto them, How then doth David in the Spirit call him Lord, saying,

44 The Lord said unto my Lord,
Sit thou on my right hand,
Till I put thine enemies underneath thy feet?

If David then calleth him Lord, how is he his son? And no one was able to answer him a word, neither durst any man from that day forth ask him any more questions.

23 Then spake Jesus to the multitudes and to his disciples, saying: The scribes and the Pharisees sit on Moses' seat: all things therefore whatsoever they bid you, these do and observe: but do not ye after their works; for they say, and do not. Yea, they 4 bind heavy burdens and grievous to be borne, and lay them on men's shoulders; but they themselves will not move them with their finger. But all their works they do for to be seen of men: for they make broad their phylac- The Seven-fold Denunciation teries, and enlarge the borders of their garments, and love the chief place at feasts, and the chief seats in the synagogues, and the salutations in the marketplaces, and to be called of men, Rabbi. But be not ye called 8 Rabbi: for one is your teacher, and all ye are brethren. And call no man your father on the earth: for one is your Father, which is in heaven. Neither be ye called masters: for one is your master, even the Christ. But he that is greatest among you shall be your servant. And whosoever shalt exalt himself shall be humbled; and whosoever shall humble himself shall be exalted.

But woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! because ye shut the kingdom 13 of heaven against men: for ye enter not in yourselves, neither suffer ye them that are entering in to enter.

Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye compass sea and land to 15 make one proselyte; and when he is become so, ye make him twofold more a son of hell than yourselves.

Woe unto you, ye blind guides, which say, Whosoever shall swear by the temple, 16 it is nothing; but whosoever shall swear by the gold of the temple, he is a debtor.
Ye fools and blind: for whether is greater, the gold, or the temple that hath sanctified the gold? And, Whosoever shall swear by the altar, it is nothing; but whosoever shall swear by the gift that is upon it, he is a debtor. Ye blind: for whether is greater, the gift, or the altar that sanctifieth the gift? He therefore that sweareth 20 by the altar, sweareth by it, and by all things thereon. And he that sweareth by the temple, sweareth by it, and by him that dwelleth therein. And he that sweareth by the heaven, sweareth by the throne of God, and by him that sitteth thereon.

Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye tithe mint and anise 23 and cummin, and have left undone the weightier matters of the law, judgement, and mercy, and faith: but these ye ought to have done, and not to have left the other undone. Ye blind guides, which strain out the gnat, and swallow the camel.

Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye cleanse the outside of 25 the cup and of the platter, but within they are full from extortion and excess. Thou blind Pharisee, cleanse first the inside of the cup and of the platter, that the outside thereof may become clean also.

Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye are like unto whited 27 sepulchres, which outwardly appear beautiful, but inwardly are full of dead men's bones, and of all uncleanness. Even so ye also outwardly appear righteous unto men, but inwardly ye are full of hypocrisy and iniquity.

Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye build the sepulchres of 29 the prophets, and garnish the tombs of the righteous, and say, If we had been in the days of our fathers, we should not have been partakers with them in the blood of the prophets. Wherefore ye witness to yourselves, that ye are sons of them that slew the prophets. Fill ye up then the measure of your fathers. Ye serpents, ye offspring 33 of vipers, how shall ye escape the judgement of hell? "Therefore, behold, I send unto you prophets, and wise men, and scribes: some of them shall ye kill and crucity; and some of them shall ye scourge in your synagogues, and persecute from city to city: that upon you may come all the righteous blood shed on the earth, from the 35 blood of Abel the righteous unto the blood of Zachariah son of Barachiah, whom ye slew between the sanctuary and the altar." Verily I say unto you, All these things shall come upon this generation.

O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, which killeth the prophets, and stoneth them that are 37 sent unto her! how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen

38 gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not! Behold, your house is left unto you desolate. For I say unto you, Ye shall not see me henceforth, till ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord.

DISCOURSE TO THE DISCIPLES: THE SEVENFOLD REVELATION OF THE END

24 And Jesus went out from the temple, and was going on his way; and his disciples came to him to shew him the buildings of the temple. But he answered and said unto them, See ye not all these things? verily I say unto you, There shall not be left here one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down.

3 And as he sat on the mount of Olives, the disciples came unto him privately, saying, Tell us, when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world? And Jesus answered and said unto them:

5 Take heed that no man lead you astray. For many shall come in my name, saying, I am the Christ; and shall lead many astray. And ye shall hear of wars and rumours of wars: see that ye be not troubled: for these things must needs come to pass; but the end is not yet. For nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom: and there shall be famines and earthquakes in divers places. But all these things 9 are the beginning of travail. Then shall they deliver you up unto tribulation, and shall kill you: and ye shall be hated of all the nations for my name's sake. And then shall many stumble, and shall deliver up one another, and shall hate one another. And many false prophets shall arise, and shall lead many astray. And because iniquity shall be multiplied, the 13 love of the many shall wax cold. But he that endureth to the end, the same shall be saved. And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in the whole world for a testimony unto all the nations; and then shall the end come.

Every tribulation is not the End

ii

15 When therefore ye see the abomination of desolation, which was spoken of by Daniel the prophet, standing in the holy place (let him that readeth understand), then let them that are in Judæa flee unto the mountains: let him that is on the housetop not go down to take out the things that are in his house: and let him that is in the field not return back to take his cloke. But woe unto them that are with child and to them that give suck in those days! And pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on a sabbath: for then shall be great tribulation, such as hath not been from the beginning of 22 the world until now, no, nor ever shall be. And except those days had been shortened, no flesh would have been saved: but for the elect's sake those days shall be shortened. Then if any man shall say unto you, Lo, here is the Christ, or, Here; believe it not. For there shall arise false Christs, and false prophets, and shall shew great signs and wonders; so as to lead astray, if possible, even the elect. Behold, 26 I have told you beforehand. If therefore they shall say unto you, Behold, he is in the wilderness; go not forth: Behold, he is in the inner chambers; believe it not. For as the lightning cometh forth from the east, and is seen even unto the west; so shall be the coming of the Son of man. Wheresoever the carcase is, there will the eagles be gathered together.

The tribulation of Judæa

iii

But immediately, after the tribulation of those days, the sun shall be darkened, 29 and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken: and then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven: and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming on the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. And he shall send forth his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other.

The Coming of the Son of Man

iv

Now from the fig tree learn her parable: when her branch is now become tender, 32 and putteth forth its leaves, ye know that the summer is nigh; even so ye also, when ye see all these things, know ye that it is nigh, even at the doors. Verily I say unto you, This generation shall not pass away, till all these things be accomplished. Heaven 35 and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away. But of that day and hour knoweth no one, not even the angels of heaven, neither the Son, but the Father only. And as were the days of Noah, so shall be the coming of the Son of man. For as in those days which were before the flood they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noah entered into the ark, and they knew not until the flood came, and took them all away; so shall be the coming of the Son of man. Then shall two men be in the field; one is taken, and one is left: two women 40 shall be grinding at the mill; one is taken, and one is left.

The one foreshadowed by tokens, the other will be sudden

Watch therefore: for ye know not on what day your Lord cometh. But know 42 this, that if the master of the house had known in what watch the thief was coming, he would have watched, and would not have suffered his house to be broken through. Therefore be ye also ready: for in an hour that ye think not the Son of man cometh. Who then is the faithful and wise servant, whom his lord hath set over his household, to give them their food in due season? Blessed is that servant, whom his lord when he cometh shall find so doing: verily I say unto you, that he will set him over all 47 that he hath. But if that evil servant shall say in his heart, My lord tarrieth; and shall begin to beat his fellow-servants, and shall eat and drink with the drunken; the lord of that servant shall come in a day when he expecteth not, and in an hour when he knoweth not, and shall cut him asunder, and appoint his portion with the hypocrites: there shall be the weeping and gnashing of teeth.

Watchfulness: Parable of the Virgins:

Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins, which took their 25 lamps, and went forth to meet the bridegroom. And five of them were foolish, and five were wise. For the foolish, when they took their lamps, took no oil with them: but the wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps. Now while the bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered and slept. But at midnight there is a cry, Behold, 6 the bridegroom! Come ye forth to meet him. Then all those virgins arose, and trimmed their lamps. And the foolish said unto the wise, Give us of your oil; for our lamps are going out. But the wise answered, saying, Peradventure there will not be enough for us and you: go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves.
And while they went away to buy, the bridegroom came; and they that were ready 10 went in with him to the marriage feast: and the door was shut. Afterward come also the other virgins, saying, Lord, Lord, open to us. But he answered and said, 13 Verily I say unto you, I know you not. Watch therefore, for ye know not the day nor the hour.

vi

14 For it is as when a man, going into another country, called his own servants, and delivered unto them his goods. And unto one he gave five talents, to another two, to another one; to each according to his several ability; and he went on his journey. Straightway he that received the five talents went and traded with them, and made other five talents. In like manner he also that received the two gained other two. But he that received the 19 one went away and digged in the earth, and hid his lord's money. Now after a long time the lord of those servants cometh, and maketh a reckoning with them. And he that received the five talents came and brought other five talents, saying, Lord, thou deliveredst unto me five talents: lo, I have gained other five talents. His lord said unto him, Well done, good and faithful servant: thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will set thee over many things: enter thou into the 22 joy of thy lord. And he also that received the two talents came and said, Lord, thou deliveredst unto me two talents: lo, I have gained other two talents. His lord said unto him, Well done, good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will set thee over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy lord. And he also that had received the one talent came and said, Lord, I knew thee that thou art a hard man, reaping where thou didst not sow, and gathering where thou didst not scatter: and I was afraid, and went away and hid thy talent in the 26 earth: lo, thou hast thine own. But his lord answered and said unto him, Thou wicked and slothful servant, thou knewest that I reap where I sowed not, and gather where I did not scatter; thou oughtest therefore to have put my money to the bankers, and at my coming I should have received back mine own with interest. Take ye away therefore the talent from him, and give it unto him that hath the 29 ten talents. For unto every one that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance: but from him that hath not, even that which he hath shall be taken away. And cast ye out the unprofitable servant into the outer darkness: there shall be the weeping and gnashing of teeth.

Parable of the Talents

31 But when the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the angels with him, then shall he sit on the throne of his glory: and before him shall be gathered all the nations: and he shall separate them one from another, as the shepherd separateth the sheep from the goats: and he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left. Then shall the King say unto them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared 35 for you from the foundation of the world: for I was an hungred, and ye gave me meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink: I was a stranger, and ye took me in; naked, and ye clothed me: I was sick, and ye visited me: I was in prison, and ye came unto me. Then shall the righteous answer him, saying, Lord, when saw we thee an hungred, and fed thee? or athirst, and gave thee drink? And when saw 39 we thee a stranger, and took thee in? or naked, and clothed thee? And when saw we thee sick, or in prison, and came unto thee? And the King shall answer and say unto them, Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of these my brethren, even these least, ye did it unto me. Then shall he say also unto them on the left hand, Depart from me, ye cursed, into the eternal fire which is prepared for 42 the devil and his angels: for I was an hungred, and ye gave me no meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me no drink: I was a stranger, and ye took me not in; naked, and ye clothed me not; sick, and in prison, and ye visited me not. Then shall they also answer, saying, Lord, when saw we thee an hungred, or athirst, or a stranger, or naked, or sick, or in prison, and did not minister unto thee? Then shall he 45 answer them, saying, Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye did it not unto one of these least, ye did it not unto me. And these shall go away into eternal punishment:

but the righteous into eternal life.

THE PASSION AND RESURRECTION OF JESUS

And it came to pass, when Jesus had finished all these words, he said unto his 26 disciples, Ye know that after two days the Passover cometh, and the Son of man is delivered up to be crucified. Then were gathered together the chief priests, and the elders of the people, unto the court of the high priest, Preparation for the End who was called Caiaphas; and they took counsel together that they might take Jesus by subtilty, and kill him. But they said, Not during the feast, lest a tumult arise among the people.

Now when Jesus was in Bethany, in the house of Simon the leper, there came unto 6 him a woman having an alabaster cruse of exceeding precious ointment, and she poured it upon his head, as he sat at meat. But when the disciples saw it, they had indignation, saying, To what purpose is this waste? For this ointment might have been sold for much, and given to the poor. But Jesus perceiving it said unto them, Why trouble ye the woman? for she hath wrought a good work upon me. For ye 11 have the poor always with you; but me ye have not always. For in that she poured this ointment upon my body, she did it to prepare me for burial. Verily I say unto you, Wheresoever this gospel shall be preached in the whole world, that also which this woman hath done shall be spoken of for a memorial of her.

Then one of the twelve, who was called Judas Iscariot, went unto the chief priests, 14 and said, What are ye willing to give me, and I will deliver him unto you? And they weighed unto him thirty pieces of silver. And from that time he sought opportunity to deliver him unto them.

Now on the first day of unleavened bread the disciples came to Jesus, saying, 17
Where wilt thou that we make ready for thee to eat the Passover? And he said, Go into the city to such a man, and say unto him, The Master saith,
My time is at hand; I keep the Passover at thy house with my disciples. The Last Supper
And the disciples did as Jesus appointed them; and they made ready the Passover. Now when even was come, he was sitting at meat with the twelve 20 disciples; and as they were eating, he said, Verily I say unto you, that one of you shall betray me. And they were exceeding sorrowful, and began to say unto him every one, Is it I, Lord? And he answered and said, He that dipped his hand with me in the dish, the same shall betray me. The Son of man goeth, even as it is 24 written of him: but woe unto that man through whom the Son of man is betrayed!
good were it for that man if he had not been born. And Judas, which betrayed him, answered and said, Is it I, Rabbi? He saith unto him, Thou hast said. And as they were eating, Jesus took bread, and blessed, and brake it; and he gave to the disciples, and said, Take, eat; this is my body. And he took a cup, and gave 27 thanks, and gave to them, saying, Drink ye all of it; for this is my blood of the covenant, which is shed for many unto remission of sins. But I say unto you, I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom.

And when they had sung a hymn, they went out unto the mount of Olives.

Then saith Jesus unto them, All ye shall be offended in me this night: for it is 31 written, I will smite the shepherd, and the sheep of the flock shall be scattered abroad.

32 But after I am raised up, I will go before you into Galilee. But Peter answered and said unto him, If all shall be offended in thee, I will never be offended. Jesus said unto him, Verily I say unto thee, that this night, before the cock crow, thou shalt deny me thrice. Peter saith unto him, Even if I must die with thee, yet will I not deny thee. Likewise also said all the disciples.

36 Then cometh Jesus with them unto a place called Gethsemane, and saith unto his disciples, Sit ye here, while I go yonder and pray. And he took with him Peter and the two sons of Zebedee, and began to be sorrowful and sore troubled. Then saith he unto them, My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death: abide ye here, and watch with me. And he went forward a little, and fell on his face, and prayed, saying, O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass away from me: nevertheless, 40 not as I will, but as thou wilt. And he cometh unto the disciples, and findeth them sleeping, and saith unto Peter, What, could ye not watch with me one hour? Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation: the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak. Again a second time he went away, and prayed, saying, O my Father if this cannot pass away, except I drink it, thy will be done. And he came again 44 and found them sleeping, for their eyes were heavy. And he left them again, and went away, and prayed a third time, saying again the same words. Then cometh he to the disciples, and saith unto them, Sleep on now, and take your rest: behold, the hour is at hand, and the Son of man is betrayed unto the hands of sinners. Arise, let us be going: behold, he is at hand that betrayeth me.

47 And while he yet spake, lo, Judas, one of the twelve, came, and with him a great multitude with swords and staves, from the chief priests and elders of the people. Now he that betrayed him gave them a sign, saying, Whomsoever I shall kiss, that is he: take him. And straightway he came to Jesus, and said, Hail, Rabbi; and kissed him. And Jesus said unto him, Friend, do that for which thou art come. 51 Then they came and laid hands on Jesus, and took him. And behold, one of them that were with Jesus stretched out his hand, and drew his sword, and smote the servant of the high priest, and struck off his ear. Then saith Jesus unto him, Put up again thy sword into its place: for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword. Or thinkest thou that I cannot beseech my Father, and he shall even 54 now send me more than twelve legions of angels? How then should the scriptures be fulfilled, that thus it must be? In that hour said Jesus to the multitudes, Are ye come out as against a robber with swords and staves to seize me? I sat daily in the temple teaching, and ye took me not. But all this is come to pass, that the scriptures of the prophets might be fulfilled. Then all the disciples left him, and fled.

57 And they that had taken Jesus led him away to the house of Caiaphas the high priest, where the scribes and the elders were gathered together. But Peter followed him afar off, unto the court of the high priest, and entered in, and sat with the officers, to see the end. Now the chief priests and the whole council sought false witness against Jesus, that they might put him to death; and they found it not, though many false witnesses came. But afterward came two, and said, This man said, I am able to destroy the temple of God, 62 and to build it in three days. And the high priest stood up, and said unto him, Answerest thou nothing? what is it which these witness against thee? But Jesus held his peace. And the high priest said unto him, I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou be the Christ, the Son of God. Jesus saith unto him, Thou hast said: nevertheless I say unto you, Henceforth ye shall see the Son of man sitting at the right hand of power, and coming on the clouds of heaven. 65 Then the high priest rent his garments, saying, He hath spoken blasphemy: what further need have we of witnesses? behold, now ye have heard the blasphemy what think ye? They answered and said, He is worthy of death. Then did they spit in his face and buffet him: and some smote him with the palms of their hands, saying, Prophesy unto us, thou Christ: who is he that struck thee?

69 Now Peter was sitting without in the court: and a maid came unto him, saying, Thou also wast with Jesus the Galilæan. But he denied before them all, saying, I know not what thou sayest. And when he was gone out into the porch, another maid saw him, and saith unto them that were there, This man also was with Jesus the Nazarene. And again he denied with an oath, I know not the man. And 73 after a little while they that stood by came and said to Peter, Of a truth thou also art one of them; for thy speech bewrayeth thee. Then began he to curse and to swear, I know not the man. And straightway the cock crew. And Peter remembered the word which Jesus had said, Before the cock crow, thou shalt deny me thrice. And he went out, and wept bitterly.

27 Now when morning was come, all the chief priests and the elders of the people took counsel against Jesus to put him to death: and they bound him, and led him away, and delivered him up to Pilate the governor.

3 Then Judas, which betrayed him, when he saw that he was condemned, repented himself, and brought back the thirty pieces of silver to the chief priests and elders, saying, I have sinned in that I betrayed innocent blood. But they said, What is that to us? see thou to it. And he cast down the pieces of silver into the sanctuary, and departed; and he went away and hanged himself. And the chief priests took the pieces of silver, and said, It is not lawful to put them into the treasury, since it is the price of blood. And they took counsel, and bought with them the potter's 7 field, to bury strangers in. Wherefore that field was called, The field of blood, unto this day. Then was fulfilled that which was spoken by Jeremiah the prophet, saying, And they took the thirty pieces of silver, the price of him that was priced, whom certain of the children of Israel did price; and they gave them for the potter's field, as the Lord appointed me.

11 Now Jesus stood before the governor: and the governor asked him, saying, Art thou the King of the Jews? And Jesus said unto him, Thou sayest. And when he was accused by the chief priests and elders, he answered nothing. Then saith Pilate unto him, Hearest thou not how many things they witness against thee? And he gave him no answer, not even to one word: insomuch that the governor marvelled greatly. Now at the feast the governor was 15 wont to release unto the multitude one prisoner, whom they would. And they had then a notable prisoner, called Barabbas. When therefore they were gathered together, Pilate said unto them, Whom will ye that I release unto you? Barabbas, or Jesus which is called Christ? For he knew that for envy they had delivered him up. And while he was sitting on the judgement-seat, his wife sent unto him, 19 saying, Have thou nothing to do with that righteous man: for I have suffered many things this day in a dream because of him. Now the chief priests and the elders persuaded the multitudes that they should ask for Barabbas, and destroy Jesus. 21 But the governor answered and said unto them, Whether of the twain will ye that I release unto you? And they said, Barabbas. Pilate saith unto them, What then shall I do unto Jesus which is called Christ? They all say, Let him be crucified. And he said, Why, what evil hath he done? But they cried out exceedingly, saying, Let him be crucified. So when Pilate saw that he prevailed nothing, but rather 24 that a tumult was arising, he took water, and washed his hands before the multitude, saying, I am innocent of the blood of this righteous man: see ye to it. And all the people answered and said, His blood be on us, and on our children. Then released he unto them Barabbas: but Jesus he scourged and delivered to be crucified.

The Trial before Pilate

27 Then the soldiers of the governor took Jesus into the palace, and gathered unto 28 him the whole band. And they stripped him, and put on him a scarlet robe. And they plaited a crown of thorns and put it upon his head, and a reed in his right hand; and they kneeled down before him, and mocked him, saying, Hail, King of the Jews! And they spat upon him, and took the reed and smote him on the head. And when they had mocked him, they took off from him the robe, and put on him his garments, and led him away to crucify him.

The Crucifixion

32 And as they came out, they found a man of Cyrene, Simon by name: him they compelled to go with them, that he might bear his cross. And when they were come unto a place called Golgotha, that is to say, The place of a skull, they gave him wine to drink mingled with gall: and when he had tasted it, he would not drink. And when they had crucified him, they parted his garments among them, casting lots:
37 and they sat and watched him there. And they set up over his head his accusation written:

This is Jesus
The King of the Jews

38 Then are there crucified with him two robbers, one on the right hand, and one on the left. And they that passed by railed on him, wagging their heads, and saying, Thou that destroyest the temple, and buildest it in three days, save thyself: if thou art the Son of God, come down from the cross. In like manner also the chief priests
42 mocking him, with the scribes and elders, said, He saved others; himself he cannot save. He is the King of Israel; let him now come down from the cross, and we will believe on him. He trusteth on God; let him deliver him now, if he desireth him: for he said, I am the Son of God. And the robbers also that were crucified with him cast upon him the same reproach.

45 Now from the sixth hour there was darkness over all the land until the ninth hour. And about the ninth hour Jesus cried with a loud voice, saying, Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani? that is, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? And some of them that stood there, when they heard it, said, This man calleth Elijah.
49 And straightway one of them ran, and took a sponge, and filled it with vinegar, and put it on a reed, and gave him to drink. And the rest said, Let be; let us see whether Elijah cometh to save him. And Jesus cried again with a loud voice, and yielded up his spirit. And behold, the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom; and the earth did quake; and the rocks were rent; and the tombs were opened; and many bodies of the saints that had fallen asleep were raised.
54 and coming forth out of the tombs after his resurrection they entered into the holy city and appeared unto many. Now the centurion, and they that were with him watching Jesus, when they saw the earthquake, and the things that were done, feared exceedingly, saying, Truly this was the Son of God. And many women were there beholding from afar, which had followed Jesus from Galilee, ministering unto him: among whom was Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James and Joses, and the mother of the sons of Zebedee.

57 And when even was come, there came a rich man from Arimathæa, named Joseph, who also himself was Jesus' disciple: this man went to Pilate, and asked for the body of Jesus. Then Pilate commanded it to be given up. And Joseph took the body, and wrapped it in a clean linen cloth, and laid it in his own new tomb, which he had hewn out in the rock: and he rolled a great stone to the door of the tomb, and departed. And Mary Magdalene was there, and the other Mary, sitting over against the sepulchre.

62 Now on the morrow, which is the day after the Preparation, the chief priests and the Pharisees were gathered together unto Pilate, saying, Sir, we remember that that deceiver said, while he was yet alive, After three days I rise again Com- 64

mand therefore that the sepulchre be made sure until the third day, lest haply his disciples come and steal him away, and say unto the people, He is risen from the dead: and the last error will be worse than the first. Pilate said unto them, Ye have a guard: go your way, make it as sure as ye can. So they went, and made the sepulchre sure, sealing the stone, the guard being with them.

Now late on the sabbath day, as it began to dawn toward the first day of the 28 week, came Mary Magdalene and the other Mary to see the sepulchre. And behold, there was a great earthquake; for an angel of the Lord descended from heaven, and came and rolled away the stone, and sat upon it. His appearance was as lightning, and his raiment white as snow: and for fear of him the watchers did quake, and became as dead men. And the angel answered and said unto the women, Fear not ye: for I know that ye seek Jesus, which hath been crucified. He is not here; for he is risen, even as he said. 6 Come, see the place where the Lord lay. And go quickly, and tell his disciples, He is risen from the dead; and lo, he goeth before you into Galilee; there shall ye see him: lo, I have told you. And they departed quickly from the tomb with fear and great joy, and ran to bring his disciples word. And behold, Jesus met them, 9 saying, All hail. And they came and took hold of his feet, and worshipped him. Then saith Jesus unto them, Fear not: go tell my brethren that they depart into Galilee, and there shall they see me.

The Resurrection and Ascension

Now while they were going, behold, some of the guard came into the city, and 11 told unto the chief priests all the things that were come to pass. And when they were assembled with the elders, and had taken counsel, they gave large money unto the soldiers, saying, Say ye, His disciples came by night, and stole him away while we slept. And if this come to the governor's ears, we will persuade him, and 14 rid you of care. So they took the money, and did as they were taught: and this saying was spread abroad among the Jews, and continueth until this day.

But the eleven disciples went into Galilee, unto the mountain where Jesus had appointed them. And when they saw him, they worshipped him: but some doubted. And Jesus came to them and spake unto them, saying: All authority hath been given 18 unto me in heaven and on earth. Go ye therefore, and make disciples of all the nations, baptizing them into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I commanded you: and lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world.

The Gospel of St. Mark

1 THE GOSPEL OF JESUS CHRIST, THE SON OF GOD

2 Even as it is written in Isaiah the prophet,

Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, who shall prepare thy way;

3 The voice of one crying in the wilderness,
Make ye ready the way of the Lord,
Make his paths straight;

4 John came, who baptized in the wilderness and preached the baptism of repentance unto remission of sins. And there went out unto him all the country of Judæa, and all they of Jerusalem; and they were baptized of him in the river Jordan, confessing their sins. And John was clothed with camel's hair, and had a leathern 7 girdle about his loins, and did eat locusts and wild honey. And he preached, saying, There cometh after me he that is mightier than I, the latchet of whose shoes I am not worthy to stoop down and unloose. I baptized you with water; but he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost.

9 And it came to pass in those days, that Jesus came from Nazareth of Galilee, and was baptized of John in the Jordan. And straightway coming up out of the water, he saw the heavens rent asunder, and the Spirit as a dove descending upon him:
and a voice came out of the heavens, Thou art my beloved Son, in thee I am well pleased.

12 And straightway the Spirit driveth him forth into the wilderness. And he was in the wilderness forty days tempted of Satan; and he was with the wild beasts; and the angels ministered unto him.

14 Now after that John was delivered up, Jesus came into Galilee, preaching the gospel of God, and saying, The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand:
repent ye, and believe in the gospel.

16 And passing along by the sea of Galilee, he saw Simon and Andrew the brother of Simon casting a net in the sea: for they were fishers. And Jesus said unto them, Come ye after me, and I will make you to become fishers of men. And straightway they left the nets, and followed him. And going on a little further, he saw James the son of Zebedee, and John his brother, who also were in the boat mending the nets. And straightway he called them: and they left their father Zebedee in the boat with the hired servants, and went after him.

21 And they go into Capernaum; and straightway on the sabbath day he entered into the synagogue and taught. And they were astonished at his teaching: for he taught them as having authority, and not as the scribes. And straightway there was in their synagogue a man with an unclean spirit; and he cried out, saying, What have we to do with thee, thou Jesus of Nazareth? art thou come to destroy us?
25 I know thee who thou art, the Holy One of God. And Jesus rebuked him, saying, Hold thy peace, and come out of him. And the unclean spirit, tearing him and crying with a loud voice, came out of him. And they were all amazed, insomuch that they questioned among themselves, saying, What is this? a new teaching! with authority he commandeth even the unclean spirits, and they obey him. And the report of him went out straightway everywhere into all the region of Galilee round about.

And straightway, when they were come out of the synagogue, they came into 29
the house of Simon and Andrew, with James and John. Now Simon's wife's mother lay sick of a fever; and straightway they tell him of her: and he came and took her by the hand, and raised her up; and the fever left her, and she ministered unto them.

And at even, when the sun did set, they brought unto him all that were sick, 32 and them that were possessed with devils. And all the city was gathered together at the door. And he healed many that were sick with divers diseases, and cast out many devils; and he suffered not the devils to speak, because they knew him.

And in the morning, a great while before day, he rose up and went out, and 35 departed into a desert place, and there prayed. And Simon and they that were with him followed after him; and they found him, and say unto him, All are seeking thee. And he saith unto them, Let us go elsewhere into the next towns, that I may preach there also; for to this end came I forth. And he went into their syna- 39 gogues throughout all Galilee, preaching and casting out devils.

And there cometh to him a leper, beseeching him, and kneeling down to him, 40 and saying unto him, If thou wilt, thou canst make me clean. And being moved with compassion, he stretched forth his hand, and touched him, and saith unto him, I will; be thou made clean. And straightway the leprosy departed from him, and he was made clean. And he sternly charged him, and straightway sent him out, 43 and saith unto him, See thou say nothing to any man: but go thy way, shew thyself to the priest, and offer for thy cleansing the things which Moses commanded, for a testimony unto them. But he went out, and began to publish it much, and to spread abroad the matter, insomuch that Jesus could no more openly enter into a city, but was without in desert places: and they came to him from every quarter.

And when he entered again into Capernaum after some days, it was noised that 2
he was in the house. And many were gathered together, so that there was no longer room for them, no, not even about the door: and he spake the word unto them. And they come, bringing unto him a man sick of the palsy, borne of four. And when they could not come nigh unto him for the crowd, they uncovered the roof where he was: and when they had broken it up, they let down the bed whereon the sick of the palsy lay. And Jesus seeing their faith saith unto the sick of the 5 palsy, Son, thy sins are forgiven. But there were certain of the scribes sitting there, and reasoning in their hearts, Why doth this man thus speak? he blasphemeth: who can forgive sins but one, even God? And straightway Jesus, perceiving in his spirit that they so reasoned within themselves, saith unto them, Why reason ye these things in your hearts? Whether is easier, to say to the sick of the palsy, Thy sins are forgiven; or to say, Arise, and take up thy bed, and walk? But that ye 10 may know that the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins (he saith to the sick of the palsy), I say unto thee, Arise, take up thy bed, and go unto thy house. And he arose, and straightway took up the bed, and went forth before them all; insomuch that they were all amazed, and glorified God, saying, We never saw it on this fashion.

And he went forth again by the sea side; and all the multitude resorted unto 13 him, and he taught them. And as he passed by, he saw Levi the son of Alphæus sitting at the place of toll, and he saith unto him, Follow me. And he arose and followed him. And it came to pass, that he was sitting at meat in his house, and many publicans and sinners sat down with Jesus and his disciples: for there were 16 many, and they followed him. And the scribes of the Pharisees, when they saw that he was eating with the sinners and publicans, said unto his disciples, He eateth and drinketh with publicans and sinners. And when Jesus heard it, he saith unto them: They that are whole have no need of a physician, but they that are sick: I came not to call the righteous, but sinners.

18 And John's disciples and the Pharisees were fasting: and they come and say unto him, Why do John's disciples and the disciples of the Pharisees fast, but thy disciples fast not? And Jesus said unto them: Can the sons of the bride-chamber fast, while the bridegroom is with them? as long as they have the bridegroom with them, they cannot fast. But the days will come, when the bridegroom shall be taken 21 away from them, and then will they fast in that day. No man seweth a piece of undressed cloth on an old garment: else that which should fill it up taketh from it, the new from the old, and a worse rent is made. And no man putteth new wine into old wine-skins: else the wine will burst the skins, and the wine perisheth, and the skins: but they put new wine into fresh wine-skins.

23 And it came to pass, that he was going on the sabbath day through the corn-fields; and his disciples began, as they went, to pluck the ears of corn. And the Pharisees said unto him, Behold, why do they on the sabbath day that which is not lawful? And he said unto them: Did ye never read what David did, when he had
26 need, and was an hungred, he, and they that were with him? How he entered into the house of God when Abiathar was high priest, and did eat the shewbread, which it is not lawful to eat save for the priests, and gave also to them that were with him? And he said unto them, The sabbath was made for man, and not man for the sabbath: so that the Son of man is lord even of the sabbath.

3 And he entered again into the synagogue; and there was a man there which had his hand withered. And they watched him, whether he would heal him on the sabbath day; that they might accuse him. And he saith unto the man that had his hand withered, Stand forth. And he saith unto them, Is it lawful on the sabbath day to do good, or to do harm? to save a life, or to kill? But they held their peace.
5 And when he had looked round about on them with anger, being grieved at the hardening of their heart, he saith unto the man, Stretch forth thy hand. And he stretched it forth: and his hand was restored. And the Pharisees went out, and straightway with the Herodians took counsel against him, how they might destroy him.

7 And Jesus with his disciples withdrew to the sea: and a great multitude from Galilee followed: and from Judæa, and from Jerusalem, and from Idumæa, and beyond Jordan, and about Tyre and Sidon, a great multitude, hearing what great things he did, came unto him. And he spake to his disciples, that a little boat should 10 wait on him because of the crowd, lest they should throng him: for he had healed many; insomuch that as many as had plagues pressed upon him that they might touch him. And the unclean spirits, whensoever they beheld him, fell down before him, and cried, saying, Thou art the Son of God. And he charged them much that 13 they should not make him known. And he goeth up into the mountain, and calleth unto him whom he himself would: and they went unto him. And he appointed twelve, that they might be with him, and that he might send them forth to preach, and to have authority to cast out devils: and Simon he surnamed Peter; and James the son of Zebedee, and John the brother of James; and them he surnamed Boanerges, 18 which is, Sons of thunder: and Andrew, and Philip, and Bartholomew, and Matthew and Thomas, and James the son of Alphæus, and Thaddæus, and Simon the Cananæan; and Judas Iscariot, which also betrayed him.

And he cometh into a house. And the multitude cometh together again, so that 20 they could not so much as eat bread. And when his friends heard it, they went out to lay hold on him: for they said, He is beside himself. And the scribes which came down from Jerusalem said, He hath Beelzebub, and, By the prince of the devils casteth he out the devils. And he called them unto him, and said unto them in parables: How can Satan cast out Satan? And if a kingdom be divided against 24 itself, that kingdom cannot stand. And if a house be divided against itself, that house will not be able to stand. And if Satan hath risen up against himself, and is divided, he cannot stand, but hath an end. But no one can enter into the house of the strong man, and spoil his goods, except he first bind the strong man; and then he will spoil his house. Verily I say unto you, All their sins shall be forgiven unto 28 the sons of men, and their blasphemies wherewith soever they shall blaspheme:
but whosoever shall blaspheme against the Holy Spirit hath never forgiveness, but is guilty of an eternal sin: because they said, He hath an unclean spirit.

And there come his mother and his brethren; and, standing without, they sent 31 unto him, calling him. And a multitude was sitting about him; and they say unto him, Behold, thy mother and thy brethren without seek for thee. And he answereth them, and saith, Who is my mother and my brethren? And looking round on them which sat round about him, he saith, Behold, my mother and my brethren!
For whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother. 35

And again he began to teach by the sea side. And there is gathered unto him a 4 very great multitude, so that he entered into a boat, and sat in the sea; and all the multitude were by the sea on the land. And he taught them many things in parables, and said unto them in his teaching, Hearken: Behold, the sower went forth to sow:
and it came to pass, as he sowed, some seed fell by the way side, and the birds came and devoured it. And other fell on the rocky ground, where it had not much earth; 5 and straightway it sprang up, because it had no deepness of earth: and when the sun was risen, it was scorched; and because it had no root, it withered away. And other fell among the thorns, and the thorns grew up, and choked it, and it yielded no fruit.
And others fell into the good ground, and yielded fruit, growing up and increasing; and brought forth, thirtyfold, and sixtyfold, and a hundredfold. And he said, Who hath ears to hear, let him hear.

And when he was alone, they that were about him with the twelve asked of him 10 the parables. And he said unto them: Unto you is given the mystery of the kingdom of God: but unto them that are without, all things are done in parables: that seeing they may see, and not perceive; and hearing they may hear, and not understand; lest haply they should turn again, and it should be forgiven them. And he 13 saith unto them: Know ye not this parable? and how shall ye know all the parables?
The sower soweth the word. And these are they by the way side, where the word is sown; and when they have heard, straightway cometh Satan, and taketh away the word which hath been sown in them. And these in like manner are they that 16 are sown upon the rocky places, who, when they have heard the word, straightway receive it with joy; and they have no root in themselves, but endure for a while; then, when tribulation or persecution ariseth because of the word, straightway they stumble. And others are they that are sown among the thorns; these are they 19 that have heard the word, and the cares of the world, and the deceitfulness of riches, and the lusts of other things entering in, choke the word, and it becometh unfruitful. And those are they that were sown upon the good ground; such as hear the word, and accept it, and bear fruit, thirtyfold, and sixtyfold, and a hundredfold.

21 And he said unto them: Is the lamp brought to be put under the bushel, or under the bed, and not to be put on the stand? For there is nothing hid, save that it should be manifested; neither was anything made secret, but that it should come to light.
24 If any man hath ears to hear, let him hear. And he said unto them, Take heed what ye hear: with what measure ye mete it shall be measured unto you: and more shall be given unto you. For he that hath, to him shall be given: and he that hath not, from him shall be taken away even that which he hath.

26 And he said: So is the kingdom of God, as if a man should cast seed upon the earth; and should sleep and rise night and day, and the seed should spring up and grow, he knoweth not how. The earth beareth fruit of herself; first the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear. But when the fruit is ripe, straightway he putteth forth the sickle, because the harvest is come.

30 And he said: How shall we liken the kingdom of God? or in what parable shall we set it forth? It is like a grain of mustard seed, which, when it is sown upon the earth, though it be less than all the seeds that are upon the earth, yet when it is sown, groweth up, and becometh greater than all the herbs, and putteth out great branches; so that the birds of the heaven can lodge under the shadow thereof.

33 And with many such parables spake he the word unto them, as they were able to hear it: and without a parable spake he not unto them: but privately to his own disciples he expounded all things.

35 And on that day, when even was come, he saith unto them, Let us go over unto the other side. And leaving the multitude, they take him with them, even as he was, in the boat. And other boats were with him. And there ariseth a great storm of wind, and the waves beat into the boat, insomuch that the boat was now filling. And he himself was in the stern, asleep on the cushion: and they awake him, and 19 say unto him, Master, carest thou not that we perish? And he awoke, and rebuked the wind, and said unto the sea, Peace, be still. And the wind ceased, and there was a great calm. And he said unto them, Why are ye fearful? have ye not yet faith? And they feared exceedingly, and said one to another, Who then is this, that even the wind and the sea obey him?

5 And they came to the other side of the sea, into the country of the Gerasenes. And when he was come out of the boat, straightway there met him out of the tombs a man with an unclean spirit, who had his dwelling in the tombs: and no man could any more bind him, no, not with a chain; because that he had been often bound with fetters and chains, and the chains had been rent asunder by him, and the fetters
5 broken in pieces: and no man had strength to tame him. And always, night and day, in the tombs and in the mountains, he was crying out, and cutting himself with stones. And when he saw Jesus from afar, he ran and worshipped him; and crying out with a loud voice, he saith, What have I to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of the Most High God? I adjure thee by God, torment me not. For he said unto him,
9 Come forth, thou unclean spirit, out of the man. And he asked him, What is thy name? And he saith unto him, My name is Legion; for we are many. And he besought him much that he would not send them away out of the country. Now there was there on the mountain side a great herd of swine feeding. And they be-13 sought him, saying, Send us into the swine, that we may enter into them. And he gave them leave. And the unclean spirits came out, and entered into the swine: and the herd rushed down the steep into the sea, in number about two thousand; and they were choked in the sea. And they that fed them fled, and told it in the city, and in the country. And they came to see what it was that had come to pass.

And they come to Jesus, and behold him that was possessed with devils sitting, 15 clothed and in his right mind, even him that had the legion: and they were afraid.
And they that saw it declared unto them how it befell him that was possessed with devils, and concerning the swine. And they began to beseech him to depart from their borders. And as he was entering into the boat, he that had been possessed with devils besought him that he might be with him. And he suffered him not, 19 but saith unto him, Go to thy house unto thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee, and how he had mercy on thee. And he went his way, and began to publish in Decapolis how great things Jesus had done for him: and all men did marvel.

And when Jesus had crossed over again in the boat unto the other side, a great 21 multitude was gathered unto him: and he was by the sea. And there cometh one of the rulers of the synagogue, Jaïrus by name; and seeing him, he falleth at his feet, and beseecheth him much, saying, My little daughter is at the point of death:
I pray thee, that thou come and lay thy hands on her, that she may be made whole, and live. And he went with him; and a great multitude followed him, and they thronged him.

And a woman, which had an issue of blood twelve years, and had suffered many 25 things of many physicians, and had spent all that she had, and was nothing bettered, but rather grew worse, having heard the things concerning Jesus, came in the crowd behind, and touched his garment. For she said, If I touch but his garments, I shall be made whole. And straightway the fountain of her blood was dried up; and she felt in her body that she was healed of her plague. And straightway Jesus, 30 perceiving in himself that the power proceeding from him had gone forth, turned him about in the crowd, and said, Who touched my garments? And his disciples said unto him, Thou seest the multitude thronging thee, and sayest thou, Who touched me? And he looked round about to see her that had done this thing. But 33 the woman fearing and trembling, knowing what had been done to her, came and fell down before him, and told him all the truth. And he said unto her, Daughter, thy faith hath made thee whole; go in peace, and be whole of thy plague.

While he yet spake, they come from the ruler of the synagogue's house, saying, 35 Thy daughter is dead: why troublest thou the Master any further? But Jesus, not heeding the word spoken, saith unto the ruler of the synagogue, Fear not, only believe. And he suffered no man to follow with him, save Peter, and James, and John the brother of James. And they come to the house of the ruler of the synagogue; and he beholdeth a tumult, and many weeping and wailing greatly. And 39 when he was entered in, he saith unto them, Why make ye a tumult, and weep?
the child is not dead, but sleepeth. And they laughed him to scorn. But he, having put them all forth, taketh the father of the child and her mother and them that were with him, and goeth in where the child was. And taking the child by the hand, he saith unto her, Talitha cumi; which is, being interpreted, Damsel, I say unto thee, Arise. And straightway the damsel rose up, and walked; for she was twelve 42 years old. And they were amazed straightway with a great amazement. And he charged them much that no man should know this: and he commanded that something should be given her to eat.

And he went out from thence; and he cometh into his own country; and his 6 disciples follow him. And when the sabbath was come, he began to teach in the synagogue: and many hearing him were astonished, saying, Whence hath this man these things? and, What is the wisdom that is given unto this man, and what mean such mighty works wrought by his hands? Is not this the carpenter, the son of 3

Mary, and brother of James, and Joses, and Judas, and Simon? and are not his 4 sisters here with us? And they were offended in him. And Jesus said unto them,
A prophet is not without honour, save in his own country, and among his own kin, and in his own house. And he could there do no mighty work, save that he laid his hands upon a few sick folk, and healed them. And he marvelled because of their unbelief.

And he went round about the villages teaching.

And he called unto him the twelve, and began to send them forth by two and two; and he gave them authority over the unclean spirits; and he charged them that they should take nothing for their journey, save a staff only; no bread, no wallet, no money in their purse; but to go shod with sandals: and, said he, put not 10 on two coats. And he said unto them, Wheresoever ye enter into a house, there abide till ye depart thence. And whatsoever place shall not receive you, and they hear you not, as ye go forth thence, shake off the dust that is under your feet for a testimony unto them. And they went out, and preached that men should repent.
And they cast out many devils, and anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them.

14 And king Herod heard thereof; for his name had become known: and he said,
John the Baptist is risen from the dead, and therefore do these powers work in him.
But others said, It is Elijah. And others said, It is a prophet, even as one of the prophets. But Herod, when he heard thereof, said, John, whom I beheaded, he is 17 risen. For Herod himself had sent forth and laid hold upon John, and bound him in prison for the sake of Herodias, his brother Philip's wife: for he had married her.
For John said unto Herod, It is not lawful for thee to have thy brother's wife. And Herodias set herself against him, and desired to kill him; and she could not; for Herod feared John, knowing that he was a righteous man and a holy, and kept him safe. And when he heard him, he was much perplexed; and he heard him gladly.
21 And when a convenient day was come, that Herod on his birthday made a supper to his lords, and the high captains, and the chief men of Galilee; and when the daughter of Herodias herself came in and danced, she pleased Herod and them that sat at meat with him; and the king said unto the damsel, Ask of me whatsoever thou wilt, and I will give it thee. And he sware unto her, Whatsoever thou shalt 24 ask of me, I will give it thee, unto the half of my kingdom. And she went out, and said unto her mother, What shall I ask? And she said, The head of John the Baptist. And she came in straightway with haste unto the king, and asked, saying, I will that thou forthwith give me in a charger the head of John the Baptist. And the king was exceeding sorry; but for the sake of his oaths, and of them that sat 27 at meat, he would not reject her. And straightway the king sent forth a soldier of his guard, and commanded to bring his head: and he went and beheaded him in the prison, and brought his head in a charger, and gave it to the damsel; and the damsel gave it to her mother. And when his disciples heard thereof, they came and took up his corpse, and laid it in a tomb.

30 And the apostles gather themselves together unto Jesus; and they told him all things, whatsoever they had done, and whatsoever they had taught. And he saith unto them, Come ye yourselves apart into a desert place, and rest a while. For there were many coming and going, and they had no leisure so much as to eat. And they went away in the boat to a desert place apart. And the people saw them going, and many knew them, and they ran there together on foot from all the cities, and outwent 34 them. And he came forth and saw a great multitude, and he had compassion on them, because they were as sheep not having a shepherd: and he began to teach them many things. And when the day was now far spent, his disciples came unto him, and said,

The place is desert, and the day is now far spent: send them away, that they may go 36 into the country and villages round about, and buy themselves somewhat to eat. But he answered and said unto them, Give ye them to eat. And they say unto him, Shall we go and buy two hundred pennyworth of bread, and give them to eat? And he saith unto them, How many loaves have ye? go and see. And when they knew, they say, Five, and two fishes. And he commanded them that all should sit down by companies upon the green grass. And they sat down in ranks, by hundreds, and by 40 fifties. And he took the five loaves and the two fishes, and looking up to heaven, he blessed, and brake the loaves; and he gave to the disciples to set before them; and the two fishes divided he among them all. And they did all eat, and were filled. And they took up broken pieces, twelve basketfuls, and also of the fishes. And they that ate the loaves were five thousand men.

And straightway he constrained his disciples to enter into the boat, and to go before 45 him unto the other side to Bethsaida, while he himself sendeth the multitude away.
And after he had taken leave of them, he departed into the mountain to pray. And when even was come, the boat was in the midst of the sea, and he alone on the land.
And seeing them distressed in rowing, for the wind was contrary unto them, about the fourth watch of the night he cometh unto them, walking on the sea; and he would have passed by them: but they, when they saw him walking on the sea, supposed that it 49 was an apparition, and cried out: for they all saw him, and were troubled. But he straightway spake with them, and saith to them, Be of good cheer: it is I; be not afraid. And he went up unto them into the boat; and the wind ceased. And they were sore amazed in themselves; for they understood not concerning the loaves, but their heart was hardened.

And when they had crossed over, they came to the land unto Gennesaret, and 53 moored to the shore. And when they were come out of the boat, straightway the people knew him, and ran round about that whole region, and began to carry about on their beds those that were sick, where they heard he was. And wheresoever he entered, into villages, or into cities, or into the country, they laid the sick in the marketplaces, and besought him that they might touch if it were but the border of his garment: and as many as touched him were made whole.

And there are gathered together unto him the Pharisees, and certain of the scribes, 7 which had come from Jerusalem, and had seen that some of his disciples ate their bread with defiled[1] hands. And the Pharisees and the scribes ask him, Why walk not thy disciples according to the Tradition of the Elders, but eat their bread with defiled hands? And he said unto them: Well did Isaiah prophesy of you hypocrites, 6 as it is written: This people honoureth me with their lips, but their heart is far from me. But in vain do they worship me, teaching as their doctrines the precepts of men.
Ye leave the commandment of God, and hold fast the tradition of men. And he said unto them, Full well do ye reject the commandment of God, that ye may keep your tradition. For Moses said, Honour thy father and thy mother; and, He that speaketh 10 evil of father or mother, let him die the death: but ye say, If a man shall say to his father or his mother, That wherewith thou mightest have been profited by me is Corban, (that is to say, Given to God,) ye no longer suffer him to do aught for his father or his mother; making void the word of God by your tradition, which ye have delivered:
and many such like things ye do. And he called to him the multitude again, and said 14

[1] That is, unwashen. For the Pharisees, and all the Jews, except they wash their hands diligently, eat not, holding the Tradition of the Elders. And when they come from the marketplace, except they wash themselves, they eat not. And many other things there be, which they have received to hold, washings of cups, and pots, and brasen vessels.

unto them, Hear me all of you, and understand: there is nothing from without the man, that going into him can defile him: but the things which proceed out of the 17 man are those that defile the man. And when he was entered into the house from the multitude, his disciples asked of him the parable. And he saith unto them: Are ye so without understanding also? Perceive ye not, that whatsoever from without goeth into the man, it cannot defile him; because it goeth not into his heart, but into his belly, and goeth out into the draught? This he said, making all meats clean.
20 And he said: That which proceedeth out of the man, that defileth the man. For from within, out of the heart of men, evil thoughts proceed, fornications, thefts, murders, adulteries, covetings, wickednesses, deceit, lasciviousness, an evil eye, railing, pride, foolishness: all these evil things proceed from within, and defile the man.

24 And from thence he arose, and went away into the borders of Tyre and Sidon. And he entered into a house, and would have no man know it: and he could not be hid. But straightway a woman, whose little daughter had an unclean spirit, having heard of him, came and fell down at his feet. Now the woman was a Greek, a Syrophœnician by race. And she besought him that he would cast forth the devil out of her 27 daughter. And he said unto her, Let the children first be filled: for it is not meet to take the children's bread and cast it to the dogs. But she answered and saith unto him, Yea, Lord: even the dogs under the table eat of the children's crumbs. And he said unto her, For this saying go thy way; the devil is gone out of thy daughter. And she went away unto her house, and found the child laid upon the bed, and the devil gone out.

31 And again he went out from the borders of Tyre, and came through Sidon unto the sea of Galilee, through the midst of the borders of Decapolis. And they bring unto him one that was deaf, and had an impediment in his speech; and they beseech him to lay his hand upon him. And he took him aside from the multitude privately, and put his fingers into his ears, and he spat, and touched his tongue; and looking up to 35 heaven, he sighed, and saith unto him, Ephphatha, that is, Be opened. And his ears were opened, and the bond of his tongue was loosed, and he spake plain. And he charged them that they should tell no man: but the more he charged them, so much the more a great deal they published it. And they were beyond measure astonished, saying, He hath done all things well: he maketh even the deaf to hear, and the dumb to speak.

8 In those days, when there was again a great multitude, and they had nothing to eat, he called unto him his disciples, and saith unto them, I have compassion on the multitude, because they continue with me now three days, and have nothing to eat: and if I send them away fasting to their home, they will faint in the way; and some of them
4 are come from far. And his disciples answered him, Whence shall one be able to fill these men with bread here in a desert place? And he asked them, How many loaves have ye? And they said, Seven. And he commandeth the multitude to sit down on the ground: and he took the seven loaves, and having given thanks, he brake, and gave to his disciples, to set before them; and they set them before the multitude.
7 And they had a few small fishes: and having blessed them, he commanded to set these also before them. And they did eat, and were filled: and they took up, of broken pieces that remained over, seven baskets. And they were about four thousand: and he sent them away. And straightway he entered into the boat with his disciples, and came into the parts of Dalmanutha.

And the Pharisees came forth, and began to question with him, seeking of him a 11 sign from heaven, tempting him. And he sighed deeply in his spirit, and saith, Why doth this generation seek a sign? verily I say unto you, There shall no sign be given unto this generation. And he left them, and again entering into the boat departed to the other side.

And they forgot to take bread; and they had not in the boat with them more than 14 one loaf. And he charged them, saying, Take heed, beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and the leaven of Herod. And they reasoned one with another, saying,
We have no bread. And Jesus perceiving it saith unto them, Why reason ye, because ye have no bread? do ye not yet perceive, neither understand? have ye your heart hardened? Having eyes, see ye not? and having ears, hear ye not? and do ye not remember? When I brake the five loaves among the five thousand, how many baskets 19 full of broken pieces took ye up? They say unto him, Twelve. And when the seven among the four thousand, how many basketfuls of broken pieces took ye up? And they say unto him, Seven. And he said unto them, Do ye not yet understand?

And they come unto Bethsaida. And they bring to him a blind man, and beseech 22 him to touch him. And he took hold of the blind man by the hand, and brought him out of the village; and when he had spit on his eyes, and laid his hands upon him, he asked him, Seest thou aught? And he looked up, and said, I see men; for I behold them as trees, walking. Then again he laid his hands upon his eyes; and he 25 looked stedfastly, and was restored, and saw all things clearly. And he sent him away to his home, saying, Do not even enter into the village.

And Jesus went forth, and his disciples, into the villages of Cæsarea Philippi: and 27 in the way he asked his disciples, saying unto them, Who do men say that I am?
And they told him, saying, John the Baptist: and others, Elijah; but others, One of the prophets. And he asked them, But who say ye that I am? Peter answereth and saith unto him, Thou art the Christ. And he charged them that they should tell no man of him. And he began to teach them, that the Son of man must suffer many 31 things, and be rejected by the elders, and the chief priests, and the scribes, and be killed, and after three days rise again. And he spake the saying openly. And Peter took him, and began to rebuke him. But he turning about, and seeing his disciples, rebuked Peter, and saith, Get thee behind me, Satan: for thou mindest not the things of God, but the things of men. And he called unto him the multitude with his dis- 34 ciples, and said unto them: If any man would come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me. For whosoever would save his life shall lose it; and whosoever shall lose his life for my sake and the gospel's shall save it. For what doth it profit a man, to gain the whole world, and forfeit his life? For what 37 should a man give in exchange for his life? For whosoever shall be ashamed of me and of my words in this adulterous and sinful generation, the Son of man also shall be ashamed of him, when he cometh in the glory of his Father with the holy angels.
And he said unto them, Verily I say unto you, There be some here of them that stand 9 by, which shall in no wise taste of death, till they see the kingdom of God come with power.

And after six days Jesus taketh with him Peter, and James, and John, and bringeth 2 them up into a high mountain apart by themselves: and he was transfigured before them: and his garments became glistering, exceeding white; so as no fuller on earth can whiten them. And there appeared unto them Elijah with Moses: and they were talking with Jesus. And Peter answereth and saith to Jesus, Rabbi, it is good for us 5 to be here: and let us make three tabernacles; one for thee, and one for Moses, 5 and one for Elijah. For he wist not what to answer; for they became sore afraid.

And there came a cloud overshadowing them: and there came a voice out of the cloud,
This is my beloved Son: hear ye him. And suddenly looking round about, they saw no one any more, save Jesus only with themselves. And as they were coming down from the mountain, he charged them that they should tell no man what things they 10 had seen, save when the Son of man should have risen again from the dead. And they kept the saying, questioning among themselves what the rising again from the dead should mean. And they asked him, saying, The scribes say that Elijah must first come. And he said unto them: Elijah indeed cometh first, and restoreth all things: and how is it written of the Son of man, that he should suffer many things and be set at nought? But I say unto you, that Elijah is come, and they have also done unto him whatsoever they listed, even as it is written of him.
14 And when they came to the disciples, they saw a great multitude about them, and scribes questioning with them. And straightway all the multitude, when they saw him, were greatly amazed, and running to him saluted him. And he asked them, What question ye with them? And one of the multitude answered him, Master, I brought unto thee my son, which hath a dumb spirit; and wheresoever it taketh him, it dasheth him down; and he foameth, and grindeth his teeth, and pineth away:
and I spake to thy disciples that they should cast it out; and they were not able.
19 And he answereth them and saith, O faithless generation, how long shall I be with you? how long shall I bear with you? bring him unto me. And they brought him unto him: and when he saw him, straightway the spirit tare him grievously; and he fell on the ground, and wallowed foaming. And he asked his father, How long time is it since this hath come unto him? And he said, From a child. And ofttimes it hath cast him both into the fire and into the waters, to destroy him: but if 23 thou canst do anything, have compassion on us, and help us. And Jesus said unto him, If thou canst! All things are possible to him that believeth. Straightway the father of the child cried out, and said, I believe; help thou mine unbelief. And when Jesus saw that a multitude came running together, he rebuked the unclean spirit, saying unto him, Thou dumb and deaf spirit, I command thee, come out of him, and enter no more into him. And having cried out, and torn him much, he came out: and the child became as one dead; insomuch that the more part said, He is dead. But Jesus 28 took him by the hand, and raised him up, and he arose. And when he was come into the house, his disciples asked him privately, saying, We could not cast it out.
And he said unto them, This kind can come out by nothing, save by prayer.

30 And they went forth from thence, and passed through Galilee; and he would not that any man should know it. For he taught his disciples, and said unto them, The Son of man is delivered up into the hands of men, and they shall kill him; and when he is killed, after three days he shall rise again. But they understood not the saying, and were afraid to ask him.
33 And they came to Capernaum: and when he was in the house he asked them, What were ye reasoning in the way? But they held their peace: for they had disputed one with another in the way, who was the greatest. And he sat down, and called the twelve; and he saith unto them, If any man would be first, he shall be last of all, and minister of all. And he took a little child, and set him in the midst of them:
and taking him in his arms, he said unto them, Whosoever shall receive one of such little children in my name, receiveth me: and whosoever receiveth me, receiveth not me, but him that sent me.
38 John said unto him, Master, we saw one casting out devils in thy name: and we forbade him, because he followed not us. But Jesus said, Forbid him not. For 39 there is no man which shall do a mighty work in my name, and be able quickly to speak evil of me. For he that is not against us is for us. For whosoever shall give you a cup of water to drink, because ye are Christ's, verily I say unto you, he shall in no wise lose his reward. And whosoever shall cause one of these little ones that 42 believe on me to stumble, it were better for him if a great millstone were hanged about his neck, and he were cast into the sea. And if thy hand cause thee to stumble, cut it off: it is good for thee to enter into life maimed, rather than having thy two hands to go into hell, into the unquenchable fire. And if thy foot cause thee to 45 stumble, cut it off: it is good for thee to enter into life halt, rather than having thy two feet to be cast into hell. And if thine eye cause thee to stumble, cast it out: it is good for thee to enter into the kingdom of God with one eye, rather than having two eyes to be cast into hell; where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched.

For every one shall be salted with fire. Salt is good: but if the salt have lost its 49 saltness, wherewith will ye season it? Have salt in yourselves, and be at peace one with another.

And he arose from thence, and cometh into the borders of Judæa and beyond 10 Jordan: and multitudes come together unto him again; and, as he was wont, he taught them again. And there came unto him Pharisees, and asked him, Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife? tempting him. And he answered and said unto them, What did Moses command you? And they said, Moses suffered to write a bill of divorcement, and to put her away. But Jesus said unto them, For your hardness 5 of heart he wrote you this commandment. But from the beginning of the creation, 'Male and female made he them.' For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife; and the twain shall become one flesh: so that they are no more twain, but one flesh. What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder. And in the house the disciples asked him again of this 10 matter. And he saith unto them, Whosoever shall put away his wife, and marry another, committeth adultery against her: and if she herself shall put away her husband, and marry another, she committeth adultery.

And they brought unto him little children, that he should touch them: and the 13 disciples rebuked them. But when Jesus saw it, he was moved with indignation, and said unto them, Suffer the little children to come unto me; forbid them not:
for of such is the kingdom of God. Verily I say unto you, Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall in no wise enter therein. And he took them in his arms, and blessed them, laying his hands upon them.

And as he was going forth into the way, there ran one to him, and kneeled to him, 17 and asked him, Good Master, what shall I do that I may inherit eternal life? And Jesus said unto him, Why callest thou me good? none is good save one, even God.
Thou knowest the commandments, Do not kill, Do not commit adultery, Do not steal, Do not bear false witness, Do not defraud, Honour thy father and mother. And he said unto him, Master, all these things have I observed from my youth. And Jesus 21 looking upon him loved him, and said unto him, One thing thou lackest: go, sell whatsoever thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven:
and come, follow me. But his countenance fell at the saying, and he went away sorrowful: for he was one that had great possessions. And Jesus looked round 23 about, and saith unto his disciples, How hardly shall they that have riches enter into 24 the kingdom of God! And the disciples were amazed at his words. But Jesus answereth again, and saith unto them, Children, how hard is it for them that trust in riches to enter into the kingdom of God! It is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God. And they were astonished exceedingly, saying unto him, Then who can be saved? Jesus looking upon them saith, With men it is impossible, but not with God: for all things are possible with God. Peter began to say unto him, Lo, we have left all, and have followed thee.

29 Jesus said, Verily I say unto you, There is no man that hath left house, or brethren, or sisters, or mother, or father, or children, or lands, for my sake, and for the gospel's sake, but he shall receive a hundredfold now in this time, houses, and brethren, and sisters, and mothers, and children, and lands, with persecutions; and in the world to come eternal life. But many that are first shall be last; and the last first.

32 And they were in the way, going up to Jerusalem; and Jesus was going before them: and they were amazed; and they that followed were afraid. And he took again the twelve, and began to tell them the things that were to happen unto him, saying, Behold, we go up to Jerusalem; and the Son of man shall be delivered unto the chief priests and the scribes; and they shall condemn him to death, and shall deliver him unto the Gentiles: and they shall mock him, and shall spit upon him, and shall scourge him, and shall kill him; and after three days he shall rise again.
35 And there come near unto him James and John, the sons of Zebedee, saying unto him, Master, we would that thou shouldest do for us whatsoever we shall ask of thee. And he said unto them, What would ye that I should do for you? And they said unto him, Grant unto us that we may sit, one on thy right hand, and one on thy left hand, 38 in thy glory. But Jesus said unto them, Ye know not what ye ask. Are ye able to drink the cup that I drink? or to be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with? And they said unto him, We are able. And Jesus said unto them, The cup that I drink ye shall drink; and with the baptism that I am baptized withal shall ye be baptized: but to sit on my right hand or on my left hand is not mine to give:
41 but it is for them for whom it hath been prepared. And when the ten heard it, they began to be moved with indignation concerning James and John. And Jesus called them to him, and saith unto them: Ye know that they which are accounted to rule over the Gentiles lord it over them; and their great ones exercise authority over them.
43 But it is not so among you: but whosoever would become great among you, shall be your minister: and whosoever would be first among you, shall be servant of all. For verily the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many.

46 And they come to Jericho: and as he went out from Jericho, with his disciples and a great multitude, the son of Timæus, Bartimæus, a blind beggar, was sitting by the way side. And when he heard that it was Jesus of Nazareth, he began to cry out, and say, Jesus, thou son of David, have mercy on me. And many rebuked him, that he should hold his peace: but he cried out the more a great deal, Thou son of 49 David, have mercy on me. And Jesus stood still, and said, Call ye him. And they call the blind man, saying unto him, Be of good cheer: rise, he calleth thee. And he, casting away his garment, sprang up, and came to Jesus. And Jesus answered him, and said, What wilt thou that I should do unto thee? And the blind man said unto 52 him, Rabboni, that I may receive my sight. And Jesus said unto him, Go thy way; thy faith hath made thee whole. And straightway he received his sight, and followed him in the way.

And when they draw nigh unto Jerusalem, unto Bethphage and Bethany, at the 1 mount of Olives, he sendeth two of his disciples, and saith unto them, Go your way into the village that is over against you: and straightway as ye enter into it, ye shall find a colt tied, whereon no man ever yet sat; loose him, and bring him. And if any one say unto you, Why do ye this? say ye, The Lord hath need of him; and straightway he will send him back hither. And they went away, and found a colt tied at the door without in the open street; and they loose him. And certain of them 5 that stood there said unto them, What do ye, loosing the colt? And they said unto them even as Jesus had said: and they let them go. And they bring the colt unto Jesus, and cast on him their garments; and he sat upon him. And many spread their garments upon the way; and others branches, which they had cut from the fields. And they that went before, and they that followed, cried, 'Hosanna' —
'Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord' — 'Blessed is the kingdom that 10 cometh, the kingdom of our father David' — 'Hosanna in the highest.'

And he entered into Jerusalem, into the temple; and when he had looked round 11 about upon all things, it being now eventide, he went out unto Bethany with the twelve.

And on the morrow, when they were come out from Bethany, he hungered. And 12 seeing a fig tree afar off having leaves, he came, if haply he might find anything thereon:
and when he came to it, he found nothing but leaves; for it was not the season of figs. And he answered and said unto it, No man eat fruit from thee henceforward for ever. And his disciples heard it.

And they come to Jerusalem: and he entered into the temple, and began to cast 15 out them that sold and them that bought in the temple, and overthrew the tables of the money-changers, and the seats of them that sold the doves; and he would not suffer that any man should carry a vessel through the temple. And he taught, and said unto them, Is it not written, My house shall be called a house of prayer for all the nations? but ye have made it a den of robbers. And the chief priests and the 18 scribes heard it, and sought how they might destroy him: for they feared him, for all the multitude was astonished at his teaching.

And every evening he went forth out of the city.

And as they passed by in the morning, they saw the fig tree withered away from 20 the roots. And Peter calling to remembrance saith unto him, Rabbi, behold, the fig tree which thou cursedst is withered away. And Jesus answering saith unto them:
Have faith in God. Verily I say unto you, Whosoever shall say unto this mountain, Be thou taken up and cast into the sea; and shall not doubt in his heart, but shall believe that what he saith cometh to pass; he shall have it. Therefore I say unto 24 you, All things whatsoever ye pray and ask for, believe that ye have received them, and ye shall have them. And whensoever ye stand praying, forgive, if ye have aught against any one; that your Father also which is in heaven may forgive you your trespasses.

And they come again to Jerusalem: and as he was walking in the temple, there 27 come to him the chief priests, and the scribes, and the elders; and they said unto him, By what authority doest thou these things? or who gave thee this authority to do these things? And Jesus said unto them, I will ask of you one question, and answer me, and I will tell you by what authority I do these things. The baptism of John, 30 was it from heaven, or from men? answer me. And they reasoned with themselves, saying, If we shall say, From heaven; he will say, Why then did ye not believe him?

But should we say, From men — they feared the people: for all verily held John to be a prophet. And they answered Jesus and say, We know not. And Jesus saith 12 unto them, Neither tell I you by what authority I do these things. And he began to speak unto them in parables. A man planted a vineyard, and set a hedge about it, and digged a pit for the winepress, and built a tower, and let it out to husbandmen, and went into another country. And at the season he sent to the husbandmen a servant, that he might receive from the husbandmen of the fruits of the vineyard.
3 And they took him, and beat him, and sent him away empty. And again he sent unto them another servant; and him they wounded in the head, and handled shamefully. And he sent another; and him they killed: and many others; beating some, and killing some. He had yet one, a beloved son: he sent him last unto them, saying, They will reverence my son. But those husbandmen said among themselves, 8 This is the heir; come, let us kill him, and the inheritance shall be ours. And they took him, and killed him, and cast him forth out of the vineyard. What therefore will the lord of the vineyard do? he will come and destroy the husbandmen, and will give the vineyard unto others. Have ye not read even this scripture:

The stone which the builders rejected,
The same was made the head of the corner:
This was from the Lord,
And it is marvellous in our eyes?

12 And they sought to lay hold on him; and they feared the multitude; for they perceived that he spake the parable against them: and they left him, and went away.

13 And they send unto him certain of the Pharisees and of the Herodians, that they might catch him in talk. And when they were come, they say unto him, Master, we know that thou art true, and carest not for any one: for thou regardest not the person of men, but of a truth teachest the way of God: Is it lawful to give tribute unto Cæsar, or not? Shall we give, or shall we not give? But he, knowing their hypo-16 crisy, said unto them, Why tempt ye me? bring me a penny, that I may see it. And they brought it. And he saith unto them, Whose is this image and superscription?
And they said unto him, Cæsar's. And Jesus said unto them, Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's. And they mar-velled greatly at him.

18 And there come unto him Sadducees, which say that there is no resurrection; and they asked him, saying, Master, Moses wrote unto us, If a man's brother die, and leave a wife behind him, and leave no child, that his brother should take his wife, and raise up seed unto his brother. There were seven brethren: and the first took a wife, and dying left no seed; and the second took her, and died, leaving no seed 22 behind him; and the third likewise: and the seven left no seed. Last of all the woman also died. In the resurrection whose wife shall she be of them? for the seven had her to wife. Jesus said unto them: Is it not for this cause that ye err, that ye know not the scriptures, nor the power of God? For when they shall rise from the dead, they neither marry, nor are given in marriage; but are as angels in heaven.
26 But as touching the dead, that they are raised; have ye not read in the book of Moses, in the place concerning the Bush, how God spake unto him, saying, I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob? He is not the God of the dead, but of the living: ye do greatly err.

28 And one of the scribes came, and heard them questioning together, and knowing that he had answered them well, asked him, What commandment is the first of all?
Jesus answered, The first is, Hear, O Israel; The Lord our God, the Lord is one: and thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength. The second is this, Thou shalt love thy neigh- 31

bour as thyself. There is none other commandment greater than these. And the scribe said unto him, Of a truth, Master, thou hast well said that He is one; and there is none other but He: and to love Him with all the heart, and with all the understanding, and with all the strength, and to love his neighbour as himself, is much more than all whole burnt offerings and sacrifices. And when Jesus saw that he 34 answered discreetly, he said unto him, Thou art not far from the kingdom of God. And no man after that durst ask him any question.

And Jesus answered and said, as he taught in the temple: How say the scribes that the Christ is the son of David? David himself said in the Holy Spirit, 36

The Lord said unto my Lord,
Sit thou on my right hand,
Till I make thine enemies the footstool of thy feet.

David himself calleth him Lord; and whence is he his son? And the common people heard him gladly.

And in his teaching he said: Beware of the scribes, which desire to walk in long 38 robes, and to have salutations in the marketplaces, and chief seats in the synagogues, and chief places at feasts: they which devour widows' houses, and for a pretence make long prayers; these shall receive greater condemnation.

And he sat down over against the treasury, and beheld how the multitude cast 41 money into the treasury: and many that were rich cast in much. And there came a poor widow, and she cast in two mites, which make a farthing. And he called unto him his disciples, and said unto them, Verily I say unto you, This poor widow cast in more than all they which are casting into the treasury: for they all did cast in of their 44 superfluity; but she of her want did cast in all that she had, even all her living.

And as he went forth out of the temple, one of his disciples saith unto him, Master, 13 behold, what manner of stones and what manner of buildings! And Jesus said unto him, Seest thou these great buildings? there shall not be left here one stone upon another, which shall not be thrown down.

And as he sat on the mount of Olives over against the temple, Peter and James 3 and John and Andrew asked him privately, Tell us, when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign when these things are all about to be accomplished? And Jesus began to say unto them:

Take heed that no man lead you astray. Many shall come in my name, saying, I am he; and shall lead many astray. And when ye shall hear of wars and rumours 7 of wars, be not troubled: these things must needs come to pass; but the end is not yet. For nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom: there shall be earthquakes in divers places; there shall be famines: these things are the beginning of travail. But take ye heed to yourselves: for they shall deliver you up to councils; and in synagogues shall ye be beaten; and before governors and kings shall ye stand for my sake, for a testimony unto them. And the gospel must first 10 be preached unto all the nations. And when they lead you to judgement, and deliver you up, be not anxious beforehand what ye shall speak: but whatsoever shall be given you in that hour, that speak ye: for it is not ye that speak, but the Holy Ghost.

12 And brother shall deliver up brother to death, and the father his child; and children shall rise up against parents, and cause them to be put to death. And ye shall be hated of all men for my name's sake: but he that endureth to the end, the same shall be saved.
14 But when ye see the abomination of desolation standing where he ought not (let him that readeth understand), then let them that are in Judæa flee unto the mountains: and let him that is on the housetop not go down, nor enter in, to take anything out of his house: and let him that is in the field not return back to take his cloke. But woe unto them that are with child and to them that give suck in those 18 days! And pray ye that it be not in the winter. For those days shall be tribulation, such as there hath not been the like from the beginning of the creation which God created until now, and never shall be. And except the Lord had shortened the days, no flesh would have been saved: but for the elect's sake, whom he chose, he shortened 21 the days. And then if any man shall say unto you, Lo, here is the Christ; or, Lo, there; believe it not: for there shall arise false Christs and false prophets, and shall shew signs and wonders, that they may lead astray, if possible, the elect. But take ye heed: behold, I have told you all things beforehand.
24 But in those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall be falling from heaven, and the powers that are in the heavens shall be shaken. And then shall they see the Son of man coming in clouds with great power and glory. And then shall he send forth the angels, and shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from the uttermost part of the earth to the uttermost part of heaven.
28 Now from the fig tree learn her parable: when her branch is now become tender, and putteth forth its leaves, ye know that the summer is nigh; even so ye also, when ye see these things coming to pass, know ye that he is nigh, even at the doors. Verily I say unto you, This generation shall not pass away, until all these things be accomplished. Heaven and earth shall pass away: but my words shall not pass away. But of that day or that hour knoweth no one, not even the angels in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father.
33 Take ye heed, watch and pray: for ye know not when the time is. It is as when a man, sojourning in another country, having left his house, and given authority to his servants, to each one his work, commanded also the porter to watch. Watch therefore: for ye know not when the lord of the house cometh, whether at even, or at midnight, or at cockcrowing, or in the morning; lest coming suddenly he find you sleeping. And what I say unto you I say unto all, Watch.

14 Now after two days was the feast of the Passover and the unleavened bread: and the chief priests and the scribes sought how they might take him with subtilty, and kill him: for they said, Not during the feast, lest haply there shall be a tumult of the people.
3 And while he was in Bethany in the house of Simon the leper, as he sat at meat, there came a woman having an alabaster cruse of ointment of spikenard very costly; and she brake the cruse, and poured it over his head. But there were some that had indignation among themselves, saying, To what purpose hath this waste of the oint-5 ment been made? For this ointment might have been sold for above three hundred pence, and given to the poor. And they murmured against her. But Jesus said, Let her alone; why trouble ye her? she hath wrought a good work on me. For ye have the poor always with you, and whensoever ye will ye can do them good: but 8 me ye have not always. She hath done what she could: she hath anointed my body aforehand for the burying. And verily I say unto you, Wheresoever the gospel shall be preached throughout the whole world, that also which this woman hath done shall be spoken of for a memorial of her.

And Judas Iscariot, he that was one of the twelve, went away unto the chief 10 priests, that he might deliver him unto them. And they, when they heard it, were glad, and promised to give him money. And he sought how he might conveniently deliver him unto them.

And on the first day of unleavened bread, when they sacrificed the Passover, his 12 disciples say unto him, Where wilt thou that we go and make ready that thou mayest eat the Passover? And he sendeth two of his disciples, and saith unto them, Go into the city, and there shall meet you a man bearing a pitcher of water: follow him; and wheresoever he shall enter in, say to the goodman of the house, The Master saith, Where is my guest-chamber, where I shall eat the Passover with my disciples? And 15 he will himself shew you a large upper room furnished and ready: and there make ready for us. And the disciples went forth, and came into the city, and found as he had said unto them: and they made ready the Passover.

And when it was evening he cometh with the twelve. And as they sat and were 17 eating, Jesus said, Verily I say unto you, One of you shall betray me, even he that eateth with me. They began to be sorrowful, and to say unto him one by one, Is it I? And he said unto them, It is one of the twelve, he that dippeth with me in the dish. For the Son of man goeth, even as it is written of him: but woe unto that man through whom the Son of man is betrayed! good were it for that man if he had not been born.

And as they were eating, he took bread, and when he had blessed, he brake it, 22 and gave to them, and said, Take ye: this is my body. And he took a cup, and when he had given thanks, he gave to them: and they all drank of it. And he said unto them, This is my blood of the covenant, which is shed for many. Verily I say unto you, I will no more drink of the fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it new in the kingdom of God.

And when they had sung a hymn, they went out unto the mount of Olives. 26

And Jesus saith unto them, All ye shall be offended: for it is written, I will smite the shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered abroad. Howbeit, after I am raised up, I will go before you into Galilee. But Peter said unto him, Although all shall be offended, yet will not I. And Jesus saith unto him, Verily I say unto thee, that 30 thou to-day, even this night, before the cock crow twice, shalt deny me thrice. But he spake exceeding vehemently, If I must die with thee, I will not deny thee. And in like manner also said they all.

And they come unto a place which was named Gethsemane: and he saith unto 32 his disciples, Sit ye here, while I pray. And he taketh with him Peter and James and John, and began to be greatly amazed, and sore troubled. And he saith unto them, My soul is exceeding sorrowful even unto death: abide ye here, and watch. And he went forward a little, and fell on the ground, and prayed that, if it were possible, the hour might pass away from him. And he said, Abba, Father, all things are possible 36 unto thee; remove this cup from me: howbeit not what I will, but what thou wilt. And he cometh, and findeth them sleeping, and saith unto Peter, Simon, sleepest thou? couldest thou not watch one hour? Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation: the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak. And again he went away, and prayed, saying the same words. And again he came, and found them 40 sleeping, for their eyes were very heavy; and they wist not what to answer him. And he cometh the third time, and saith unto them, Sleep on now, and take your rest: it is enough; the hour is come; behold, the Son of man is betrayed into the hands of sinners. Arise, let us be going: behold, he that betrayeth me is at hand.

43 And straightway, while he yet spake, cometh Judas, one of the twelve, and with him a multitude with swords and staves, from the chief priests and the scribes and the elders. Now he that betrayed him had given them a token, saying, Whomsoever
I shall kiss, that is he; take him, and lead him away safely. And when he was come, straightway he came to him, and saith, Rabbi; and kissed him. And they laid 47 hands on him, and took him. But a certain one of them that stood by drew his sword, and smote the servant of the high priest, and struck off his ear. And Jesus answered and said unto them, Are ye come out, as against a robber, with swords and staves to seize me? I was daily with you in the temple teaching, and ye took me not:
but this is done that the scriptures might be fulfilled. And they all left him, and fled.
51 And a certain young man followed with him, having a linen cloth cast about him, over his naked body: and they lay hold on him; but he left the linen cloth, and fled naked.
And they led Jesus away to the high priest: and there come together with him 54 all the chief priests and the elders and the scribes. And Peter had followed him afar off, even within, into the court of the high priest; and he was sitting with the officers, and warming himself in the light of the fire. Now the chief priests and the whole council sought witness against Jesus to put him to death; and found it not. For 57 many bare false witness against him, and their witness agreed not together. And there stood up certain, and bare false witness against him, saying, We heard him say, I will destroy this temple that is made with hands, and in three days I will build another made without hands. And not even so did their witness agree together.
And the high priest stood up in the midst, and asked Jesus, saying, Answerest thou 61 nothing? what is it which these witness against thee? But he held his peace, and answered nothing. Again the high priest asked him, and saith unto him, Art thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed? And Jesus said, I am: and ye shall see the Son of man sitting at the right hand of power, and coming with the clouds of heaven.
63 And the high priest rent his clothes, and saith, What further need have we of witnesses? Ye have heard the blasphemy: what think ye? And they all condemned him to be worthy of death. And some began to spit on him, and to cover his face, and to buffet him, and to say unto him, Prophesy: and the officers received him with blows of their hands.
66 And as Peter was beneath in the court, there cometh one of the maids of the high priest; and seeing Peter warming himself, she looked upon him, and saith, Thou also wast with the Nazarene, even Jesus. But he denied, saying, I neither know, nor understand what thou sayest: and he went out into the porch; and the cock crew. And the maid saw him, and began again to say to them that stood by, This is one 70 of them. But he again denied it. And after a little while again they that stood by said to Peter, Of a truth thou art one of them; for thou art a Galilæan. But he began to curse and to swear, I know not this man of whom ye speak. And straightway the second time the cock crew. And Peter called to mind the word, how that Jesus said unto him, Before the cock crow twice, thou shalt deny me thrice. And when he thought thereon, he wept.

15 And straightway in the morning the chief priests with the elders and scribes, and the whole council, held a consultation, and bound Jesus, and carried him away, and delivered him up to Pilate. And Pilate asked him, Art thou the King of the Jews?
And he answering saith unto him, Thou sayest. And the chief priests accused him 4 of many things. And Pilate again asked him, saying, Answerest thou nothing?

behold how many things they accuse thee of. But Jesus no more answered anything; insomuch that Pilate marvelled.

Now at the feast he used to release unto them one prisoner, whom they asked of 6 him. And there was one called Barabbas, lying bound with them that had made insurrection, men who in the insurrection had committed murder. And the multitude went up and began to ask him to do as he was wont to do unto them. And Pilate answered them, saying, Will ye that I release unto you the King of the Jews? For he perceived that for envy the chief priests had delivered him up. But the chief 11 priests stirred up the multitude, that he should rather release Barabbas unto them.
And Pilate again answered and said unto them, What then shall I do unto him whom ye call the King of the Jews? And they cried out again, Crucify him. And Pilate said unto them, Why, what evil hath he done? But they cried out exceedingly, Crucify him. And Pilate, wishing to content the multitude, released unto them 15
Barabbas, and delivered Jesus, when he had scourged him, to be crucified.

And the soldiers led him away within the court, which is the Prætorium; and they 16 call together the whole band. And they clothe him with purple, and plaiting a crown of thorns, they put it on him; and they began to salute him, Hail, King of the Jews!
And they smote his head with a reed, and did spit upon him, and bowing their knees worshipped him. And when they had mocked him, they took off from him the purple, and put on him his garments. And they lead him out to crucify him.

And they compel one passing by, Simon of Cyrene, coming from the country, the 21 father of Alexander and Rufus, to go with them, that he might bear his cross. And they bring him unto the place Golgotha, which is, being interpreted, The place of a skull. And they offered him wine mingled with myrrh: but he received it not.
And they crucify him, and part his garments among them, casting lots upon them, 24 what each should take. And it was the third hour, and they crucified him. And the superscription of his accusation was written over:

The King of the Jews

And with him they crucify two robbers; one on his right hand, and one on his left. 27
And they that passed by railed on him, wagging their heads, and saying, Ha! thou that destroyest the temple, and buildest it in three days, save thyself, and come down from the cross. In like manner also the chief priests mocking him among themselves with the scribes said, He saved others; himself he cannot save. Let the Christ, the King of Israel, now come down from the cross, that we may see and believe. And they that were crucified with him reproached him.

And when the sixth hour was come, there was darkness over the whole land until 33 the ninth hour. And at the ninth hour Jesus cried with a loud voice, Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani? which is, being interpreted, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? And some of them that stood by, when they heard it, said, Behold, he calleth Elijah. And one ran, and filling a sponge full of vinegar, put it on a reed, and gave 36 him to drink, saying, Let be; let us see whether Elijah cometh to take him down.
And Jesus uttered a loud voice, and gave up the ghost. And the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom. And when the centurion, which stood by over against him, saw that he so gave up the ghost, he said, Truly this man was the Son of God. And there were also women beholding from afar: among whom 40 were both Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James the less and of Joses, and Salome; who, when he was in Galilee, followed him, and ministered unto him;
and many other women which came up with him unto Jerusalem.

42 And when even was now come, because it was the Preparation,[1] there came Joseph of Arimathæa, a councillor of honourable estate, who also himself was looking for the kingdom of God; and he boldly went in unto Pilate, and asked for the body of Jesus. And Pilate marvelled if he were already dead: and calling unto him the centurion, he asked him whether he had been any while dead. And when he learned 46 it of the centurion, he granted the corpse to Joseph. And he bought a linen cloth, and taking him down, wound him in the linen cloth, and laid him in a tomb which had been hewn out of a rock; and he rolled a stone against the door of the tomb.
And Mary Magdalene and Mary the mother of Joses beheld where he was laid.

16 And when the sabbath was past, Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James, and Salome, bought spices, that they might come and anoint him. And very early on the first day of the week, they come to the tomb when the sun was risen.
And they were saying among themselves, Who shall roll us away the stone from the door of the tomb? and looking up, they see that the stone is rolled back: for it was 5 exceeding great. And entering into the tomb, they saw a young man sitting on the right side, arrayed in a white robe; and they were amazed. And he saith unto them, Be not amazed: ye seek Jesus, the Nazarene, which hath been crucified: he is risen, he is not here: behold, the place where they laid him! But go, tell his disciples and Peter, He goeth before you into Galilee: there shall ye see him, as he said unto 8 you. And they went out, and fled from the tomb; for trembling and astonishment had come upon them: and they said nothing to any one; for they were afraid.

APPENDIX

9 Now when he was risen early on the first day of the week, he appeared first to Mary Magdalene, from whom he had cast out seven devils. She went and told them that had been with him, as they mourned and wept. And they, when they heard that he was alive, and had been seen of her, disbelieved.

12 And after these things he was manifested in another form unto two of them, as they walked, on their way into the country. And they went away, and told it unto the rest: neither believed they them.

14 And afterward he was manifested unto the eleven themselves as they sat at meat; and he upbraided them with their unbelief and hardness of heart, because they believed not them which had seen him after he was risen. And he said unto them: Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to the whole creation. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that disbelieveth shall be condemned.
17 And these signs shall follow them that believe: in my name shall they cast out devils;
they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents, and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall in no wise hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover.

19 So then the Lord Jesus, after he had spoken unto them, was received up into heaven, and sat down at the right hand of God. And they went forth, and preached everywhere, the Lord working with them, and confirming the word by the signs that followed. Amen.

PROLOGUE

JESUS, SON OF GOD, REVEALER OF THE FATHER

I

1 IN THE BEGINNING WAS THE WORD:
AND THE WORD WAS WITH GOD:
AND THE WORD WAS GOD.

2 The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made through him, and without him was not anything made. That which hath been made was life in him; and the life was the light of men. And the light shineth in the darkness; and the darkness overcame it not.

6 There came a man, sent from God, whose name was John. The same came for witness, that he might bear witness of the light, that all might believe through him. He was not the light, but came that he might bear witness of the light. There was the true light, even the light which lighteth every man, coming into the world.

10 He was in the world, and the world was made through him, and the world knew him not. He came unto his own, and they that were his own received him not. But as many as received him, to them gave he the right to become children of God, even to them that believe on his name: which were begotten, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God.

II

14 AND THE WORD BECAME FLESH,
AND DWELT AMONG US,

(and we beheld his glory, glory as of the only begotten from the Father),

FULL OF GRACE AND TRUTH.

15 John beareth witness of him, and crieth, saying: This was he of whom I said, He that cometh after me is become before me: for he was before me.

For of his fulness we all received, and grace for grace. For the law was given through Moses; grace and truth came through Jesus Christ.

III

18 NO MAN HATH SEEN GOD AT ANY TIME:
THE ONLY BEGOTTEN SON WHICH IS IN THE BOSOM OF THE FATHER, HE HATH DECLARED HIM.

I

EARLIER SIGNS AND WITNESS OF JESUS

i. Witness of John and Other Disciples

19 And this is the witness of John, when the Jews sent unto him from Jerusalem priests and Levites to ask him, Who art thou? And he confessed, and denied not; and he confessed, 'I am not the Christ.' And they asked him, 'What then? Art thou Elijah?' And he saith, 'I am not.' 'Art thou the prophet?' And he answered, 'No.' They said therefore unto him, 'Who art thou? that we may give an 23 answer to them that sent us. What sayest thou of thyself?' He said, 'I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness, Make straight the way of the Lord, as said Isaiah the prophet.' And they had been sent from the Pharisees. And they asked him, and said unto him, 'Why then baptizest thou, if thou art not the Christ, neither
26 Elijah, neither the prophet?' John answered them, saying, 'I baptize with water: in the midst of you standeth one whom ye know not, even he that cometh after me, the latchet of whose shoe I am not worthy to unloose.' These things were done in Bethany beyond Jordan, where John was baptizing. On the morrow he seeth Jesus coming unto him, and saith, 'Behold, the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin
30 of the world! This is he of whom I said, After me cometh a man which is become before me: for he was before me. And I knew him not; but that he should be made manifest to Israel, for this cause came I baptizing with water.' And John bare witness, saying, 'I have beheld the Spirit descending as a dove out of heaven; and it 33 abode upon him. And I knew him not: but he that sent me to baptize with water, he said unto me, Upon whomsoever thou shalt see the Spirit descending, and abiding upon him, the same is he that baptizeth with the Holy Spirit. And I have seen, and have borne witness that this is the Son of God.'

35 Again on the morrow John was standing, and two of his disciples; and he looked upon Jesus as he walked, and saith, 'Behold, the Lamb of God!' And the two disciples heard him speak, and they followed Jesus. And Jesus turned, and beheld them following, and saith unto them, "What seek ye?" And they said unto him, 39 'Rabbi' (which is to say, being interpreted, Master), 'where abidest thou?' He saith unto them, "Come, and ye shall see." They came therefore and saw where he abode; and they abode with him that day: it was about the tenth hour. One of the two that heard John speak, and followed him, was Andrew, Simon Peter's brother.
41 He findeth first his own brother Simon, and saith unto him, 'We have found the Messiah' (which is, being interpreted, Christ). He brought him unto Jesus. Jesus looked upon him, and said, "Thou art Simon the son of John: thou shalt be called Cephas" (which is by interpretation, Peter).

43 On the morrow he was minded to go forth into Galilee, and he findeth Philip: and Jesus saith unto him, "Follow me." Now Philip was from Bethsaida, of the city of Andrew and Peter. Philip findeth Nathanael, and saith unto him, 'We have found him, of whom Moses in the law, and the prophets, did write, Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph.' And Nathanael said unto him, 'Can any good thing come out of 47 Nazareth?' Philip saith unto him, 'Come and see.' Jesus saw Nathanael coming to him, and saith of him, "Behold, an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile!" Nathanael saith unto him, 'Whence knowest thou me?' Jesus answered and said unto him, "Before Philip called thee, when thou wast under the fig tree, I saw thee." Nathanael answered him, 'Rabbi, thou art the Son of God; thou art King of Israel.'
50 Jesus answered and said unto him, "Because I said unto thee, I saw thee underneath the fig tree, believest thou? thou shalt see greater things than these." And he saith unto him, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Ye shall see the heaven opened, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man."

ii. The First Sign in Cana of Galilee

2 And the third day there was a marriage in Cana of Galilee; and the mother of Jesus was there: and Jesus also was bidden, and his disciples, to the marriage. And when the wine failed, the mother of Jesus saith unto him, 'They have no wine.' And Jesus saith unto her, "Woman, what have I to do with thee? mine hour is not yet come." His mother saith unto the servants, 'Whatsoever he saith unto you, do it.' 5 Now there were six waterpots of stone set there after the Jews' manner of purifying, containing two or three firkins apiece. Jesus saith unto them, "Fill the waterpots with water." And they filled them up to the brim. And he saith unto them, "Draw out now, and bear unto the ruler of the feast." And they bare it. And when the 9 ruler of the feast tasted the water now become wine, and knew not whence it was (but the servants which had drawn the water knew), the ruler of the feast calleth the bridegroom, and saith unto him, 'Every man setteth on first the good wine; and when men have drunk freely, then that which is worse: thou hast kept the good wine until now.'

This beginning of his signs did Jesus in Cana of Galilee, and manifested his glory; 11 and his disciples believed on him.

iii. The Witness in the Temple

After this he went down to Capernaum, he, and his mother, and his brethren, and 12 his disciples: and there they abode not many days.

And the Passover of the Jews was at hand, and Jesus went up to Jerusalem. And he found in the temple those that sold oxen and sheep and doves, and the changers of money sitting: and he made a scourge of cords, and cast all out of the temple, both the sheep and the oxen; and he poured out the changers' money, and overthrew their tables; and to them that sold the doves he said, "Take these things hence; make 16 not my Father's house a house of merchandise." His disciples remembered that it was written, The zeal of thine house shall eat me up. The Jews therefore answered and said unto him, 'What sign shewest thou unto us, seeing that thou doest these things?' Jesus answered and said unto them, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up." The Jews therefore said, 'Forty and six years was this temple in building, and wilt thou raise it up in three days?' But he spake of the temple of 21 his body. When therefore he was raised from the dead, his disciples remembered that he spake this; and they believed the scripture, and the word which Jesus had said.

iv. The Witness to Nicodemus

Now when he was in Jerusalem at the Passover, during the feast, many believed 23 on his name, beholding his signs which he did. But Jesus did not trust himself unto them, for that he knew all men, and because he needed not that any one should bear witness concerning man; for he himself knew what was in man.

Now there was a man of the Pharisees, named Nicodemus, a ruler of the Jews: 3 the same came unto him by night, and said to him,

'Rabbi, we know that thou art a teacher come from God: for no man can do these signs that thou doest, except God be with him.'

Jesus answered and said unto him, "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a 3 man be born anew, he cannot see the kingdom of God."

Nicodemus saith unto him, 'How can a man be born when he is old? can he enter a second time into his mother's womb, and be born?'

5 Jesus answered, "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit. Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born anew. The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the voice thereof, but knowest not whence it cometh, and whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit."

9 Nicodemus answered and said unto him, 'How can these things be?'

Jesus answered and said unto him, "Art thou the teacher of Israel, and understandest not these things? Verily, verily, I say unto thee, We speak that we do know, and bear witness of that we have seen; and ye receive not our witness. If I told you earthly things, and ye believe not, how shall ye believe, if I tell you heavenly 13 things? And no man hath ascended into heaven, but he that descended out of heaven, even the Son of man, which is in heaven. And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up: that whosoever believeth may in him have eternal life."

16 For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have eternal life. For God sent not the Son into the world to judge the world; but that the world should be saved through him. He that believeth on him is not judged: he that believeth not hath been judged already,
19 because he hath not believed on the name of the only begotten Son of God. And this is the judgement, that the light is come into the world, and men loved the darkness rather than the light; for their works were evil. For every one that doeth ill hateth the light, and cometh not to the light, lest his works should be reproved.
21 But he that doeth the truth cometh to the light, that his works may be made manifest, that they have been wrought in God.

v. The Second Witness of John

22 After these things came Jesus and his disciples into the land of Judæa: and there he tarried with them, and baptized. And John also was baptizing in Ænon near to Salim, because there was much water there: and they came, and were baptized. For John was not yet cast into prison. There arose therefore a questioning
26 on the part of John's disciples with a Jew about purifying. And they came unto John, and said to him, 'Rabbi, he that was with thee beyond Jordan, to whom thou hast borne witness, behold, the same baptizeth, and all men come to him.' John answered and said, 'A man can receive nothing, except it have been given him
28 from heaven. Ye yourselves bear me witness, that I said, I am not the Christ, but, that I am sent before him. He that hath the bride is the bridegroom: but the friend of the bridegroom, which standeth and heareth him, rejoiceth greatly because of the bridegroom's voice: this my joy therefore is fulfilled. He must increase, but I must decrease.'

31 He that cometh from above is above all: he that is of the earth is of the earth, and of the earth he speaketh: he that cometh from heaven is above all. What he hath seen and heard, of that he beareth witness; and no man receiveth his witness. He that hath received his witness hath set his seal to this, that God is true. For he whom God hath sent speaketh the words of God: for he giveth not the Spirit 35 by measure. The Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into his hand. He that believeth on the Son hath eternal life; but he that obeyeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him.

vi. The Witness to the Samaritans

When therefore the Lord knew how that the Pharisees had heard that Jesus was 4 making and baptizing more disciples than John (although Jesus himself baptized not, but his disciples), he left Judæa, and departed again into Galilee. And he must needs pass through Samaria. So he cometh to a city of Samaria, called Sychar, near to the parcel of ground that Jacob gave to his son Joseph: and Jacob's well 6 was there. Jesus therefore, being wearied with his journey, sat thus by the well.
It was about the sixth hour. There cometh a woman of Samaria to draw water:
Jesus saith unto her, "Give me to drink." For his disciples were gone away into the city to buy food.

The Samaritan woman therefore saith unto him, 'How is it that thou, being a 9 Jew, askest drink of me, which am a Samaritan woman?'*

Jesus answered and said unto her, "If thou knewest the gift of God, and who it is that saith to thee, Give me to drink; thou wouldest have asked of him, and he would have given thee living water."

The woman saith unto him, 'Sir, thou hast nothing to draw with, and the well 11 is deep: from whence then hast thou that living water? Art thou greater than our father Jacob, which gave us the well, and drank thereof himself, and his sons, and his cattle?'

Jesus answered and said unto her, "Every one that drinketh of this water shall 13 thirst again: but whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall become in him a well of water springing up unto eternal life."

The woman saith unto him, 'Sir, give me this water, that I thirst not, neither come all the way hither to draw.'

Jesus saith unto her, "Go, call thy husband, and come hither." 16

The woman answered and said unto him, 'I have no husband.'

Jesus saith unto her, "Thou saidst well, I have no husband: for thou hast had five husbands; and he whom thou now hast is not thy husband: this hast thou said truly."

The woman saith unto him, 'Sir, I perceive that thou art a prophet. Our fathers 19 worshipped in this mountain; and ye say, that in Jerusalem is the place where men ought to worship.'

Jesus saith unto her, "Woman, believe me, the hour cometh, when neither in this mountain, nor in Jerusalem, shall ye worship the Father. Ye worship that which ye know not: we worship that which we know: for salvation is from the Jews. But the hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship 23 the Father in spirit and truth: for such doth the Father seek to be his worshippers.
God is spirit: and they that worship him must worship in spirit and truth."

The woman saith unto him, 'I know that Messiah cometh' (which is called Christ): 'when he is come, he will declare unto us all things.'

Jesus saith unto her, "I that speak unto thee am he." 26

And upon this came his disciples; and they marvelled that he was speaking with a woman; yet no man said, What seekest thou? or, Why speakest thou with her? So the woman left her waterpot, and went away into the city, and saith to the men, 'Come, see a man, which told me all things that ever I did: can this be the Christ?' They went out of the city, and were coming to him. 30

In the mean while the disciples prayed him, saying, 'Rabbi, eat.'

But he said unto them, "I have meat to eat that ye know not."

*For Jews have no dealings with Samaritans.

33 The disciples therefore said one to another, 'Hath any man brought him aught to eat?'
Jesus saith unto them, "My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, and to accomplish his work. Say not ye, There are yet four months, and then cometh the harvest? behold, I say unto you, Lift up your eyes, and look on the fields, that they 36 are white already unto harvest. He that reapeth receiveth wages, and gathereth fruit unto life eternal; that he that soweth and he that reapeth may rejoice together.
For herein is the saying true, One soweth, and another reapeth. I sent you to reap that whereon ye have not laboured: others have laboured, and ye are entered into their labour."
And from that city many of the Samaritans believed on him because of the word 40 of the woman, who testified, He told me all things that ever I did. So when the Samaritans came unto him, they besought him to abide with them: and he abode there two days. And many more believed because of his word; and they said to the woman, 'Now we believe, not because of thy speaking: for we have heard for ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Saviour of the world.'

vii. The Second Sign in Cana of Galilee

43 And after the two days he went forth from thence into Galilee. For Jesus himself testified, that a prophet hath no honour in his own country. So when he came into Galilee, the Galilæans received him, having seen all the things that he did in Jerusalem at the feast: for they also went unto the feast.
46 He came therefore again unto Cana of Galilee, where he made the water wine.
And there was a certain nobleman, whose son was sick at Capernaum. When he heard that Jesus was come out of Judæa into Galilee, he went unto him, and besought him that he would come down, and heal his son; for he was at the point of death. Jesus therefore said unto him, "Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will 49 in no wise believe." The nobleman saith unto him, 'Sir, come down ere my child die.' Jesus saith unto him, "Go thy way; thy son liveth." The man believed the word that Jesus spake unto him, and he went his way. And as he was now going down, his servants met him, saying that his son lived. So he inquired of them the hour when he began to amend. They said therefore unto him, Yesterday at the 53 seventh hour the fever left him. So the father knew that it was at that hour in which Jesus said unto him, Thy son liveth: and himself believed, and his whole house. This is again the second sign that Jesus did, having come out of Judæa into Galilee.

II

SIGNS AND WITNESS TO THE JEWS

i. Sign at the Pool of Bethesda, and Discourse arising therefrom

5 After these things there was a feast of the Jews; and Jesus went up to Jerusalem.
Now there is in Jerusalem by the sheep gate a pool, which is called in Hebrew Bethesda, having five porches. In these lay a multitude of them that were sick, blind, halt, withered. And a certain man was there, which had been thirty and eight years in his infirmity.
6 When Jesus saw him lying, and knew that he had been now a long time in that case, he saith unto him, "Wouldest thou be made whole?"

The sick man answered him, 'Sir, I have no man, when the water is troubled, 7 to put me into the pool: but while I am coming, another steppeth down before me.'
Jesus saith unto him, "Arise, take up thy bed, and walk." And straightway the man was made whole, and took up his bed and walked.
Now it was the sabbath on that day. So the Jews said unto him that was cured,
'It is the sabbath, and it is not lawful for thee to take up thy bed.'
But he answered them, 'He that made me whole, the same said unto me, Take 11 up thy bed, and walk.'
They asked him, 'Who is the man that said unto thee, Take up thy bed, and walk?'
But he that was healed wist not who it was: for Jesus had conveyed himself away, a multitude being in the place. Afterward Jesus findeth him in the temple, 14 and said unto him, "Behold, thou art made whole: sin no more, lest a worse thing befall thee." The man went away, and told the Jews that it was Jesus which had made him whole.
And for this cause did the Jews persecute Jesus, because he did these things on the sabbath.
But Jesus answered them, "My Father worketh even until now, and I work." 17
For this cause therefore the Jews sought the more to kill him, because he not only brake the sabbath, but also called God his own Father, making himself equal with God.
Jesus therefore answered and said unto them: 19
"Verily, verily, I say unto you, The Son can do nothing of himself, but what he seeth the Father doing: for what things soever he doeth, these the Son also doeth in like manner. For the Father loveth the Son, and sheweth him all things that himself doeth: and greater works than these will he shew him, that ye may marvel.
For as the Father raiseth the dead and quickeneth them, even so the Son also quick- 21 eneth whom he will. For neither doth the Father judge any man, but he hath given all judgement unto the Son; that all may honour the Son, even as they honour the Father. He that honoureth not the Son honoureth not the Father which sent him.
Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that heareth my word, and believeth him that 24 sent me, hath eternal life, and cometh not into judgement, but hath passed out of death into life. Verily, verily, I say unto you, The hour cometh, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God; and they that hear shall live. For as the Father hath life in himself, even so gave he to the Son also to have life in himself: and he gave him authority to execute judgement, because he is the Son of man. 27
Marvel not at this: for the hour cometh, in which all that are in the tombs shall hear his voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done ill, unto the resurrection of judgement.
"I can of myself do nothing: as I hear, I judge: and my judgement is righteous; 30 because I seek not mine own will, but the will of him that sent me. If I bear witness of myself, my witness is not true. It is another that beareth witness of me; and I know that the witness which he witnesseth of me is true. Ye have sent unto John, and he hath borne witness unto the truth. But the witness which I receive is not from man: howbeit I say these things, that ye may be saved. He was the lamp that 35 burneth and shineth: and ye were willing to rejoice for a season in his light. But the witness which I have is greater than that of John: for the works which the Father hath given me to accomplish, the very works that I do, bear witness of me, that the Father hath sent me. And the Father which sent me, he hath borne witness of me.
Ye have neither heard his voice at any time, nor seen his form. And ye have not 38 his word abiding in you: for whom he sent, him ye believe not. Ye search the scriptures, because ye think that in them ye have eternal life; and these are they which bear witness of me; and ye will not come to me, that ye may have life. I 42 receive not glory from men. But I know you, that ye have not the love of God in yourselves. I am come in my Father's name, and ye receive me not: if another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive. How can ye believe, which receive glory one of another, and the glory that cometh from the only God ye seek not?

Think not that I will accuse you to the Father: there is one that accuseth you, even 46 Moses, on whom ye have set your hope. For if ye believed Moses, ye would believe me; for he wrote of me. But if ye believe not his writings, how shall ye believe my words?"

ii. Sign of the Loaves and Fishes, and Disputation arising therefrom

6 After these things Jesus went away to the other side of the sea of Galilee, which is the sea of Tiberias. And a great multitude followed him, because they beheld the signs which he did on them that were sick. And Jesus went up into the mountain, and there he sat with his disciples. Now the Passover, the feast of the Jews, 5 was at hand. Jesus therefore lifting up his eyes, and seeing that a great multitude cometh unto him, saith unto Philip, Whence are we to buy bread, that these may eat? And this he said to prove him: for he himself knew what he would do. Philip answered him, Two hundred pennyworth of bread is not sufficient for them, that every one may take a little. One of his disciples, Andrew, Simon Peter's brother, 9 saith unto him, There is a lad here, which hath five barley loaves, and two fishes:
but what are these among so many? Jesus said, Make the people sit down. Now there was much grass in the place. So the men sat down, in number about five thousand. Jesus therefore took the loaves; and having given thanks, he distributed 12 to them that were set down; likewise also of the fishes as much as they would. And when they were filled, he saith unto his disciples, Gather up the broken pieces which remain over, that nothing be lost. So they gathered them up, and filled twelve baskets with broken pieces from the five barley loaves, which remained over unto them that had eaten. When therefore the people saw the sign which he did, they said, This is of a truth the prophet that cometh into the world.

5 Jesus therefore perceiving that they were about to come and take him by force, to make him king, withdrew again into the mountain himself alone.

And when evening came, his disciples went down unto the sea; and they entered into a boat, and were going over the sea unto Capernaum. And it was now dark, and Jesus had not yet come to them. And the sea was rising by reason of a great 19 wind that blew. When therefore they had rowed about five and twenty or thirty furlongs, they behold Jesus walking on the sea, and drawing nigh unto the boat: and they were afraid. But he saith unto them, It is I; be not afraid. They were willing therefore to receive him into the boat: and straightway the boat was at the land whither they were going.

22 On the morrow the multitude which stood on the other side of the sea saw that there was none other boat there, save one, and that Jesus entered not with his disciples into the boat, but that his disciples went away alone (howbeit there came boats from Tiberias nigh unto the place where they ate the bread after the Lord had given 24 thanks): when the multitude therefore saw that Jesus was not there, neither his disciples, they themselves got into the boats, and came to Capernaum, seeking Jesus.
And when they found him on the other side of the sea, they said unto him, 'Rabbi,
when camest thou hither?'

Jesus answered them and said, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Ye seek me, 27 not because ye saw signs, but because ye ate of the loaves and were filled. Work not for the meat which perisheth, but for the meat which abideth unto eternal life, which the Son of man shall give unto you: for him the Father, even God, hath sealed."

They said therefore unto him, 'What must we do, that we may work the works of God?'

Jesus answered and said unto them, "This is the work of God, that ye believe on 29 him whom he hath sent."

They said therefore unto him, 'What then doest thou for a sign, that we may see, and believe thee? what workest thou? Our fathers ate the manna in the wilderness; as it is written, He gave them bread out of heaven to eat.'

Jesus therefore said unto them, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, It was not Moses 32 that gave you the bread out of heaven; but my Father giveth you the true bread out of heaven. For the bread of God is that which cometh down out of heaven, and giveth life unto the world."

They said therefore unto him, 'Lord, evermore give us this bread.'

Jesus said unto them, "I am the bread of life: he that cometh to me shall not 35 hunger, and he that believeth on me shall never thirst. But I said unto you, that ye have seen me, and yet believe not. All that which the Father giveth me shall come unto me; and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out. For I am come down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me. And this is 39 the will of him that sent me, that of all that which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up at the last day. For this is the will of my Father, that every one that beholdeth the Son, and believeth on him, should have eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day."

The Jews therefore murmured concerning him, because he said, I am the bread 41 which came down out of heaven. And they said, 'Is not this Jesus, the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know? how doth he now say, I am come down out of heaven?'

Jesus answered and said unto them, "Murmur not among yourselves. No man 43 can come to me, except the Father which sent me draw him: and I will raise him up in the last day. It is written in the prophets, And they shall all be taught of God. Every one that hath heard from the Father, and hath learned, cometh unto me. Not that any man hath seen the Father, save he which is from God, he hath seen the Father. Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that believeth hath eternal life. I am the bread 48 of life. Your fathers did eat the manna in the wilderness, and they died. This is the bread which cometh down out of heaven, that a man may eat thereof, and not die. I am the living bread which came down out of heaven: if any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever: yea and the bread which I will give is my flesh, for the life of the world."

flesh to eat?'

Jesus therefore said unto them, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man and drink his blood, ye have not life in yourselves. He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day. For my flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed. He that 54 eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood abideth in me, and I in him. As the living Father sent me, and I live because of the Father; so he that eateth me, he also shall live because of me. This is the bread which came down out of heaven: not as the fathers did eat, and died: he that eateth this bread shall live for ever."

These things said he in the synagogue, as he taught in Capernaum. Many there- 59 fore of his disciples, when they heard this, said, 'This is a hard saying; who can hear it?'

But Jesus, knowing in himself that his disciples murmured at this, said unto them, "Doth this cause you to stumble? What then if ye should behold the Son of man as- 62 cending where he was before? It is the spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing: the words that I have spoken unto you are spirit, and are life. But there are some of you that believe not." For Jesus knew from the beginning who they were 65 that believed not, and who it was that should betray him. And he said, "For this cause have I said unto you, that no man can come unto me, except it be given unto him of the Father."

Upon this many of his disciples went back, and walked no more with him. Jesus said therefore unto the twelve, "Would ye also go away?"

68 Simon Peter answered him, 'Lord, to whom shall we go? thou hast the words of eternal life. And we have believed and know that thou art the Holy One of God.'

Jesus answered them, "Did not I choose you the twelve, and one of you is a devil?" Now he spake of Judas the son of Simon Iscariot, for he it was that should betray him, being one of the twelve.

iii. Witness and Disputation at the Feast of Tabernacles

7 And after these things Jesus walked in Galilee: for he would not walk in Judæa, because the Jews sought to kill him. Now the feast of the Jews, the Feast of Tabernacles, was at hand.

His brethren therefore said unto him, 'Depart hence, and go into Judæa, that thy disciples also may behold thy works which thou doest. For no man doeth anything in secret, and himself seeketh to be known openly. If thou doest these things, manifest 5 thyself to the world.' For even his brethren did not believe on him.

Jesus therefore saith unto them, "My time is not yet come; but your time is alway ready. The world cannot hate you; but me it hateth, because I testify of it, that its works are evil. Go ye up unto the feast: I go not up yet unto this feast; because my time is not yet fulfilled."

9 And having said these things unto them, he abode still in Galilee. But when his brethren were gone up unto the feast, then went he also up, not publicly, but as it were in secret. The Jews therefore sought him at the feast, and said, Where is he? And there was much murmuring among the multitudes concerning him: some said, He is a good man; others said, Not so, but he leadeth the multitude astray. Howbeit no man spake openly of him for fear of the Jews.

14 But when it was now the midst of the feast Jesus went up into the temple, and taught.

The Jews therefore marvelled, saying, 'How knoweth this man letters, having never learned?'

Jesus therefore answered them, and said, "My teaching is not mine, but his that 17 sent me. If any man willeth to do his will, he shall know of the teaching, whether it be of God, or whether I speak from myself. He that speaketh from himself seeketh his own glory: but he that seeketh the glory of him that sent him, the same is true, and no unrighteousness is in him. Did not Moses give you the law, and yet none of you doeth the law? Why seek ye to kill me?"

20 The multitude answered, 'Thou hast a devil: who seeketh to kill thee?'

Jesus answered and said unto them, "I did one work, and ye all marvel. For this cause hath Moses given you circumcision (not that it is of Moses, but of the fathers); and on the sabbath ye circumcise a man. If a man receiveth circumcision on the sabbath, that the law of Moses may not be broken; are ye wroth with 24 me, because I made a man every whit whole on the sabbath? Judge not according to appearance, but judge righteous judgement."

Some therefore of them of Jerusalem said, 'Is not this he whom they seek to kill? And lo, he speaketh openly, and they say nothing unto him. Can it be that the rulers indeed know that this is the Christ? Howbeit we know this man whence he is: but when the Christ cometh, no one knoweth whence he is.'

28 Jesus therefore cried in the temple, teaching and saying, "Ye both know me, and know whence I am; and I am not come of myself, but he that sent me is true, whom ye know not. I know him; because I am from him, and he sent me."

They sought therefore to take him: and no man laid his hand on him, because his 30 hour was not yet come. But of the multitude many believed on him; and they said, When the Christ shall come, will he do more signs than those which this man hath done? The Pharisees heard the multitude murmuring these things concerning him; and the chief priests and the Pharisees sent officers to take him.

Jesus therefore said, "Yet a little while am I with you, and I go unto him that sent 33 me. Ye shall seek me, and shall not find me: and where I am, ye cannot come."

The Jews therefore said among themselves, 'Whither will this man go that we shall not find him? will he go unto the Dispersion among the Greeks, and teach the Greeks? What is this word that he said, Ye shall seek me, and shall not find me: and where I am, ye cannot come?'

Now on the last day, the great day of the feast, Jesus stood and cried, saying, 37
"If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink. He that believeth on me, as the scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water." But this spake he of the Spirit, which they that believed on him were to receive: for the Spirit was not yet given; because Jesus was not yet glorified.

Some of the multitude therefore, when they heard these words, said, 'This is of a 40 truth the prophet.' Others said, 'This is the Christ.' But some said, 'What, doth the Christ come out of Galilee? Hath not the scripture said that the Christ cometh of the seed of David, and from Bethlehem, the village where David was?' So there arose a division in the multitude because of him. And some of them would have taken him; but no man laid hands on him.

The officers therefore came to the chief priests and Pharisees; and they said unto 45 them, 'Why did ye not bring him?'

The officers answered, 'Never man so spake.'

The Pharisees therefore answered them, 'Are ye also led astray? Hath any of the rulers believed on him, or of the Pharisees? But this multitude which knoweth not the law are accursed.'

Nicodemus saith unto them (he that came to him before, being one of them), 50
'Doth our law judge a man, except it first hear from himself and know what he doeth?'

They answered and said unto him, 'Art thou also of Galilee? Search, and see that out of Galilee ariseth no prophet.'

Again therefore Jesus spake unto them, saying, "I am the light of the world: he 8 12 that followeth me shall not walk in the darkness, but shall have the light of life."

The Pharisees therefore said unto him, 'Thou bearest witness of thyself; thy witness is not true.'

Jesus answered and said unto them, "Even if I bear witness of myself, my witness 14 is true: for I know whence I came, and whither I go; but ye know not whence I come, or whither I go. Ye judge after the flesh; I judge no man. Yea and if I judge, my judgement is true: for I am not alone, but I and the Father that sent me. Yea and in your law it is written, that the witness of two men is true. I am he that 18 beareth witness of myself, and the Father that sent me beareth witness of me."

They said therefore unto him, 'Where is thy Father?'

Jesus answered, "Ye know neither me, nor my Father: if ye knew me, ye would know my Father also."

These words spake he in the treasury, as he taught in the temple: and no man took 20 him; because his hour was not yet come.

He said therefore again unto them, "I go away, and ye shall seek me, and shall die in your sin: whither I go, ye cannot come."

The Jews therefore said, 'Will he kill himself, that he saith, Whither I go, ye cannot come?'

23 And he said unto them, "Ye are from beneath; I am from above; ye are of this world; I am not of this world. I said therefore unto you, that ye shall die in your sins: for except ye believe that I am he, ye shall die in your sins."

They said therefore unto him, 'Who art thou?'

Jesus said unto them, "Even that which I have also spoken unto you from the 26 beginning. I have many things to speak and to judge concerning you: howbeit he that sent me is true; and the things which I heard from him, these speak I unto the world."

They perceived not that he spake to them of the Father.

28 Jesus therefore said, "When ye have lifted up the Son of man, then shall ye know that I am he, and that I do nothing of myself, but as the Father taught me, I speak these things. And he that sent me is with me; he hath not left me alone; for I do always the things that are pleasing to him."

31 As he spake these things, many believed on him. Jesus therefore said to those Jews which had believed him, "If ye abide in my word, then are ye truly my disciples; and ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free."

They answered unto him, 'We be Abraham's seed, and have never yet been in bondage to any man: how sayest thou, Ye shall be made free?'

34 Jesus answered them, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Every one that committeth sin is the bondservant of sin. And the bondservant abideth not in the house for ever: the son abideth for ever. If therefore the Son shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed. I know that ye are Abraham's seed; yet ye seek to kill me, because my word 38 hath not free course in you. I speak the things which I have seen with my Father: and ye also do the things which ye heard from your father."

They answered and said unto him, 'Our father is Abraham.'

Jesus saith unto them, "If ye were Abraham's children, ye would do the works of Abraham. But now ye seek to kill me, a man that hath told you the truth, which 41 I heard from God: this did not Abraham. Ye do the works of your father."

They said unto him, 'We were not born of fornication; we have one Father, even God.'

Jesus said unto them, "If God were your Father, ye would love me: for I came forth and am come from God; for neither have I come of myself, but he sent me.
43 Why do ye not understand my speech? Even because ye cannot hear my word. Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father it is your will to do. He was a murderer from the beginning, and stood not in the truth, because there is no truth in him. When he speaketh a lie, he speaketh of his own: for he is a liar, and 45 the father thereof. But because I say the truth, ye believe me not. Which of you convicteth me of sin? If I say truth, why do ye not believe me? He that is of God heareth the words of God: for this cause ye hear them not, because ye are not of God."

The Jews answered and said unto him, 'Say we not well that thou art a Samaritan, and hast a devil?'

49 Jesus answered, "I have not a devil; but I honour my Father, and ye dishonour me. But I seek not mine own glory: there is one that seeketh and judgeth. Verily, verily, I say unto you, If a man keep my word, he shall never see death."

The Jews said unto him, 'Now we know that thou hast a devil. Abraham is dead, and the prophets; and thou sayest, If a man keep my word, he shall never taste 53 of death. Art thou greater than our father Abraham, which is dead? and the prophets are dead: whom makest thou thyself?'

Jesus answered, "If I glorify myself, my glory is nothing: it is my Father that glorifieth me; of whom ye say, that he is your God; and ye have not known him: but I know him; and if I should say, I know him not, I shall be like unto you, a liar: but 56 I know him, and keep his word. Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day; and he saw it, and was glad."

The Jews therefore said unto him, 'Thou art not yet fifty years old, and hast thou 57 seen Abraham?'

Jesus said unto them, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Before Abraham was, I am."

They took up stones therefore to cast at him: but Jesus hid himself, and went out 59 of the temple.

iv. Sign of the Man born blind, and the ensuing Controversy

And as he passed by, he saw a man blind from his birth. And his disciples asked 9 him, saying, 'Rabbi, who did sin, this man, or his parents, that he should be born blind?'

Jesus answered, "Neither did this man sin, nor his parents; but that the works of God should be made manifest in him. We must work the works of him that sent 4 me, while it is day; the night cometh, when no man can work. When I am in the world, I am the light of the world."

When he had thus spoken, he spat on the ground, and made clay of the spittle, and anointed his eyes with the clay, and said unto him, Go, wash in the pool of 'Si- 7 loam' (which is by interpretation, 'Sent'). He went away therefore, and washed, and came seeing.

The neighbours, therefore, and they which saw him aforetime, that he was a beggar, said, 'Is not this he that sat and begged?' Others said, 'It is he:' others 9 said, 'No, but he is like him.'

He said, 'I am he.'

They said therefore unto him, 'How then were thine eyes opened?'

He answered, 'The man that is called Jesus made clay, and anointed mine eyes, 11 and said unto me, Go to Siloam, and wash: so I went away and washed, and I received sight.'

And they said unto him, 'Where is he?'

He saith, 'I know not.'

They bring to the Pharisees him that aforetime was blind. Now it was the 13 sabbath on the day when Jesus made the clay, and opened his eyes. Again therefore the Pharisees also asked him how he received his sight.

And he said unto them, 'He put clay upon mine eyes, and I washed, and do see.'

Some therefore of the Pharisees said, 'This man is not from God, because he 16 keepeth not the sabbath.' But others said, 'How can a man that is a sinner do such signs?' And there was a division among them.

They say therefore unto the blind man again, 'What sayest thou of him, in that he opened thine eyes?'

And he said, 'He is a prophet.'

The Jews therefore did not believe concerning him, that he had been blind, and 18 had received his sight, until they called the parents of him that had received his sight, and asked them, saying, 'Is this your son, who ye say was born blind? how then doth he now see?'

His parents answered and said, 'We know that this is our son, and that he was 20 born blind: but how he now seeth, we know not; or who opened his eyes, we know not: ask him; he is of age: he shall speak for himself.' These things said his parents, because they feared the Jews: for the Jews had agreed already, that if any man should confess him to be Christ, he should be put out of the synagogue. There- 23 fore said his parents, He is of age; ask him.

So they called a second time the man that was blind, and said unto him, 'Give glory to God: we know that this man is a sinner.'

25 He therefore answered, 'Whether he be a sinner, I know not: one thing I know, that, whereas I was blind, now I see.'

They said therefore unto him, 'What did he to thee? how opened he thine eyes?'

27 He answered them, 'I told you even now, and ye did not hear: wherefore would ye hear it again? would ye also become his disciples?'

And they reviled him, and said, 'Thou art his disciple; but we are disciples of Moses. We know that God hath spoken unto Moses: but as for this man, we know not whence he is.'

30 The man answered and said unto them, 'Why, herein is the marvel, that ye know not whence he is, and yet he opened mine eyes. We know that God heareth not sinners: but if any man be a worshipper of God, and do his will, him he heareth. Since the world began it was never heard that any one opened the eyes of a man born blind. If this man were not from God, he could do nothing.'

34 They answered and said unto him, 'Thou wast altogether born in sins, and dost thou teach us?' And they cast him out.

Jesus heard that they had cast him out; and finding him, he said, "Dost thou believe on the Son of God?"

36 He answered and said, 'And who is he, Lord, that I may believe on him?'

Jesus said unto him, "Thou hast both seen him, and he it is that speaketh with thee."

And he said, 'Lord, I believe.' And he worshipped him.

39 And Jesus said, "For judgement came I into this world, that they which see not may see; and that they which see may become blind."

Those of the Pharisees which were with him heard these things, and said unto him, 'Are we also blind?'

41 Jesus said unto them, "If ye were blind, ye would have no sin: but now ye say, We see: your sin remaineth."

v. Parable of the Good Shepherd, and Dissensions arising therefrom

10 "Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that entereth not by the door into the fold of the sheep, but climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber. But he that entereth in by the door is the shepherd of the sheep. To him the porter openeth; and the sheep hear his voice: and he calleth his own sheep by name, and 4 leadeth them out. When he hath put forth all his own, he goeth before them, and the sheep follow him: for they know his voice. And a stranger will they not follow, but will flee from him: for they know not the voice of strangers."

This parable spake Jesus unto them: but they understood not what things they 7 were which he spake unto them. Jesus therefore said unto them again, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, I am the door of the sheep. All that came before me are thieves and robbers: but the sheep did not hear them. I am the door: by me if any man enter in, he shall be saved, and shall go in and go out, and shall find pasture. The thief cometh not, but that he may steal, and kill and destroy: I came 11 that they may have life, and may have it abundantly. I am the good shepherd. the good shepherd layeth down his life for the sheep. He that is a hireling, and no a shepherd, whose own the sheep are not, beholdeth the wolf coming, and leaveth the sheep, and fleeth, and the wolf snatcheth them, and scattereth them: he fleeth because he is a hireling, and careth not for the sheep. I am the good shepherd; and I know mine own, and mine own know me, even as the Father knoweth me, and 16 I know the Father; and I lay down my life for the sheep. And other sheep I have, which are not of this fold: them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice; and they shall become one flock, one shepherd. Therefore doth the Father love me, because I lay down my life, that I may take it again. No one taketh it away 18 from me, but I lay it down of myself. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again. This commandment received I from my Father."

There arose a division again among the Jews because of these words. And 19 many of them said, 'He hath a devil, and is mad; why hear ye him?' Others said, 'These are not the sayings of one possessed with a devil. Can a devil open the eyes of the blind?'

And it was the Feast of the Dedication at Jerusalem: it was winter; and Jesus 22 was walking in the temple in Solomon's porch. The Jews therefore came round about him, and said unto him, 'How long dost thou hold us in suspense? If thou art the Christ, tell us plainly.'

Jesus answered them, "I told you, and ye believe not: the works that I do in 25 my Father's name, these bear witness of me. But ye believe not, because ye are not of my sheep. My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me: and I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, and no one shall snatch them out of my hand. My Father, which hath given them unto me, is greater than 29 all; and no one is able to snatch them out of the Father's hand. I and the Father are one."

The Jews took up stones again to stone him.

Jesus answered them, "Many good works have I shewed you from the Father; 32 for which of those works do ye stone me?"

The Jews answered him, 'For a good work we stone thee not, but for blasphemy; and because that thou, being a man, makest thyself God.'

Jesus answered them, "Is it not written in your law, I said, Ye are gods? If 34 he called them gods, unto whom the word of God came (and the scripture cannot be broken), say ye of him, whom the Father sanctified and sent into the world, Thou blasphemest; because I said, I am the Son of God? If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not. But if I do them, though ye believe not me, believe the 38 works: that ye may know and understand that the Father is in me, and I in the Father."

They sought again to take him: and he went forth out of their hand.

vi. Sign of the Raising of Lazarus, and Counsels of Death

And he went away again beyond Jordan into the place where John was at the 40 first baptizing; and there he abode. And many came unto him; and they said, John indeed did no sign: but all things whatsoever John spake of this man were true. And many believed on him there.

Now a certain man was sick, Lazarus of Bethany, of the village of Mary and her 11 sister Martha. And it was that Mary which anointed the Lord with ointment, and wiped his feet with her hair, whose brother Lazarus was sick. The sisters therefore sent unto him, saying, 'Lord, behold, he whom thou lovest is sick.' But when Jesus heard it, he said, "This sickness is not unto death, but for the glory of God, that the Son of God may be glorified thereby." Now Jesus loved Martha, and her 5 sister, and Lazarus. When therefore he heard that he was sick, he abode at that time two days in the place where he was. Then after this he saith to the disciples, "Let us go into Judæa again." The disciples say unto him, 'Rabbi, the Jews were but now seeking to stone thee; and goest thou thither again?' Jesus answered, "Are 9 there not twelve hours in the day? If a man walk in the day, he stumbleth not, because he seeth the light of this world. But if a man walk in the night, he stumbleth, because the light is not in him." These things spake he: and after this he saith unto them, "Our friend Lazarus is fallen asleep; but I go, that I may awake him out of sleep." The disciples therefore said unto him, 'Lord, if he is fallen 12

13 asleep, he will recover.' Now Jesus had spoken of his death: but they thought that he spake of taking rest in sleep. Then Jesus therefore said unto them plainly, "Lazarus is dead. And I am glad for your sakes that I was not there, to the intent ye may believe; nevertheless let us go unto him." Thomas therefore, who is called Didymus, said unto his fellow-disciples, 'Let us also go, that we may die with him.'
17 So when Jesus came, he found that he had been in the tomb four days already.
Now Bethany was nigh unto Jerusalem, about fifteen furlongs off; and many of the Jews had come to Martha and Mary, to console them concerning their brother.
Martha therefore, when she heard that Jesus was coming, went and met him: but 21 Mary still sat in the house. Martha therefore said unto Jesus, 'Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died. And even now I know that, whatsoever thou shalt ask of God, God will give thee.' Jesus saith unto her, "Thy brother shall rise again." Martha saith unto him, 'I know that he shall rise again in the resurrec-25 tion at the last day.' Jesus said unto her, "I am the resurrection, and the life:
he that believeth on me, though he die, yet shall he live: and whosoever liveth and believeth on me shall never die. Believest thou this?" She saith unto him, 'Yea, Lord: I have believed that thou art the Christ, the Son of God, even he that cometh into the world.'
28 And when she had said this, she went away, and called Mary her sister secretly, saying, The Master is here, and calleth thee. And she, when she heard it, arose quickly, and went unto him. (Now Jesus was not yet come into the village, but was still in the place where Martha met him.) The Jews then which were with her in the house, and were comforting her, when they saw Mary, that she rose up quickly and went out, followed her, supposing that she was going unto the tomb to weep 32 there. Mary therefore, when she came where Jesus was, and saw him, fell down at his feet, saying unto him, 'Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died.'
When Jesus therefore saw her weeping, and the Jews also weeping which came with her, he groaned in the spirit, and was troubled, and said, "Where have ye laid him?"
They say unto him, 'Lord, come and see.' Jesus wept. The Jews therefore said, 37 'Behold how he loved him!' But some of them said, 'Could not this man, which opened the eyes of him that was blind, have caused that this man also should not die?' Jesus therefore again groaning in himself cometh to the tomb. Now it was a cave, and a stone lay against it. Jesus saith, "Take ye away the stone."
Martha, the sister of him that was dead, saith unto him, 'Lord, by this time he 40 stinketh: for he hath been dead four days.' Jesus saith unto her, "Said I not unto thee, that, if thou believedst, thou shouldest see the glory of God?" So they took away the stone. And Jesus lifted up his eyes, and said, "Father, I thank thee that thou heardest me. And I knew that thou hearest me always: but because of the multitude which standeth around I said it, that they may believe that thou didst 43 send me." And when he had thus spoken, he cried with a loud voice, "Lazarus, come forth." He that was dead came forth, bound hand and foot with grave-clothes; and his face was bound about with a napkin. Jesus saith unto them, "Loose him, and let him go."

Many therefore of the Jews, which came to Mary and beheld that which he did, believed on him. But some of them went away to the Pharisees, and told them the things which Jesus had done.

47 The chief priests therefore and the Pharisees gathered a council, and said, 'What do we? for this man doeth many signs. If we let him thus alone, all men will believe on him: and the Romans will come and take away both our place and our nation.' But a certain one of them, Caiaphas, being high priest that year, said unto them, 'Ye know nothing at all, nor do ye take account that it is expedient for you that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish 51 not.' Now this he said not of himself: but being high priest that year, he prophe sied that Jesus should die for the nation; and not for the nation only, but that he might also gather together into one the children of God that are scattered abroad. So from that day forth they took counsel that they might put him to death.

Jesus therefore walked no more openly among the Jews, but departed thence into 54 the country near to the wilderness, into a city called Ephraim; and there he tarried with the disciples.

vii. Witness of the Multitude at the entering into Jerusalem

Now the Passover of the Jews was at hand: and many went up to Jerusalem 55 out of the country before the Passover, to purify themselves. They sought therefore for Jesus, and spake one with another, as they stood in the temple, What think ye? That he will not come to the feast? Now the chief priests and the Pharisees had given commandment, that, if any man knew where he was, he should shew it, that they might take him.

Jesus therefore six days before the Passover came to Bethany, where Lazarus 12 was, whom Jesus raised from the dead. So they made him a supper there: and Martha served; but Lazarus was one of them that sat at meat with him. Mary therefore took a pound of ointment of spikenard, very precious, and anointed the feet of Jesus, and wiped his feet with her hair: and the house was filled with the odour of the ointment. But Judas Iscariot, one of his disciples, which should be- 4 tray him, saith, 'Why was not this ointment sold for three hundred pence, and given to the poor?' Now this he said, not because he cared for the poor; but because he was a thief, and having the bag took away what was put therein. Jesus therefore said, "Suffer her to keep it against the day of my burying. For the poor ye have always with you; but me ye have not always."

The common people therefore of the Jews learned that he was there: and they 9 came, not for Jesus' sake only, but that they might see Lazarus also, whom he had raised from the dead. But the chief priests took counsel that they might put Lazarus also to death; because that by reason of him many of the Jews went away, and believed on Jesus.

On the morrow a great multitude that had come to the feast, when they heard 12 that Jesus was coming to Jerusalem, took the branches of the palm trees, and went forth to meet him, and cried out, 'Hosanna: Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord, even the King of Israel.' And Jesus, having found a young ass, sat thereon; as it is written, Fear not, daughter of Zion: behold, thy King cometh, sitting 15 on an ass's colt. These things understood not his disciples at the first: but when Jesus was glorified, then remembered they that these things were written of him, and that they had done these things unto him. The multitude therefore that was with him when he called Lazarus out of the tomb, and raised him from the dead, bare witness. For this cause also the multitude went and met him, for that they 18 heard that he had done this sign. The Pharisees therefore said among themselves, Behold how ye prevail nothing: lo, the world is gone after him.

Now there were certain Greeks among those that went up to worship at the feast: these therefore came to Philip, which was of Bethsaida of Galilee, and asked him, saying, Sir, we would see Jesus. Philip cometh and telleth Andrew: Andrew cometh, and Philip, and they tell Jesus.

And Jesus answereth them, saying, "The hour is come, that the Son of man should 23 be glorified. Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except a grain of wheat fall into the earth and die, it abideth by itself alone; but if it die, it beareth much fruit. He that loveth his life loseth it; and he that hateth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eternal. If any man serve me, let him follow me; and where I am, there shall also my servant 26 be: if any man serve me, him will the Father honour. Now is my soul troubled; and what shall I say? Father, save me from this hour. But for this cause came I unto 28 this hour. Father, glorify thy name."

There came therefore a voice out of heaven, saying, "I have both glorified it, and will glorify it again." The multitude therefore, that stood by, and heard it, said that it had thundered: others said, An angel hath spoken to him.

Jesus answered and said, "This voice hath not come for my sake, but for your sakes. Now is the judgement of this world: now shall the prince of this world be 32 cast out. And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto myself." But this he said, signifying by what manner of death he should die.

The multitude therefore answered him, 'We have heard out of the law that the Christ abideth for ever: and how sayest thou, The Son of man must be lifted up? who is this Son of man?'

35 Jesus therefore said unto them, "Yet a little while is the light among you. Walk while ye have the light, that darkness overtake you not: and he that walketh in the darkness knoweth not whither he goeth. While ye have the light, believe on the light, that ye may become sons of light." These things spake Jesus, and he departed and hid himself from them.

37 But though he had done so many signs before them, yet they believed not on him:
that the word of Isaiah the prophet might be fulfilled, which he spake,

Lord, who hath believed our report?
And to whom hath the arm of the Lord been revealed?

39 For this cause they could not believe, for that Isaiah said again, He hath blinded their eyes, and he hardened their heart; lest they should see with their eyes, and perceive with their heart, and should turn, and I should heal them. These things said Isaiah, because he saw his glory; and he spake of him. Nevertheless even of the rulers many believed on him; but because of the Pharisees they did not confess it, lest they should be put out of the synagogue: for they loved the glory of men more than the glory of God.

44 And Jesus cried and said, "He that believeth on me, believeth not on me, but on him that sent me. And he that beholdeth me beholdeth him that sent me. I am come a light into the world, that whosoever believeth on me may not abide in the darkness. And if any man hear my sayings, and keep them not, I judge him not: for I came not to judge the world, but to save the world. He that rejecteth me, and receiveth not my sayings, hath one that judgeth him: the word that I spake, the same 49 shall judge him in the last day. For I spake not from myself; but the Father which sent me, he hath given me a commandment, what I should say, and what I should speak. And I know that his commandment is life eternal: the things therefore which I speak, even as the Father hath said unto me, so I speak."

III

SIGNS AND WITNESS OF JESUS AMONG HIS OWN DISCIPLES

i. The Last Supper

13 Now before the feast of the Passover, Jesus knowing that his hour was come that he should depart out of this world unto the Father, having loved his own which were in the world, he loved them unto the end. And during supper, the devil having already put into the heart of Judas Iscariot, Simon's son, to betray him, Jesus, knowing that the Father had given all things into his hands, and that he came forth from God, and goeth unto God, riseth from supper, and layeth aside his garments; 4 and he took a towel, and girded himself. Then he poureth water into the bason, and began to wash the disciples' feet, and to wipe them with the towel wherewith he was girded. So he cometh to Simon Peter. He saith unto him, 'Lord, dost thou wash my feet?' Jesus answered and said unto him, "What I do thou knowest not now; but thou shalt understand hereafter." Peter saith unto him, 'Thou shalt never 8 wash my feet.' Jesus answered him, "If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with me." Simon Peter saith unto him, 'Lord, not my feet only, but also my hands and my head.' Jesus saith to him, "He that is bathed needeth not save to wash his feet, but is clean every whit: and ye are clean, — but not all." For he knew him that should betray him; therefore said he, Ye are not all clean.

So when he had washed their feet, and taken his garments, and sat down again, 12 he said unto them, "Know ye what I have done to you? Ye call me, Master, and, Lord: and ye say well; for so I am. If I then, the Lord and the Master, have washed your feet, ye also ought to wash one another's feet. For I have given you an example, that ye also should do as I have done to you. Verily, verily, I say unto you, A servant is not greater than his lord; neither one that is sent greater than he that sent him. If ye know these things, blessed are ye if ye do them. —

"I speak not of you all: I know whom I have chosen: but that the scripture may 18 be fulfilled, He that eateth my bread lifted up his heel against me. From henceforth I tell you before it come to pass, that, when it is come to pass, ye may believe that I am he. —

"Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that receiveth whomsoever I send receiveth me; and he that receiveth me receiveth him that sent me." —

When Jesus had thus said, he was troubled in the spirit, and testified, and said, 21
"Verily, verily, I say unto you, that one of you shall betray me."

The disciples looked one on another, doubting of whom he spake. There was at the table reclining in Jesus' bosom one of his disciples, whom Jesus loved. Simon Peter therefore beckoneth to him, and saith unto him, 'Tell us who it is of whom he speaketh.' He leaning back, as he was, on Jesus' breast saith unto him, 'Lord, who is it?'

Jesus therefore answereth, "He it is, for whom I shall dip the sop, and give it him." 26
So when he had dipped the sop, he taketh and giveth it to Judas, the son of Simon Iscariot. And after the sop, then entered Satan into him. Jesus therefore saith unto him, "That thou doest, do quickly." Now no man at the table knew for what intent he spake this unto him. For some thought, because Judas had the bag, that Jesus 29 said unto him, Buy what things we have need of for the feast; or, that he should give something to the poor.

He then having received the sop went out straightway. And it was night.

ii. Discourse of the Departure of Jesus and the Comforter to come

When therefore he was gone out, Jesus saith, "Now is the Son of man glorified, and 31
God is glorified in him; and God shall glorify him in himself, and straightway shall he glorify him. Little children, yet a little while I am with you. Ye shall seek me: and as I said unto the Jews, Whither I go, ye cannot come; so now I say unto you. A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another; even as I have loved 34 you, that ye also love one another. By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another."

Simon Peter saith unto him, 'Lord, whither goest thou?'

Jesus answereth, "Whither I go, thou canst not follow me now; but thou shalt follow afterwards."

37 Peter saith unto him, 'Lord, why cannot I follow thee even now? I will lay down my life for thee.'

Jesus answereth, "Wilt thou lay down thy life for me? Verily, verily, I say unto thee, The cock shall not crow, till thou hast denied me thrice.

14 "Let not your heart be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in me. In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you; for I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I come again, and will receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also. And whither I go, ye know the way."

5 Thomas saith unto him, 'Lord, we know not whither thou goest; how know we the way?'

Jesus saith unto him, "I am the way, and the truth, and the life: no one cometh unto the Father but through me. If ye had known me, ye would have known my Father also: from henceforth ye know him, and have seen him."

8 Philip saith unto him, 'Lord, shew us the Father, and it sufficeth us.'

Jesus saith unto him, "Have I been so long time with you, and dost thou not know me, Philip? he that hath seen me hath seen the Father: how sayest thou, Shew us the Father? Believest thou not that I am in the Father, and the Father in me? the words that I say unto you I speak not from myself: but the Father abiding in me doeth 11 his works. Believe me that I am in the Father and the Father in me: or else believe me for the very works' sake. Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also; and greater works than these shall he do; because I go unto the Father. And whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son. If ye shall ask me anything in my name, 15 that will I do. If ye love me, ye will keep my commandments. And I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may be with you for ever, even the Spirit of truth: whom the world cannot receive; for it beholdeth him not, neither knoweth him: ye know him; for he abideth with you, and shall be in you. I will not leave you desolate: I come unto you. Yet a little while, and the world 20 beholdeth me no more; but ye behold me: because I live, ye shall live also. In that day ye shall know that I am in my Father, and ye in me, and I in you. He that hath my commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me: and he that loveth me shall be loved of my Father, and I will love him, and will manifest myself unto him."

22 Judas (not Iscariot) saith unto him, 'Lord, what is come to pass that thou wilt manifest thyself unto us, and not unto the world?'

Jesus answered and said unto him, "If a man love me, he will keep my word: and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him. 24 He that loveth me not keepeth not my words: and the word which ye hear is not mine, but the Father's who sent me. These things have I spoken unto you, while yet abiding with you. But the Comforter, even the Holy Spirit, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring to your remembrance all that I said 27 unto you. Peace I leave with you; my peace I give unto you: not as the world giveth, give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be fearful. Ye heard how I said to you, I go away, and I come unto you. If ye loved me, ye would have rejoiced, because I go unto the Father: for the Father is greater than I. And now I have told you before it come to pass, that, when it is come to 30 pass, ye may believe. I will no more speak much with you, for the prince of the world cometh: and he hath nothing in me; but that the world may know that I love the Father, and as the Father gave me commandment, even so I do. Arise, let us go hence."

iii. Parable of the Vine: Relation of the Disciples to their Master and to the Father

"I am the true vine, and my Father is the husbandman. Every branch in me that 15 beareth not fruit, he taketh it away: and every branch that beareth fruit, he cleanseth it, that it may bear more fruit. Already ye are clean because of the word which I have spoken unto you. Abide in me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; so neither can ye, except ye abide in me. I am the vine, ye are the branches: he that abideth in me, and I in him, the same beareth much fruit: for apart from me ye can do nothing. If a man abide not in me, 6 he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered; and they gather them, and cast them into the fire, and they are burned. If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ask whatsoever ye will, and it shall be done unto you. Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit; and so shall ye be my disciples.

"Even as the Father hath loved me, I also have loved you: abide ye in my love. 9
If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love; even as I have kept my Father's commandments, and abide in his love. These things have I spoken unto you, that my joy may be in you, and that your joy may be fulfilled. This is my commandment, that ye love one another, even as I have loved you. Greater love hath no 13 man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends. Ye are my friends, if ye do the things which I command you. No longer do I call you servants; for the servant knoweth not what his lord doeth: but I have called you friends; for all things that I heard from my Father I have made known unto you. Ye did not choose 16 me, but I chose you, and appointed you, that ye should go and bear fruit, and that your fruit should abide: that whatsoever ye shall ask of the Father in my name, he may give it you. These things I command you, that ye may love one another.

"If the world hateth you, know ye that it hath hated me before it hated you. 18
If ye were of the world, the world would love its own: but because ye are not of the world, but I chose you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you. Remember the word that I said unto you, A servant is not greater than his lord. If they persecuted me, they will also persecute you; if they kept my word, they will keep yours also. But all these things will they do unto you for my name's sake, because 21 they know not him that sent me. If I had not come and spoken unto them, they had not had sin: but now they have no excuse for their sin. He that hateth me hateth my Father also. If I had not done among them the works which none other did, they had not had sin: but now have they both seen and hated both me and my Father. But 25 this cometh to pass, that the word may be fulfilled that is written in their law, They hated me without a cause. But when the Comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the Father, he shall bear witness of me: and ye also bear witness, because ye have been with me from the beginning. These things have I spoken unto you, that ye should not be made to 16 stumble. They shall put you out of the synagogues: yea, the hour cometh, that whosoever killeth you shall think that he offereth service unto God. And these things will they do, because they have not known the Father, nor me. But these things have I spoken unto you, that when their hour is come, ye may remember them, how that I told you.

"And these things I said not unto you from the beginning, because I was with you.
But now I go unto him that sent me; and none of you asketh me, Whither goest thou? 5
But because I have spoken these things unto you, sorrow hath filled your heart.
Nevertheless I tell you the truth; It is expedient for you that I go away: for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I go, I will send him unto you.
And he, when he is come, will convict the world in respect of sin, and of righteousness, 8 and of judgement: of sin, because they believe not on me; of righteousness, because

I go to the Father, and ye behold me no more; of judgement, because the prince of 12 this world hath been judged. I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now. Howbeit when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he shall guide you into all the truth: for he shall not speak from himself; but what things soever he shall hear, these shall he speak: and he shall declare unto you the things that are to come.
15 He shall glorify me: for he shall take of mine, and shall declare it unto you. All things whatsoever the Father hath are mine: therefore said I, that he taketh of mine, and shall declare it unto you. A little while, and ye behold me no more; and again a little while, and ye shall see me."

17 Some of his disciples therefore said one to another, 'What is this that he saith unto us, A little while, and ye behold me not; and again a little while, and ye shall see me: and, Because I go to the Father?' They said therefore, 'What is this that he saith, A little while? We know not what he saith.'

19 Jesus perceived that they were desirous to ask him, and he said unto them, "Do ye inquire among yourselves concerning this, that I said, A little while, and ye behold me not, and again a little while, and ye shall see me? Verily, verily, I say unto you, that ye shall weep and lament, but the world shall rejoice: ye shall be sorrowful, 21 but your sorrow shall be turned into joy. A woman when she is in travail hath sorrow, because her hour is come: but when she is delivered of the child, she remembereth no more the anguish, for the joy that a man is born into the world. And ye therefore now have sorrow: but I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice, 23 and your joy no one taketh away from you. And in that day ye shall ask me no question. Verily, verily, I say unto you, If ye shall ask anything of the Father, he will give it you in my name. Hitherto have ye asked nothing in my name: ask, and ye shall receive, that your joy may be fulfilled. These things have I spoken unto you in proverbs: the hour cometh, when I shall no more speak unto you in proverbs, 26 but shall tell you plainly of the Father. In that day ye shall ask in my name:
and I say not unto you, that I will pray the Father for you; for the Father himself loveth you, because ye have loved me, and have believed that I came forth from the Father. I came out from the Father, and am come into the world: again, I leave the world, and go unto the Father."

29 His disciples say, 'Lo, now speakest thou plainly, and speakest no proverb.
Now know we that thou knowest all things, and needest not that any man should ask thee: by this we believe that thou camest forth from God.'

Jesus answered them, "Do ye now believe? Behold, the hour cometh, yea, is come, that ye shall be scattered, every man to his own, and shall leave me alone:
33 and yet I am not alone, because the Father is with me. These things have I spoken unto you, that in me ye may have peace. In the world ye have tribulation: but be of good cheer; I have overcome the world."

iv. Jesus' Prayer to the Father for the Disciples

17 These things spake Jesus; and lifting up his eyes to heaven, he said, "Father, the hour is come; glorify thy Son, that the Son may glorify thee: even as thou gavest him authority over all flesh, that whatsoever thou hast given him, to them he should give eternal life. And this is life eternal, that they should know thee the only true 4 God, and him whom thou didst send, even Jesus Christ. I glorified thee on the earth, having accomplished the work which thou hast given me to do. And now, O Father, glorify thou me with thine own self with the glory which I had with thee before the world was. I manifested thy name unto the men whom thou gavest me out of the world: thine they were, and thou gavest them to me; and they have kept thy 7 word. Now they know that all things whatsoever thou hast given me are from thee: for the words which thou gavest me I have given unto them; and they received them, and knew of a truth that I came forth from thee, and they believed that thou didst send me. I pray for them: I pray not for the world, but for those whom 9 thou hast given me; for they are thine: and all things that are mine are thine, and thine are mine: and I am glorified in them. And I am no more in the world, and these are in the world, and I come to thee. Holy Father, keep them in thy name which thou hast given me, that they may be one, even as we are. While I was 12 with them, I kept them in thy name which thou hast given me: and I guarded them, and not one of them perished, but the son of perdition; that the scripture might be fulfilled. But now I come to thee; and these things I speak in the world, that they may have my joy fulfilled in themselves. I have given them thy word; and the 14 world hated them, because they are not of the world, even as I am not of the world. I pray not that thou shouldest take them from the world, but that thou shouldest keep them from the evil one. They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world. Sanctify them in the truth: thy word is truth. As thou didst send me 17 into the world, even so sent I them into the world. And for their sakes I sanctify myself, that they themselves also may be sanctified in truth. Neither for these only do I pray, but for them also that believe on me through their word; that they may all be one; even as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be in us: that the world may believe that thou didst send me. And the glory which 22 thou hast given me I have given unto them; that they may be one, even as we are one; I in them, and thou in me, that they may be perfected into one; that the world may know that thou didst send me, and lovedst them, even as thou lovedst me. Father, that which thou hast given me, I will that, where I am, they also may be with me; that they may behold my glory, which thou hast given me: for thou lovedst me before the foundation of the world. O righteous Father, the world knew 25 thee not, but I knew thee; and these knew that thou didst send me; and I made known unto them thy name, and will make it known; that the love wherewith thou lovedst me may be in them, and I in them."

IV

THE PASSION AND RESURRECTION OF JESUS

i. The Arrest and Witness before the High Priest and Pilate

When Jesus had spoken these words, he went forth with his disciples over the 18 brook Kidron, where was a garden, into the which he entered, himself and his disciples. Now Judas also, which betrayed him, knew the place: for Jesus oft-times resorted thither with his disciples. Judas then, having received the band of soldiers, and officers from the chief priests and the Pharisees, cometh thither with lanterns and torches and weapons. Jesus therefore, knowing all the things that 4 were coming upon him, went forth, and saith unto them, Whom seek ye? They answered him, Jesus of Nazareth. Jesus saith unto them, I am he. And Judas also, which betrayed him, was standing with them. When therefore he said unto them, I am he, they went backward, and fell to the ground. Again therefore he asked them, Whom seek ye? And they said, Jesus of Nazareth. Jesus answered, 8
I told you that I am he: if therefore ye seek me, let these go their way: that the word might be fulfilled which he spake, Of those whom thou hast given me I lost not one. Simon Peter therefore having a sword drew it, and struck the high priest's servant, and cut off his right ear. Now the servant's name was Malchus. Jesus 11 therefore said unto Peter, Put up the sword into the sheath: the cup which the Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?

So the band and the chief captain, and the officers of the Jews, seized Jesus and bound him, and led him to Annas first; for he was father in law to Caiaphas, which 14 was high priest that year. Now Caiaphas was he which gave counsel to the Jews, that it was expedient that one man should die for the people.

And Simon Peter followed Jesus, and so did another disciple. Now that disciple was known unto the high priest, and entered in with Jesus into the court of the high priest; but Peter was standing at the door without. So the other disciple, which was known unto the high priest, went out and spake unto her that kept the 17 door, and brought in Peter. The maid therefore that kept the door saith unto Peter, Art thou also one of this man's disciples? He saith, I am not. Now the servants and the officers were standing there, having made a fire of coals; for it was cold; and they were warming themselves: and Peter also was with them, standing and warming himself.

19 The high priest therefore asked Jesus of his disciples, and of his teaching. Jesus answered him, "I have spoken openly to the world; I ever taught in synagogues, and in the temple, where all the Jews come together; and in secret spake I nothing. Why askest thou me? ask them that have heard me, what I spake unto them: be-
22 hold, these know the things which I said." And when he had said this, one of the officers standing by struck Jesus with his hand, saying, 'Answerest thou the high priest so?' Jesus answered him, "If I have spoken evil, bear witness of the evil: but if well, why smitest thou me?" Annas therefore sent him bound unto Caiaphas the high priest.

25 Now Simon Peter was standing and warming himself. They said therefore unto him, Art thou also one of his disciples? He denied, and said, I am not. One of the servants of the high priest, being a kinsman of him whose ear Peter cut off, saith, Did not I see thee in the garden with him? Peter therefore denied again: and straightway the cock crew.

28 They lead Jesus therefore from Caiaphas into the palace: and it was early; and they themselves entered not into the palace, that they might not be defiled, but might eat the Passover.

Pilate therefore went out unto them, and saith, 'What accusation bring ye against this man?'

30 They answered and said unto him, 'If this man were not an evil-doer, we should not have delivered him up unto thee.'

Pilate therefore said unto them, 'Take him yourselves, and judge him according to your law.'

The Jews said unto him, 'It is not lawful for us to put any man to death:' that the word of Jesus might be fulfilled, which he spake, signifying by what manner of death he should die.

33 Pilate therefore entered again into the palace, and called Jesus, and said unto him, 'Art thou the King of the Jews?'

Jesus answered, "Sayest thou this of thyself, or did others tell it thee concerning me?"

35 Pilate answered, 'Am I a Jew? Thine own nation and the chief priests delivered thee unto me: what hast thou done?'

Jesus answered, "My kingdom is not of this world: if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews: but now is my kingdom not from hence."

37 Pilate therefore said unto him, 'Art thou a king then?'

Jesus answered, "Thou sayest that I am a king. To this end have I been born, and to this end am I come into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth. Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice."

38 Pilate saith unto him, 'What is truth?'

And when he had said this, he went out again unto the Jews, and saith unto them, 'I find no crime in him. But ye have a custom, that I should release unto 39 you one at the Passover: will ye therefore that I release unto you the King of the Jews?'

They cried out therefore again, saying, 'Not this man, but Barabbas.' Now Barabbas was a robber.

Then Pilate therefore took Jesus and scourged him. And the soldiers plaited 19 a crown of thorns, and put it on his head, and arrayed him in a purple garment; and they came unto him, and said, Hail, King of the Jews! and they struck him with their hands.

And Pilate went out again, and saith unto them, 'Behold, I bring him out to 4 you, that ye may know that I find no crime in him.' Jesus therefore came out, wearing the crown of thorns and the purple garment. And Pilate saith unto them, 'Behold, the man!'

When therefore the chief priests and the officers saw him, they cried out, say- 6 ing, 'Crucify him, crucify him.'

Pilate saith unto them, 'Take him yourselves, and crucify him: for I find no crime in him.'

The Jews answered him, 'We have a law, and by that law he ought to die, be- 7 cause he made himself the Son of God.'

When Pilate therefore heard this saying, he was the more afraid; and he entered into the palace again, and saith unto Jesus, 'Whence art thou?'

But Jesus gave him no answer.

Pilate therefore saith unto him, 'Speakest thou not unto me? knowest thou 10 not that I have power to release thee, and have power to crucify thee?'

Jesus answered him, "Thou wouldest have no power against me, except it were given thee from above: therefore he that delivered me unto thee hath greater sin."

Upon this Pilate sought to release him: but the Jews cried out, saying, If thou 12 release this man, thou art not Cæsar's friend: every one that maketh himself a king speaketh against Cæsar. When Pilate therefore heard these words, he brought Jesus out, and sat down on the judgement-seat at a place called 'The Pavement,' but in Hebrew, 'Gabbatha.' Now it was the Preparation of the Passover: it was 14 about the sixth hour. And he saith unto the Jews, 'Behold, your king!'

They therefore cried out, 'Away with him, away with him, crucify him.'

Pilate saith unto them, 'Shall I crucify your King?'

The chief priests answered, 'We have no king but Cæsar.'

Then therefore he delivered him unto them to be crucified. 16

ii. The Crucifixion

They took Jesus therefore: and he went out, bearing the cross for himself, unto 17 the place called 'The place of a skull,' which is called in Hebrew 'Golgotha': where they crucified him, and with him two others, on either side one, and Jesus in the midst. And Pilate wrote a title also, and put it on the cross. And there was written,

Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews.

This title therefore read many of the Jews: for the place where Jesus was crucified 20 was nigh to the city: and it was written in Hebrew, and in Latin, and in Greek.
The chief priests of the Jews therefore said to Pilate, Write not, The King of the Jews; but, that he said, I am King of the Jews. Pilate answered, What I have written I have written.

The soldiers therefore, when they had crucified Jesus, took his garments, and 23 made four parts, to every soldier a part; and also the coat: now the coat was with-24 out seam, woven from the top throughout. They said therefore one to another, Let us not rend it, but cast lots for it, whose it shall be: that the scripture might be fulfilled, which saith,

They parted my garments among them,
And upon my vesture did they cast lots.

25 These things therefore the soldiers did. But there were standing by the cross of Jesus his mother, and his mother's sister, Mary the wife of Clopas, and Mary Magdalene. When Jesus therefore saw his mother, and the disciple standing by, whom he loved, he saith unto his mother, "Woman, behold thy son!" Then saith he to the disciple, "Behold, thy mother!" And from that hour the disciple took her unto his own home.
28 After this Jesus, knowing that all things are now finished, that the scripture might be accomplished, saith, I thirst. There was set there a vessel full of vinegar:
so they put a sponge full of the vinegar upon hyssop, and brought it to his mouth.
When Jesus therefore had received the vinegar, he said, It is finished: and he bowed his head, and gave up his spirit.
31 The Jews therefore, because it was the Preparation, that the bodies should not remain on the cross upon the sabbath (for the day of that sabbath was a high day), asked of Pilate that their legs might be broken, and that they might be taken away.
The soldiers therefore came, and brake the legs of the first, and of the other which was crucified with him: but when they came to Jesus, and saw that he was dead already, they brake not his legs: howbeit one of the soldiers with a spear pierced his side, and straightway there came out blood and water.
35 And he that hath seen hath borne witness, and his witness is true: and he knoweth that he saith true, that ye also may believe. For these things came to pass, that the scripture might be fulfilled, A bone of him shall not be broken. And again another scripture saith, They shall look on him whom they pierced.
38 And after these things Joseph of Arimathæa, being a disciple of Jesus, but secretly for fear of the Jews, asked of Pilate that he might take away the body of Jesus: and Pilate gave him leave. He came therefore, and took away his body. And there came also Nicodemus, he who at the first came to him by night, bringing a mixture of myrrh and aloes, about a hundred pound weight. So they took the body of Jesus, and bound it in linen cloths with the spices, as the custom of the 41 Jews is to bury. Now in the place where he was crucified there was a garden; and in the garden a new tomb wherein was never man yet laid. There then because of the Jews' Preparation (for the tomb was nigh at hand) they laid Jesus.

iii. The Resurrection Signs

20 Now on the first day of the week cometh Mary Magdalene early, while it was yet dark, unto the tomb, and seeth the stone taken away from the tomb. She runneth therefore, and cometh to Simon Peter, and to the other disciple, whom Jesus loved, and saith unto them, They have taken away the Lord out of the tomb, and we know not where they have laid him. Peter therefore went forth, and the other disciple, 4 and they went toward the tomb. And they ran both together: and the other disciple outran Peter, and came first to the tomb; and stooping and looking in, he seeth the linen cloths lying; yet entered he not in. Simon Peter therefore also cometh, following him, and entered into the tomb; and he beholdeth the linen cloths lying, and the napkin, that was upon his head, not lying with the linen cloths, but rolled up in 8 a place by itself. Then entered in therefore the other disciple also, which came first to the tomb, and he saw, and believed. For as yet they knew not the scripture, that he must rise again from the dead. So the disciples went away again unto their own home.

But Mary was standing without at the tomb weeping: so, as she wept, she stooped 11 and looked into the tomb; and she beholdeth two angels in white sitting, one at the head, and one at the feet, where the body of Jesus had lain. And they say unto her, 'Woman, why weepest thou?' She saith unto them, 'Because they have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him.' When she had thus said, she 14 turned herself back, and beholdeth Jesus standing, and knew not that it was Jesus. Jesus saith unto her, "Woman, why weepest thou? whom seekest thou?" She, supposing him to be the gardener, saith unto him, 'Sir, if thou hast borne him hence, tell me where thou hast laid him, and I will take him away.' Jesus saith unto her, 16
"Mary." She turneth herself, and saith unto him in Hebrew, 'Rabboni;' which is to say, Master. Jesus saith to her, "Touch me not; for I am not yet ascended unto the Father: but go unto my brethren, and say to them, I ascend unto my Father and your Father, and my God and your God." Mary Magdalene cometh and telleth the disciples, I have seen the Lord; and how that he had said these things unto her.

When therefore it was evening, on that day, the first day of the week, and when 19 the doors were shut where the disciples were, for fear of the Jews, Jesus came and stood in the midst, and saith unto them, "Peace be unto you." And when he had said this, he shewed unto them his hands and his side. The disciples therefore were glad, when they saw the Lord. Jesus therefore said to them again, "Peace be unto 21 you: as the Father hath sent me, even so send I you." And when he had said this, he breathed on them, and saith unto them, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost: whose soever sins ye forgive, they are forgiven unto them; whose soever sins ye retain, they are retained." But Thomas, one of the twelve, called Didymus, was not with them when Jesus came. The other disciples therefore said unto him, 'We have seen the 25
Lord.' But he said unto them, 'Except I shall see in his hands the print of the nails, and put my finger into the print of the nails, and put my hand into his side, I will not believe.' And after eight days again his disciples were within, and Thomas with them. Jesus cometh, the doors being shut, and stood in the midst, and said, "Peace be unto you." Then saith he to Thomas, "Reach hither thy finger, and see my hands; and reach hither thy hand, and put it into my side: and be not faithless, but believing." Thomas answered and said unto him, 'My Lord and my God.' Jesus 29 saith unto him, "Because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed: blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed."

Many other signs therefore did Jesus in the presence of the disciples, which are 30 not written in this book: but these are written, that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye may have life in his name.

EPILOGUE

A PERSONAL REMINISCENCE

After these things Jesus manifested himself again to the disciples at the sea of 21
Tiberias; and he manifested himself on this wise. There were together Simon Peter, and Thomas called Didymus, and Nathanael of Cana in Galilee, and the sons of Zebedee, and two other of his disciples. Simon Peter saith unto them, I go a fishing. They say unto him, We also come with thee. They went forth, and entered into the boat; and that night they took nothing. But when day was now breaking, Jesus 4 stood on the beach: howbeit the disciples knew not that it was Jesus. Jesus therefore saith unto them, "Children, have ye aught to eat?" They answered him, 'No.'

6 And he said unto them, "Cast the net on the right side of the boat, and ye shall find."
They cast therefore, and now they were not able to draw it for the multitude of fishes.
That disciple therefore whom Jesus loved saith unto Peter, 'It is the Lord.' So when Simon Peter heard that it was the Lord, he girt his coat about him (for he was naked), 8 and cast himself into the sea. But the other disciples came in the little boat (for they were not far from the land, but about two hundred cubits off), dragging the net full of fishes. So when they got out upon the land, they see a fire of coals there, and fish laid thereon, and bread. Jesus saith unto them, "Bring of the fish which ye have 11 now taken." Simon Peter therefore went up, and drew the net to land, full of great fishes, a hundred and fifty and three: and for all there were so many, the net was not rent. Jesus saith unto them, "Come and break your fast." And none of the disciples durst inquire of him, Who art thou? knowing that it was the Lord.
Jesus cometh, and taketh the bread, and giveth them, and the fish likewise. This is now the third time that Jesus was manifested to the disciples, after that he was risen from the dead.

15 So when they had broken their fast, Jesus saith to Simon Peter, "Simon, son of John, lovest thou me more than these?"
He saith unto him, 'Yea, Lord; thou knowest that I love thee.'
He saith unto him, "Feed my lambs."
16 He saith to him again a second time, "Simon, son of John, lovest thou me?"
He saith unto him, 'Yea, Lord, thou knowest that I love thee.'
He saith unto him, "Tend my sheep."
He saith unto him the third time, "Simon, son of John, lovest thou me?"
Peter was grieved because he said unto him the third time, Lovest thou me?
And he said unto him, 'Lord, thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee.' 18 Jesus saith unto him, "Feed my sheep. Verily, verily, I say unto thee, When thou wast young, thou girdedst thyself, and walkedst whither thou wouldest: but when thou shalt be old, thou shalt stretch forth thy hands, and another shall gird thee, and carry thee whither thou wouldest not."
Now this he spake, signifying by what manner of death he should glorify God.
And when he had spoken this, he saith unto him, "Follow me."
20 Peter, turning about, seeth the disciple whom Jesus loved following; which also leaned back on his breast at the supper, and said, Lord, who is he that betrayeth thee? Peter therefore seeing him saith to Jesus, 'Lord, and what shall this man do?' Jesus saith unto him, "If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? follow thou me."
23 This saying therefore went forth among the brethren, that that disciple should not die: yet Jesus said not unto him, that he should not die; but, If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? *

25 And there are also many other things which Jesus did, the which if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself would not contain the books that should be written.

* This is the disciple which beareth witness of these things, and wrote these things: and we know that his witness is true.

WORDS TO THE SEVEN CHURCHES

John: To the Seven Churches which are in Asia: Grace to you and peace, 4 from him which is and which was and which is to come; and from the Seven Spirits which are before his throne; and from Jesus Christ, who is the faithful witness, the firstborn of the dead, and the ruler of the kings of the earth. Unto him that loveth us, and loosed us from our sins by his blood; and he made us to be a kingdom, to be priests unto his God and Father:
to him be the glory and the dominion for ever and ever. Amen.

Behold, he cometh with the clouds;
And every eye shall see him,
And they which pierced him;
And all the tribes of the earth shall mourn over him.
Even so. Amen.

I am the Alpha and the Omega, saith the Lord God,
Which is,
And which was,
And which is to come,
The Almighty.

I John, your brother and partaker with you in the tribulation and kingdom and 9 patience which are in Jesus, was in the isle that is called Patmos, for the word of God and the testimony of Jesus. I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day, and I heard behind me a great voice, as of a trumpet saying: What thou seest, write in a book, and send it to the seven churches; unto Ephesus, and unto Smyrna, and unto Pergamum, and unto Thyatira, and unto Sardis, and unto Philadelphia, and unto Laodicea. And I turned to see the voice which spake with me. And having turned, I 12 saw seven golden candlesticks; and in the midst of the candlesticks one like unto a son of man, clothed with a garment down to the foot, and girt about at the breasts with a golden girdle. And his head and his hair were white as white wool, white as snow; and his eyes were as a flame of fire; and his feet like unto burnished brass, as if it had been refined in a furnace; and his voice as the voice of many waters. And 16 he had in his right hand seven stars; and out of his mouth proceeded a sharp two-edged sword; and his countenance was as the sun shineth in his strength. And when I saw him I fell at his feet as one dead. And he laid his right hand upon me, saying: Fear not; I am the first and the last, and the Living One; and I was dead, and behold, I am alive for evermore, and I have the keys of death and of Hades. Write, there- 19 fore, the things which thou sawest, and the things which are, and the things which shall come to pass hereafter; the mystery of the seven stars which thou sawest in my right hand, and the seven golden candlesticks. The seven stars are the angels of the seven churches: and the seven candlesticks are seven churches.

To the Angel of the Church in Ephesus Write: 2

These things saith he that holdeth the seven stars in his right hand, he that walketh in the midst of the seven golden candlesticks:

I know thy works, and thy toil and patience, and that thou canst not bear evil men, and didst try them which call themselves apostles, and they are not, and didst find them false; and thou hast patience, and didst bear for my name's sake, and hast not grown weary. But I have this against thee, that thou didst leave 5 thy first love. Remember, therefore, from whence thou art fallen, and repent, and do the first works; or else I come to thee, and will move thy candlestick out of its place, except thou repent. But this thou hast, that thou hatest the works of the Nicolaitans, which I also hate.

7 He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith to the churches. To him that overcometh, to him will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the Paradise of God.

8 And to the Angel of the Church in Smyrna Write:

These things saith the first and the last, which was dead, and lived again:
I know thy tribulation, and thy poverty (but thou art rich), and the blasphemy of them which say they are Jews, and they are not, but are a synagogue 10 of Satan. Fear not the things which thou art about to suffer: behold, the devil is about to cast some of you into prison, that ye may be tried; and ye shall have tribulation ten days. Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee the crown of life.
He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith to the churches. He that overcometh shall not be hurt of the second death.

12 And to the Angel of the Church in Pergamum Write:

These things saith he that hath the sharp two-edged sword:
I know where thou dwellest, even where Satan's throne is: and thou holdest fast my name, and didst not deny my faith, even in the days of Antipas my witness, my faithful one, who was killed among you, where Satan dwelleth.
But I have a few things against thee, because thou hast there some that hold the teaching of Balaam, who taught Balak to cast a stumblingblock before the children of Israel, to eat things sacrificed to idols, and to commit fornication.
15 So hast thou also some that hold the teaching of the Nicolaitans in like manner.
Repent therefore; or else I come to thee quickly, and I will make war against them with the sword of my mouth.
He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith to the churches. To him that overcometh, to him will I give of the hidden manna, and I will give him a white stone, and upon the stone a new name written, which no one knoweth but he that receiveth it.

18 And to the Angel of the Church in Thyatira Write:

These things saith the Son of God, who hath his eyes like a flame of fire, and his feet are like unto burnished brass:
I know thy works, and thy love and faith and ministry and patience, and that thy last works are more than the first. But I have this against thee, that thou sufferest the woman Jezebel, which calleth herself a prophetess; and she teacheth and seduceth my servants to commit fornication, and to eat things 21 sacrificed to idols. And I gave her time that she should repent; and she willeth not to repent of her fornication. Behold, I do cast her into a bed, and them that commit adultery with her into great tribulation, except they repent of her works.
And I will kill her children with death; and all the churches shall know that I am he which searcheth the reins and hearts: and I will give unto each one of you according to your works. But to you I say, to the rest that are in Thyatira, as many as have not this teaching, which know not the deep things of Satan, as 25 they say; I cast upon you none other burden. Howbeit that which ye have, hold fast till I come.

And he that overcometh, and he that keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give authority over the nations: and he shall rule them with a rod of iron, as the vessels of the potter are broken to shivers; as I also have received of my Father: and I will give him the morning star. He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith to the churches.

And to the Angel of the Church in Sardis Write: 3

These things saith he that hath the seven Spirits of God, and the seven stars:

I know thy works, that thou hast a name that thou livest, and thou art dead. Be thou watchful, and stablish the things that remain, which were ready to die: for I have found no works of thine fulfilled before my God. Remember therefore how thou hast received and didst hear; and keep it, and repent. If therefore thou shalt not watch, I will come as a thief, and thou shalt not know what hour I will come upon thee. But thou hast a few names in Sardis which did not 4 defile their garments: and they shall walk with me in white; for they are worthy. He that overcometh shall thus be arrayed in white garments; and I will in no wise blot his name out of the book of life, and I will confess his name before my Father, and before his angels. He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith to the churches.

And to the Angel of the Church in Philadelphia Write: 7

These things saith he that is holy, he that is true, he that hath the key of David, he that openeth, and none shall shut, and that shutteth, and none openeth:

I know thy works (behold, I have set before thee a door opened, which none can shut), that thou hast a little power, and didst keep my word, and didst not deny my name. Behold, I give of the synagogue of Satan, of them which say they are Jews, and they are not, but do lie; behold, I will make them to come and worship before thy feet, and to know that I have loved thee. Because thou 10 didst keep the word of my patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of trial, that hour which is to come upon the whole world, to try them that dwell upon the earth. I come quickly: hold fast that which thou hast, that no one take thy crown.

He that overcometh, I will make him a pillar in the temple of my God, and he 12 shall go out thence no more: and I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God, the new Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven from my God, and mine own new name. He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith to the churches.

And to the Angel of the Church in Laodicea Write: 14

These things saith the Amen, the faithful and true witness, the beginning of the creation of God:

I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot: I would thou wert cold or hot. So because thou art lukewarm, and neither hot nor cold, I will spew thee out of my mouth. Because thou sayest, I am rich, and have gotten 17 riches, and have need of nothing; and knowest not that thou art the wretched one and miserable and poor and blind and naked: I counsel thee to buy of me gold refined by fire, that thou mayest become rich; and white garments, that thou mayest clothe thyself, and that the shame of thy nakedness be not made manifest; and eyesalve to anoint thine eyes, that thou mayest see. As many as I love, I reprove and chasten: be zealous therefore, and repent. Behold, 20 I stand at the door and knock: if any man hear my voice and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me.

He that overcometh, I will give to him to sit down with me in my throne, as I also overcame, and sat down with my Father in his throne. He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith to the churches.

I

THE SEALED BOOK AND THE LAMB

4 After these things I saw, and behold, a door opened in heaven, and the first voice which I heard, a voice as of a trumpet speaking with me, one saying, 'Come up hither, 'and I will shew thee the things which must come to pass hereafter.'

Straightway I was in the Spirit: and behold, there was a throne set in heaven,
3 and one sitting upon the throne; and he that sat was to look upon like a jasper stone
The Throne and a sardius: and there was a rainbow round about the throne, like an emerald to look upon. And round about the throne were four and twenty thrones: and upon the thrones I saw four and twenty elders sitting, arrayed in white garments; and on their heads crowns of gold. And out of the throne proceed lightnings and voices and thunders. And there were seven lamps
6 of fire burning before the throne, which are the seven Spirits of God; and before the throne, as it were a glassy sea like unto crystal; and in the midst of the throne, and round about the throne, four living creatures full of eyes before and behind. And the first creature was like a lion, and the second creature like a calf, and the third creature had a face as of a man, and the fourth creature was like a flying
8 eagle. And the four living creatures, having each one of them six wings, are full of eyes round about and within: and they have no rest day and night, saying,

Holy, holy, holy:
The Lord God, The Almighty;
Which was and which is and which is to come.

9 And when the living creatures shall give glory and honour and thanks to him that sitteth on the throne, to him that liveth for ever and ever, the four and twenty elders shall fall down before him that sitteth on the throne, and shall worship him that liveth for ever and ever, and shall cast their crowns before the throne, saying, 'Worthy art 'thou, our Lord and our God, to receive the glory and the honour and the power: 'for thou didst create all things, and because of thy will they were, and were created.'

5 And I saw in the right hand of him that sat on the throne a book written within and on the back, close sealed with seven seals. And I saw a strong angel proclaim-
The Sealed Book ing with a great voice, 'Who is worthy to open the book, and to loose 'the seals thereof?' And no one in the heaven, or on the earth, or under the earth, was able to open the book, or to look thereon. And I wept much, because no one was found worthy to open the book, or to look thereon: and one of the elders saith unto me, 'Weep not: behold, the Lion that is of the tribe 'of Judah, the Root of David, hath overcome, to open the book and the seven seals 'thereof.'

6 And I saw in the midst of the throne and of the four living creatures, and in the midst of the elders, a Lamb standing, as though it had been slain, having seven horns,
The Lamb and seven eyes, which are the seven Spirits of God, sent forth into all the earth. And he came, and he taketh it out of the right hand of him that sat on the throne. And when he had taken the book, the four living creatures and the four and twenty elders fell down before the Lamb, having each one a harp, and golden bowls full of incense, which are the prayers of the saints.

And they sing a new song, saying, 'Worthy art thou to take the book, and to open 9
'the seals thereof: for thou wast slain, and didst purchase unto God with thy blood
'men of every tribe, and tongue, and people, and nation, and madest them to be 'unto our God a kingdom and priests; and they reign upon the earth.' And I saw, and I heard a voice of many angels round about the throne and the living creatures and the elders; and the number of them was ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands; saying with a great voice, 'Worthy is 12
'the Lamb that hath been slain to receive the power, and riches, and wisdom,
'and might, and honour, and glory, and blessing.' And every created thing which is in the heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and on the sea, and all things that are in them, heard I saying, 'Unto him that sitteth on the throne,
'and unto the Lamb, be the blessing, and the honour, and the glory, and the 'dominion, for ever and ever.' And the four living creatures said, Amen. And the elders fell down and worshipped.

II

THE POWERS OF JUDGEMENT

i. Powers of Judgement: Captivity

And I saw when the Lamb opened one of the seven seals, and I heard one of 6 the four living creatures saying as with a voice of thunder, Come. And I saw, and behold, a white horse, and he that sat thereon had a bow; and there was given unto him a crown: and he came forth conquering, and to conquer.

ii. War

And when he opened the second seal, I heard the second living creature saying, 3 Come. And another horse came forth, a red horse: and to him that sat thereon it was given to take peace from the earth, and that they should slay one another:
and there was given unto him a great sword.

iii. Famine

And when he opened the third seal, I heard the third living creature saying, Come. 5
And I saw, and behold, a black horse; and he that sat thereon had a balance in his hand. And I heard as it were a voice in the midst of the four living creatures saying, 'A measure of wheat for a penny, and three measures of barley for a penny:
'and the oil and the wine hurt thou not.'

iv. Death

And when he opened the fourth seal, I heard the voice of the fourth living creature 7 saying, Come. And I saw, and behold, a pale horse: and he that sat upon him, his name was Death; and Hades followed with him. And there was given unto them authority over the fourth part of the earth, to kill with sword, and with famine, and with death, and by the wild beasts of the earth.

v. A Cry for Judgement

And when he opened the fifth seal, I saw underneath the altar the souls of them 9 that had been slain for the word of God, and for the testimony which they held:

and they cried with a great voice, saying, 'How long, O Master, the holy and 'true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth?' 11 And there was given them to each one a white robe; and it was said unto them, that they should rest yet for a little time, until their fellow-servants also and their brethren, which should be killed even as they were, should be fulfilled.

vi. The Day of Wrath Breaking

12 And I saw when he opened the sixth seal, and there was a great earthquake; and the sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the whole moon became as blood; and the stars of the heaven fell unto the earth, as a fig tree casteth her unripe figs, when she is shaken of a great wind. And the heaven was removed as a scroll when it is rolled up; and every mountain and island were moved out of their places.
15 And the kings of the earth, and the princes, and the chief captains, and the rich, and the strong, and every bondman and freeman, hid themselves in the caves and in the rocks of the mountains; and they say to the mountains and to the rocks, 'Fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from 'the wrath of the Lamb: for the great day of their wrath is come; and who is able 'to stand?'

7 After this I saw four angels standing at the four corners of the earth, holding the four winds of the earth, that no wind should blow on the earth, or on the sea, or upon any tree. And I saw another angel ascend from the sunrising, having the seal of the living God: and he cried with a great voice to the four angels, to whom it was given to hurt the earth and the sea, saying, 'Hurt not the earth, neither the sea, nor the trees, till we 4 'shall have sealed the servants of our God on their foreheads.' And I heard the number of them which were sealed, a hundred and forty and four thousand, sealed out of every tribe of the children of Israel.

Restraint: Sealing of the Saints

Of the tribe of Judah were sealed twelve thousand:
Of the tribe of Reuben twelve thousand:
Of the tribe of Gad twelve thousand:
6 Of the tribe of Asher twelve thousand:
Of the tribe of Naphtali twelve thousand:
Of the tribe of Manasseh twelve thousand:
Of the tribe of Simeon twelve thousand:
Of the tribe of Levi twelve thousand:
Of the tribe of Issachar twelve thousand:
8 Of the tribe of Zebulun twelve thousand:
Of the tribe of Joseph twelve thousand:
Of the tribe of Benjamin were sealed twelve thousand.

9 After these things I saw, and behold, a great multitude, which no man could number, out of every nation, and of all tribes and peoples and tongues, standing before the throne and before the Lamb, arrayed in white robes, and palms in their hands; and they cry with a great voice, saying, 'Salvation unto our God which 'sitteth on the throne, and unto the Lamb.' And all the angels were standing round about the throne, and about the elders and the four living creatures; and they 12 fell before the throne on their faces, and worshipped God, saying, 'Amen: Blessing, 'and glory, and wisdom, and thanksgiving, and honour, and power, and might, 'be unto our God for ever and ever. Amen.' And one of the elders answered, saying unto me, 'These which are arrayed in the white robes, who are they, and 'whence came they?' And I say unto him, 'My lord, thou knowest.' And he said to me, 'These are they which come out of the great tribulation, and they washed

'their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. Therefore are they 15
'before the throne of God; and they serve him day and night in his temple: and he 'that sitteth on the throne shall spread his tabernacle over them. They shall hunger
'no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun strike upon them, nor any 'heat: for the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall be their shepherd, and 'shall guide them unto fountains of waters of life: and God shall wipe away every 'tear from their eyes.'

vii. Silence of Expectation

And when he opened the seventh seal, there followed a silence in heaven about 8 the space of half an hour. And I saw the seven angels which stand before God; and there were given unto them seven trumpets. And another angel came and stood over the altar, having a golden censer; and there was given unto him much incense, that he should add it unto the prayers of all the saints upon the golden altar which was before the throne. And the smoke of the incense, with 4 the prayers of the saints, went up before God out of the angel's hand.

III

THE SEVEN TRUMPETS

JUDGEMENT AND THE MYSTERY OF PROPHECY

And the angel taketh the censer; and he filled it with the fire of the altar, and cast 5 it upon the earth: and there followed thunders, and voices, and lightnings, and an earthquake. And the seven angels which had the seven trumpets prepared themselves to sound.

i. Judgement from Above: On Earth

And the first sounded, and there followed hail and fire, mingled with blood, 7 and they were cast upon the earth: and the third part of the earth was burnt up, and the third part of the trees was burnt up, and all green grass was burnt up.

ii. On Sea

And the second angel sounded, and as it were a great mountain burning with fire 8 was cast into the sea: and the third part of the sea became blood; and there died the third part of the creatures which were in the sea, even they that had life; and the third part of the ships was destroyed.

iii. On Rivers and Founts

And the third angel sounded, and there fell from heaven a great star, burning as 10 a torch, and it fell upon the third part of the rivers, and upon the fountains of the waters; and the name of the star is called Wormwood: and the third part of the waters became wormwood; and many men died of the waters, because they were made bitter.

iv. On Sun and Stars

And the fourth angel sounded, and the third part of the sun was smitten, and 12 the third part of the moon, and the third part of the stars; that the third part of them should be darkened, and the day should not shine for the third part of it, and the night in like manner.

13 And I saw, and I heard an eagle, flying in mid heaven, saying with a great voice, 'Woe, woe, woe, for them that dwell on the earth, by reason of the other voices 'of the trumpet of the three angels, who are yet to sound.'

v. Judgement from Beneath

9 And the fifth angel sounded, and I saw a star from heaven fallen unto the earth: and there was given to him the key of the pit of the abyss. And he opened the pit of the abyss; and there went up a smoke out of the pit, as the smoke of a great furnace; and the sun and the air were darkened by reason of the smoke of the pit. And out of the smoke came forth locusts upon the earth; and power was 4 given them, as the scorpions of the earth have power. And it was said unto them that they should not hurt the grass of the earth, neither any green thing, neither any tree, but only such men as have not the seal of God on their foreheads. And it was given them that they should not kill them, but that they should be tormented five months: and their torment was as the torment of a scorpion, when it striketh a man. And in those days men shall seek death, and shall in no wise find it; and 7 they shall desire to die, and death fleeth from them. And the shapes of the locusts were like unto horses prepared for war; and upon their heads as it were crowns like unto gold, and their faces were as men's faces. And they had hair as the hair of women, and their teeth were as the teeth of lions. And they had breastplates, as it were breastplates of iron; and the sound of their wings was as the sound of chariots, of many horses rushing to war. And they have tails like unto scorpions, and stings; 11 and in their tails is their power to hurt men five months. They have over them as king the angel of the abyss: his name in Hebrew is Abaddon, and in the Greek tongue he hath the name Apollyon.

The first Woe is past: behold, there come yet two Woes hereafter.

vi. Judgement from Euphrates to the Four Winds

13 And the sixth angel sounded, and I heard a voice from the horns of the golden altar which is before God, one saying to the sixth angel, which had the trumpet, 'Loose the four angels which are bound at the great river Euphrates.' And the four angels were loosed, which had been prepared for the hour and day and month 16 and year, that they should kill the third part of men. And the number of the armies of the horsemen was twice ten thousand times ten thousand: I heard the number of them. And thus I saw the horses in the vision, and them that sat on them, having breastplates as of fire and of hyacinth and of brimstone: and the heads of the horses are as the heads of lions; and out of their mouths proceedeth 18 fire and smoke and brimstone. By these three plagues was the third part of men killed, by the fire and the smoke and the brimstone, which proceeded out of their mouths. For the power of the horses is in their mouth, and in their tails: for their tails are like unto serpents, and have heads; and with them they do hurt. 20 And the rest of mankind, which were not killed with these plagues, repented not of the works of their hands, that they should not worship devils, and the idols of gold, and of silver, and of brass, and of stone, and of wood; which can neither see, nor hear, nor walk: and they repented not of their murders, nor of their sorceries, nor of their fornication, nor of their thefts.

10 And I saw another strong angel coming down out of heaven, arrayed with a cloud; and the rainbow was upon his head, and his face was as the sun, and his feet as pillars of fire; and he had in his hand a little book open: and he set his right foot upon the sea, and his left upon the earth; and he cried with a great voice, as a lion roareth and when he cried, the seven thunders uttered their voices. And when the seven 4 thunders uttered their voices, I was about to write: and I heard a voice from heaven saying, 'Seal up the things which the seven thunders Judgement Sealed up 'uttered, and write them not.' And the angel which I saw standing upon the sea and upon the earth lifted up his right hand to heaven, and sware by 6 him that liveth for ever and ever, who created the heaven and the things that are therein, and the earth and the things that are therein, and the sea and the things that are therein, that there shall be time no longer: but in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he is about to sound, then is finished the mystery of God, according to the good tidings which he declared to his servants the prophets.

And the voice which I heard from heaven, I heard it again speaking with me, and 8 saying, 'Go, take the book which is open in the hand of the angel that standeth 'upon the sea and upon the earth.' And I went unto the angel, saying unto him that he should give me the little book. And he saith unto me, 'Take it, and eat it 'up; and it shall make thy belly bitter, but in thy mouth it shall be sweet as honey.'
And I took the little book out of the angel's hand, and ate it up; and it was in my mouth sweet as honey: and when I had eaten it, my belly The Mystery of Prophecy was made bitter. And they say unto me, 'Thou must prophesy again 'over many peoples and nations and tongues and kings.' And there was given me a 11 reed like unto a rod: and one said, 'Rise, and measure the temple of God, and the 'altar, and them that worship therein. And the court which is without the temple 'leave without, and measure it not; for it hath been given unto the nations: and 'the holy city shall they tread under foot forty and two months. And I will give 'unto my two witnesses, and they shall prophesy a thousand two hundred 'and threescore days, clothed in sackcloth.' These are the two olive trees and the 4 two candlesticks, standing before the Lord of the earth. And if any man desireth 10 hurt them, fire proceedeth out of their mouth, and devoureth their enemies: and if any man shall desire to hurt them, in this manner must he be killed. These have the power to shut the heaven, that it rain not during the days of their prophecy:
and they have power over the waters to turn them into blood, and to smite the earth with every plague, as often as they shall desire. And when they shall have finished 7 their testimony, the beast that cometh up out of the abyss shall make war with them, and overcome them, and kill them. And their dead bodies lie in the street of the great city, which spiritually is called Sodom and Egypt, where also their Lord was crucified. And from among the peoples and tribes and tongues and nations do men look upon their dead bodies three days and a half, and suffer not their dead bodies to be laid in a tomb. And they that dwell on the earth rejoice 10 over them, and make merry; and they shall send gifts one to another; because these two prophets tormented them that dwell on the earth. And after the three days and a half the breath of life from God entered into them, and they stood upon their feet; and great fear fell upon them which beheld them. And they heard a great voice from heaven saying unto them, Come up hither. And they went up into heaven in the cloud; and their enemies beheld them. And in that hour there was 13 a great earthquake, and the tenth part of the city fell; and there were killed in the earthquake seven thousand persons: and the rest were affrighted, and gave glory to the God of heaven.

The second Woe is past: behold, the third Woe cometh quickly.

vii. The Mystery of Prophecy unsealed in Christ

And the seventh angel sounded; and there followed great voices in heaven, and 15 they said, —

The kingdom of the World is become
The Kingdom of our Lord, and of his Christ:
And He shall reign for ever and ever.

16 And the four and twenty elders, which sit before God on their thrones, fell upon their faces, and worshipped God, saying, 'We give thee thanks, O Lord God, the Almighty,
'which art and which wast; because thou hast taken thy great power, and didst
'reign. And the nations were wroth, and thy wrath came, and the time of the dead
'to be judged, and the time to give their reward to thy servants the prophets, and 'to the saints, and to them that fear thy name, the small and the great; and to 'destroy them that destroy the earth.'

IV

THE KINGDOM OF THE WORLD BECOMING THE KINGDOM OF CHRIST

19 And there was opened the temple of God that is in heaven; and there was seen in his temple the ark of his covenant; and there followed lightnings, and voices, and thunders, and an earthquake, and great hail.

i. The Woman with child and the Dragon

12 And a great sign was seen in heaven; a woman arrayed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars; and she was with child: and she crieth out, travailing in birth, and in pain to be delivered. And there was seen another sign in heaven; and behold, a great red dragon, having seven 4 heads and ten horns, and upon his heads seven diadems. And his tail draweth the third part of the stars of heaven, and did cast them to the earth: and the dragon stood before the woman which was about to be delivered, that when she was delivered, he might devour her child. And she was delivered of a son, a man child, who is to rule all the nations with a rod of iron: and her child was caught up unto God, 6 and unto his throne. And the woman fled into the wilderness, where she hath a place prepared of God, that there they may nourish her a thousand two hundred and threescore days.

ii. War in Heaven: Michael and the Dragon

7 And there was war in heaven: Michael and his angels going forth to war with the dragon; and the dragon warred and his angels; and they prevailed not, neither was their place found any more in heaven. And the great dragon was cast down, the old serpent, he that is called the Devil and Satan, the deceiver of the whole world; he was cast down to the earth, and his angels were cast down with him.
10 And I heard a great voice in heaven, saying, 'Now is come the salvation, and the 'power, and the kingdom of our God, and the authority of his Christ: for the 'accuser of our brethren is cast down, which accuseth them before our God day and 'night. And they overcame him because of the blood of the Lamb, and because 12 'of the word of their testimony; and they loved not their life even unto death. There'fore rejoice, O heavens, and ye that dwell in them. Woe for the earth and for the 'sea: because the devil is gone down unto you, having great wrath, knowing that he 'hath but a short time.'

iii. Temptation on Earth: the Woman and the Dragon

And when the dragon saw that he was cast down to the earth, he persecuted the 13 woman which brought forth the man child. And there were given to the woman the two wings of the great eagle, that she might fly into the wilderness unto her place, where she is nourished for a time, and times, and half a time, from the face of the serpent. And the serpent cast out of his mouth after the woman water as a river, that he might cause her to be carried away by the stream. And the earth helped 16 the woman, and the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed up the river which the dragon cast out of his mouth. And the dragon waxed wroth with the woman, and went away to make war with the rest of her seed, which keep the commandments of God, and hold the testimony of Jesus: and he stood upon the sand of 13 the sea.

iv. The Beast warring with the Saints

And I saw a beast coming up out of the sea, having ten horns and seven heads, 2 and on his horns ten diadems, and upon his heads names of blasphemy. And the beast which I saw was like unto a leopard, and his feet were as the feet of a bear, and his mouth as the mouth of a lion: and the dragon gave him his power, and his throne, and great authority. And I saw one of his heads as though it had been smitten unto death; and his death-stroke was healed: and the whole earth wondered after the beast; and they worshipped the dragon, because he gave his 4 authority unto the beast; and they worshipped the beast, saying, 'Who is like 'unto the beast? and who is able to war with him?' and there was given to him a mouth speaking great things and blasphemies; and there was given to him authority to continue forty and two months. And he opened his mouth for blasphemies against God, to blaspheme his name, and his tabernacle, even them that dwell in the heaven.
And it was given unto him to make war with the saints, and to overcome them: and 7 there was given to him authority over every tribe and people and tongue and nation.
And all that dwell on the earth shall worship him, every one whose name hath not been written in the book of life of the Lamb that hath been slain from the foundation of the world.

If any man hath an ear, let him hear: 9
If any man leadeth into captivity,
Into captivity he goeth;
If any man shall kill with the sword,
With the sword must he be killed.
Here is the patience and the faith of the saints.

v. The Beast-like Prophet of the Beast

And I saw another beast coming up out of the earth; and he had two horns like 11 unto a lamb, and he spake as a dragon. And he exerciseth all the authority of the first beast in his sight. And he maketh the earth and them that dwell therein to worship the first beast, whose death-stroke was healed. And he doeth great signs, that he should even make fire to come down out of heaven upon the earth in the sight of men. And he deceiveth them that dwell on the earth by reason of the signs 14 which it was given him to do in the sight of the beast; saying to them that dwell on the earth, that they should make an image to the beast, who hath the stroke of the sword, and lived. And it was given unto him to give breath to it, even to the image of the beast, that the image of the beast should both speak, and cause that as many as should not worship the image of the beast should be killed. And he causeth all, 16

the small and the great, and the rich and the poor, and the free and the bond, that 17 there be given them a mark on their right hand, or upon their forehead; and that no man should be able to buy or to sell, save he that hath the mark, even the name of the beast or the number of his name. Here is wisdom. He that hath understanding, let him count the number of the beast; for it is the number of a man: and his number is Six hundred and sixty and six.

vi. Followers of the Lamb arrayed for War

14 1 And I saw, and behold, the Lamb standing on the mount Zion, and with him a hundred and forty and four thousand, having his name, and the name of his Father, written on their foreheads. And I heard a voice from heaven, as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of a great thunder: and the voice which I heard was as the voice of harpers harping with their harps; and they sing as it were a new song before the throne, and before the four living creatures and the elders: and no man could learn the song save the hundred and forty and four thousand, even they that had been purchased out of the earth. These are they which were not
4 defiled with women; for they are virgins. These are they which follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth. These were purchased from among men, to be the first-fruits unto God and unto the Lamb. And in their mouth was found no lie: they are without blemish.

6 And I saw another angel flying in mid heaven, having an eternal gospel to proclaim unto them that dwell on the earth, and unto every nation and tribe and tongue and people; and he saith with a great voice, 'Fear God, and give him glory; for 'the hour of his judgement is come: and worship him that made the heaven 'and the earth and sea and fountains of waters.'

8 And another, a second angel, followed, saying, 'Fallen, fallen is Babylon the great, 'which hath made all the nations to drink of the wine of the wrath of her fornication.'

9 And another angel, a third, followed them, saying with a great voice, 'If any man 'worshippeth the beast and his image, and receiveth a mark on his forehead, or upon 'his hand, he also shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is prepared 'unmixed in the cup of his anger; and he shall be tormented with fire and brimstone 'in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb: and the smoke 'of their torment goeth up for ever and ever; and they have no rest day and night, 'they that worship the beast and his image, and whoso receiveth the mark of his name.'

12 Here is the patience of the saints, they that keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus. And I heard a voice from heaven, saying, Write:

Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord:
From henceforth, yea, saith the Spirit,
That they may rest from their labours;
For their works follow with them.

vii. Harvest of Judgement and Salvation

14 And I saw, and behold, a white cloud; and on the cloud I saw one sitting like unto a son of man, having on his head a golden crown, and in his hand a sharp sickle. And another angel came out from the temple, crying with a great voice to him that sat on the cloud, 'Send forth thy sickle, and reap: for the hour to reap

'is come; for the harvest of the earth is over-ripe.' And he that sat on the cloud cast his sickle upon the earth; and the earth was reaped.

And another angel came out from the temple which is in heaven, he also having a 17 sharp sickle. And another angel came out from the altar, he that hath power over fire; and he called with a great voice to him that had the sharp sickle, saying, 'Send 'forth thy sharp sickle, and gather the clusters of the vine of the earth; for her grapes 'are fully ripe.' And the angel cast his sickle into the earth, and gathered the vintage 19 of the earth, and cast it into the winepress, the great winepress, of the wrath of God. And the winepress was trodden without the city, and there came out blood from the winepress, even unto the bridles of the horses, as far as a thousand and six hundred furlongs.

And I saw another sign in heaven, great and marvellous, seven angels having 15 seven plagues, which are the last, for in them is finished the wrath of God.

And I saw as it were a glassy sea mingled with fire; and them that come victorious from the beast, and from his image, and from the number of his name, standing by the glassy sea, having harps of God. And they sing the song of Moses the servant 3 of God, and the song of the Lamb, saying:

Song of Moses and the Lamb

Great and marvellous are thy works, O Lord God, the Almighty; Righteous and true are thy ways, thou King of the ages.
Who shall not fear, O Lord, 4
And glorify thy name?
For thou only art holy:
For all the nations shall come and worship before thee;
For thy righteous acts have been made manifest.

V

THE SEVEN GOLDEN BOWLS

JUDGEMENT CONSUMMATED AND THE MYSTERY OF BABYLON

And after these things I saw, and the temple of the tabernacle of the testimony 5 in heaven was opened: and there came out from the temple the seven angels that had the seven plagues, arrayed with precious stone, pure and bright, and girt about their breasts with golden girdles. And one of the four living creatures gave unto the seven 7 angels seven golden bowls full of the wrath of God, who liveth for ever and ever. And the temple was filled with smoke from the glory of God, and from his power; and none was able to enter into the temple, till the seven plagues of the seven angels should be finished.

And I heard a great voice out of the temple, saying to the seven angels, Go ye, and 16 pour out the seven bowls of the wrath of God into the earth.

i. Judgement from Above: On Earth

And the first went, and poured out his bowl into the earth; and it became a 2 noisome and grievous sore upon the men which had the mark of the beast, and which worshipped his image.

ii. On Sea

3 And the second poured out his bowl into the sea; and it became blood as of a dead man; and every living soul died, even the things that were in the sea.

iii. On Rivers and Fountains

4 And the third poured out his bowl into the rivers and the fountains of the waters; and it became blood. And I heard the angel of the waters saying, 'Righteous 'art thou, which art and which wast, thou Holy One, because thou didst thus 'judge: for they poured out the blood of saints and prophets, and blood hast thou 'given them to drink: they are worthy.' And I heard the altar saying, 'Yea, 'O Lord God, the Almighty, true and righteous are thy judgements.'

iv. On the Sun

8 And the fourth poured out his bowl upon the sun; and it was given unto it to scorch men with fire. And men were scorched with great heat: and they blasphemed the name of the God which hath the power over these plagues; and they repented not to give him glory.

v. Judgement from Beneath

10 And the fifth poured out his bowl upon the throne of the beast; and his kingdom was darkened; and they gnawed their tongues for pain, and they blasphemed the God of heaven because of their pains and their sores; and they repented not of their works.

vi. Judgement at Euphrates

12 And the sixth poured out his bowl upon the great river, the river Euphrates; and the water thereof was dried up, that the way might be made ready for the kings that come from the sunrising. And I saw coming out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet, three unclean spirits, as it were frogs: for they are spirits of devils, working signs; which go forth unto the kings of the whole world, to gather them together unto the war of the great day of God, the Almighty.

15 Behold, I come as a thief.
Blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments,
Lest he walk naked, and they see his shame.

And they gathered them together into the place which is called in Hebrew Har-Magedon.

vii. Judgement Finished

17 And the seventh poured out his bowl upon the air; and there came forth a great voice out of the temple, from the throne, saying, It is done: and there were lightnings, and voices, and thunders; and there was a great earthquake, such as was not since there were men upon the earth, so great an earthquake, so mighty. And the great city was divided into three parts, and the cities of the nations fell: and Babylon the great was remembered in the sight of God, to give unto her the cup of the wine of the 20 fierceness of his wrath. And every island fled away, and the mountains were not found. And great hail, every stone about the weight of a talent, cometh down out of heaven upon men: and men blasphemed God because of the plague of the hail; for the plague thereof is exceeding great.

And there came one of the seven angels that had the seven bowls, and spake with 17 me, saying, 'Come hither, I will shew thee the judgement of the great harlot that 'sitteth upon many waters; with whom the kings of the earth com'mitted fornication, and they that dwell in the earth were made drunken 'with the wine of her fornication.' And he carried me away in the Spirit into a wilderness: and I saw a woman sitting upon a scarlet-coloured beast, full of names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns. And the woman was 4 arrayed in purple and scarlet, and decked with gold and precious stone and pearls, having in her hand a golden cup full of abominations, even the unclean things of her fornication, and upon her forehead a name written, —

Mystery of Babylon

MYSTERY
BABYLON THE GREAT
THE MOTHER OF THE HARLOTS AND OF THE ABOMINATIONS OF THE EARTH

And I saw the woman drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the 6 martyrs of Jesus. And when I saw her, I wondered with a great wonder. And the angel said unto me, 'Wherefore didst thou wonder? I will tell thee the mystery 'of the woman, and of the beast that carrieth her, which hath the seven heads and the 'ten horns. The beast that thou sawest was, and is not; and is about to come up 8
'out of the abyss, and to go into perdition. And they that dwell on the earth shall 'wonder, they whose name hath not been written in the book of life from the founda'tion of the world, when they behold the beast, how that he was, and is not, and shall 'come. Here is the mind which hath wisdom. The seven heads are seven mount- 9
'ains, on which the woman sitteth: and they are seven kings; the five are fallen,
'the one is, the other is not yet come; and when he cometh, he must continue a little 'while. And the beast that was, and is not, is himself also an eighth, and is of the 'seven; and he goeth into perdition. And the ten horns that thou sawest are ten 12
'kings, which have received no kingdom as yet; but they receive authority as kings, 'with the beast, for one hour. These have one mind, and they give their power and 'authority unto the beast. These shall war against the Lamb, and the Lamb shall 'overcome them, for he is Lord of lords, and King of kings; and they also shall 'overcome that are with him, called and chosen and faithful.' And he saith unto 15 me, 'The waters which thou sawest, where the harlot sitteth, are peoples, and multi'tudes, and nations, and tongues. And the ten horns which thou sawest, and the 'beast, these shall hate the harlot, and shall make her desolate and naked, and shall 'eat her flesh, and shall burn her utterly with fire. For God did put in their hearts 17
'to do his mind, and to come to one mind, and to give their kingdom unto the beast,
'until the words of God should be accomplished. And the woman whom thou sawest
'is the great city, which reigneth over the kings of the earth.'

After these things I saw another angel coming down out of heaven, having great 18 authority; and the earth was lightened with his glory. And he cried with a mighty voice, saying, 'Fallen, fallen is Babylon the great, and is become a habitation of 'devils, and a hold of every unclean spirit, and a hold of every unclean and hateful
'bird. For by the wine of the wrath of her fornication all the nations are fallen;
'and the kings of the earth committed fornication with her, and the merchants
'of the earth waxed rich by the power of her wantonness.'

And I heard another voice from heaven, saying, 'Come forth, my people, out 4
'of her, that ye have no fellowship with her sins, and that ye receive not of her
'plagues: for her sins have reached even unto heaven, and God hath remembered

'her iniquities. Render unto her even as she rendered, and double unto her the 'double according to her works: in the cup which she mingled, mingle unto her 7 'double. How much soever she glorified herself, and waxed wanton, so much 'give her of torment and mourning: for she saith in her heart, I sit a queen, and 'am no widow, and shall in no wise see mourning. Therefore in one day shall 'her plagues come, death, and mourning, and famine; and she shall be utterly 'burned with fire; for strong is the Lord God which judged her. And the kings 'of the earth, who committed fornication and lived wantonly with her, shall weep 10 'and wail over her, when they look upon the smoke of her burning, standing afar
'off for the fear of her torment, saying, Woe, woe, the great city, Babylon, the strong
'city! for in one hour is thy judgement come. And the merchants of the earth
'weep and mourn over her, for no man buyeth their merchandise any more; mer'chandise of gold, and silver, and precious stone, and pearls, and fine linen, and 'purple, and silk, and scarlet; and all thyine wood, and every vessel of ivory, and
'every vessel made of most precious wood, and of brass, and iron, and marble; 13 'and cinnamon, and spice, and incense, and ointment, and frankincense, and wine,
'and oil, and fine flour, and wheat, and cattle, and sheep; and merchandise of 'horses and chariots and slaves; and souls of men. And the fruits which thy soul
'lusted after are gone from thee, and all things that were dainty and sumptuous are 'perished from thee, and men shall find them no more at all. The merchants of 'these things, who were made rich by her, shall stand afar off for the fear of her 16 'torment, weeping and mourning; saying, Woe, woe, the great city, she that was 'arrayed in fine linen and purple and scarlet, and decked with gold and precious
'stone and pearl! for in one hour so great riches is made desolate. And every ship-
'master, and every one that saileth any whither, and mariners, and as many as 'gain their living by sea, stood afar off, and cried out as they looked upon the smoke 19 'of her burning, saying, What city is like the great city? And they cast dust on 'their heads, and cried, weeping and mourning, saying, Woe, woe, the great city,
'wherein were made rich all that had their ships in the sea by reason of her cost'liness! for in one hour is she made desolate. Rejoice over her, thou heaven, and
'ye saints, and ye apostles, and ye prophets; for God hath judged your judgement 'on her.'

21 And a strong angel took up a stone as it were a great millstone, and cast it into the sea, saying, 'Thus with a mighty fall shall Babylon, the great city, be cast down,
'and shall be found no more at all. And the voice of harpers and minstrels and 'flute-players and trumpeters shall be heard no more at all in thee; and no crafts-
'man, of whatsoever craft, shall be found any more at all in thee; and the voice 23 'of a millstone shall be heard no more at all in thee; and the light of a lamp shall 'shine no more at all in thee; and the voice of the bridegroom and of the bride 'shall be heard no more at all in thee: for thy merchants were the princes of the 'earth; for with thy sorcery were all the nations deceived. And in her was found
'the blood of prophets and of saints, and of all that have been slain upon the earth.'

19 After these things I heard as it were a great voice of a great multitude in heaven, saying, 'Hallelujah; Salvation, and glory, and power, belong to our God: for true
'and righteous are his judgements; for he hath judged the great harlot, which did 'corrupt the earth with her fornication, and he hath avenged the blood of his ser'vants at her hand.' And a second time they say, 'Hallelujah.' And her smoke 4 goeth up for ever and ever. And the four and twenty elders and the four living creatures fell down and worshipped God that sitteth on the throne, saying, 'Amen;
'Hallelujah.'

THE WORD OF GOD AND THE THRONES OF JUDGEMENT

And a voice came forth from the throne, saying, 'Give praise to our God, all ye 5
'his servants, ye that fear him, the small and the great.' And I heard as it were the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunders, saying, 'Hallelujah: for the Lord our God, the Almighty, reign-
'eth. Let us rejoice and be exceeding glad, and let us give the glory unto him: 7
'for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready. And 'it was given unto her that she should array herself in fine linen, bright and pure:
'for the fine linen is the righteous acts of the saints.'

And he saith unto me, Write, Blessed are they which are bidden to the marriage 9 supper of the Lamb. And he saith unto me, These are true words of God. And I fell down before his feet to worship him. And he saith unto me, See thou do it not: I am a fellow-servant with thee and with thy brethren that hold the testimony of Jesus: worship God: for the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy.

i. The Word of God arrayed for War

And I saw the heaven opened; and behold, a white horse, and he that sat 11 thereon, called, Faithful and True; and in righteousness he doth judge and make war. And his eyes are a flame of fire, and upon his head are many diadems; and he hath a name written, which no one knoweth but he himself. And he is arrayed 13 in a garment sprinkled with blood; and his name is called the Word of God. And the armies which are in heaven followed him upon white horses, clothed in fine linen, white and pure. And out of his mouth proceedeth a sharp sword, that with it he should smite the nations: and he shall rule them with a rod of iron: and he treadeth the winepress of the fierceness of the wrath of Almighty God. And 16 he hath on his garment and on his thigh a name written, King of Kings and Lord of Lords.

ii. Birds to the Supper of God

And I saw an angel standing in the sun; and he cried with a loud voice, saying 17 to all the birds that fly in mid heaven, 'Come and be gathered together unto the 'great supper of God; that ye may eat the flesh of kings, and the flesh of captains,
'and the flesh of mighty men, and the flesh of horses and of them that sit thereon,
'and the flesh of all men, both free and bond, and small and great.'

iii. Beast and False Prophet cast into the Lake of Fire

And I saw the beast, and the kings of the earth, and their armies, gathered to- 19 gether to make war against him that sat upon the horse, and against his army. And the beast was taken, and with him the false prophet that wrought the signs in his sight, wherewith he deceived them that had received the mark of the beast, and them that worshipped his image: they twain were cast alive into the lake of fire that burneth with brimstone: and the rest were killed with the sword of him that 21 sat upon the horse, even the sword which came forth out of his mouth: and all the birds were filled with their flesh.

iv. The Dragon Bound

And I saw an angel coming down out of heaven, having the key of the abyss 20 and a great chain in his hand. And he laid hold on the dragon, the old serpent, which is the Devil and Satan, and bound him for a thousand years, and cast him into the abyss, and shut it, and sealed it over him, that he should deceive the nations no more, until the thousand years should be finished: after this he must be loosed for a little time.

v. The First Resurrection

4 And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgement was given unto them: and I saw the souls of them that had been beheaded for the testimony of Jesus, and for the word of God, and such as worshipped not the beast, neither his image, and received not the mark upon their forehead and upon their hand; and they lived, and reigned with Christ a thousand years. The rest of the dead lived not until the thousand years should be finished.

6 This is the first resurrection. Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection: over these the second death hath no power; but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years.

vi. War of Gog and Magog

7 And when the thousand years are finished, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison, and shall come forth to deceive the nations which are in the four corners of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them together to the war: the number of whom is as the sand of the sea. And they went up over the breadth of the earth, and compassed the camp of the saints about, and the beloved city: and fire came 10 down out of heaven, and devoured them. And the devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where are also the beast and the false prophet; and they shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever.

vii. Last Judgement: Second Death

11 And I saw a great white throne, and him that sat upon it, from whose face the earth and the heaven fled away; and there was found no place for them. And I saw the dead, the great and the small, standing before the throne; and books were opened: and another book was opened, which is the book of life: and the dead were judged out of the things which were written in the books, according to 13 their works. And the sea gave up the dead which were in it; and death and Hades gave up the dead which were in them: and they were judged every man according to their works. And death and Hades were cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death, even the lake of fire. And if any was not found written in the book of life, he was cast into the lake of fire.

VII

THE LAMB'S BRIDE, THE NEW JERUSALEM

21 And I saw a new heaven and a new earth: for the first heaven and the first earth are passed away; and the sea is no more. And I saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down out of heaven from God, made ready as a bride adorned for her husband. And I heard a great voice out of the throne saying, 'Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and he shall dwell with 'them, and they shall be his peoples, and God himself shall be with them, and be 4 'their God: and he shall wipe away every tear from their eyes; and death shall be 'no more; neither shall there be mourning, nor crying, nor pain, any more: the first

All things made new 'things are passed away.' And he that sitteth on the throne said, 'Behold, I make 5

'all things new.'

And he saith, Write: for these words are faithful and true. And he said unto me, They are come to pass. I am the Alpha and the Omega, the beginning and the end. I will give unto him that is athirst of the fountain of the water of life freely. He that overcometh shall inherit these things; and I will be his God, and he shall be my son. But for the fearful, and unbelieving, and abominable, and murderers, and fornicators, and sorcerers, and idolaters, and all liars, their part shall be in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone; which is the second death.

And there came one of the seven angels who had the seven bowls, who were 9 laden with the seven last plagues; and he spake with me, saying, 'Come hither,
'I will shew thee the bride, the wife of the Lamb.' And he carried me away in the Spirit to a mountain great and high, and shewed me The New Jerusalem the holy city Jerusalem, coming down out of heaven from God, having the glory of God: her light was like unto a stone most precious, as it were a jasper stone, clear as crystal: having a wall great and high; having twelve gates, and at the 12 gates twelve angels; and names written thereon, which are the names of the twelve tribes of the children of Israel: on the east were three gates; and on the north three gates; and on the south three gates; and on the west three gates. And the wall of the city had twelve foundations, and on them twelve names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb. And he that spake with me had for a measure a 15 golden reed to measure the city, and the gates thereof, and the wall thereof.
And the city lieth foursquare, and the length thereof is as great as the breadth:
and he measured the city with the reed, twelve thousand furlongs: the length and the breadth and the height thereof are equal. And he measured the wall thereof, a hundred and forty and four cubits, according to the measure of a man, that is, of an angel. And the building of the wall thereof was jasper: and the city was 18 pure gold, like unto pure glass. The foundations of the wall of the city were adorned with all manner of precious stones. The first foundation was jasper; the second, sapphire; the third, chalcedony; the fourth, emerald; the fifth, sardonyx; the sixth, sardius; the seventh, chrysolite; the eigthth, beryl; the ninth, topaz; the tenth, chrysoprase; the eleventh, jacinth; the twelfth, amethyst. And the twelve gates 21 were twelve pearls; each one of the several gates was of one pearl: and the street of the city was pure gold, as it were transparent glass. And I saw no temple therein: for the Lord God the Almighty, and the Lamb, are the temple thereof.
And the city hath no need of the sun, neither of the moon, to shine upon it: for the glory of God did lighten it, and the lamp thereof is the Lamb. And the nations shall walk amidst the light thereof: and the kings of the earth do bring their glory into it. And the gates thereof shall in no wise be shut by day (for there shall be no night 25 there): and they shall bring the glory and the honour of the nations into it: and there shall in no wise enter into it anything unclean, or he that maketh an abomination and a lie: but only they which are written in the Lamb's book of life.

And he shewed me a river of water of life, bright as crystal, proceeding out of 22 the throne of God and of the Lamb, in the midst of the street thereof. And on this side of the river and on that was the tree of life, bearing twelve manner of fruits, yielding its fruit every month: and the leaves of the tree were River and Tree of Life for the healing of the nations. And there shall be no curse any more:
and the throne of God and of the Lamb shall be therein: and his servants shall do him service; and they shall see his face; and his name shall be on their foreheads.
And there shall be night no more; and they need no light of lamp, neither light of sun; for the Lord God shall give them light: and they shall reign for ever and ever.

EPILOGUE

SEVEN LAST WORDS

6 And he said unto me, These words are faithful and true: and the Lord, the God of the spirits of the prophets, sent his angel to shew unto his servants the things which must shortly come to pass.

7 And behold, I come quickly. Blessed is he that keepeth the words of the prophecy of this book.

8 And I John am he that heard and saw these things. And when I heard and saw, I fell down to worship before the feet of the angel which shewed me these things. And he saith unto me, See thou do it not: I am a fellow-servant with thee and with thy brethren the prophets, and with them which keep the words of this book: worship God.

9 And he saith unto me, Seal not up the words of the prophecy of this book; for the time is at hand. He that is unrighteous, let him do unrighteousness still: and he that is filthy, let him be made filthy still: and he that is righteous, let him do righteousness still: and he that is holy, let him be made holy still. Behold, I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to render to each man according as his work is.

I am the Alpha and the Omega,
The first and the last,
The beginning and the end.

14 Blessed are they that wash their robes, that they may have the right to come to the tree of life, and may enter in by the gates into the city. Without are the dogs, and the sorcerers, and the fornicators, and the murderers, and the idolaters, and every one that loveth and maketh a lie.

16 I Jesus have sent mine angel to testify unto you these things for the churches. I am the root and the offspring of David, the bright, the morning star.

17 And the Spirit and the bride say, Come. And he that heareth, let him say, Come. And he that is athirst, let him come: he that will, let him take the water of life freely.

18 I testify unto every man that heareth the words of the prophecy of this book, If any man shall add unto them, God shall add unto him the plagues which are written in this book: and if any man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part from the tree of life, and out of the holy city, which are written in this book.

20 He which testifieth these things saith, Yea: I come quickly. Amen: come, Lord Jesus.

The grace of the Lord Jesus be with the saints. Amen.

LITERARY INTRODUCTIONS

THE BOOKS OF SCRIPTURE

OLD TESTAMENT HISTORY

THE History of the People of Israel as presented by themselves, — this is the formula which expresses the spirit of this portion of the Bible. It will be understood that this is something different from the History of the People of Israel in another sense of the term: according to which their historical books are subjected to analysis, with a view to harmonising discrepancies, appraising authorities, filling up gaps from independent sources of information, and by a variety of means arriving at the actual facts and their connections. The latter is the function of the historical critic. But to appreciate the history of a great people as they themselves understood it is an interest of universal literature.

It might seem that such a purpose as I have described is easy of attainment; the Bible, with historical books extending from Genesis to Chronicles, is in the hands of all: they have but to read. To read is easy; but to read with full appreciation is made difficult by certain differences in the form in which books are presented to the eye in ancient and in modern literatures. The differences, it is true, involve no great mystery; they are such as an intelligent reader can correct for himself. But it is also true that such mental checking hampers the faculty of appreciation; books under such circumstances will be read, but not read with a zest. The constant necessity of mentally allowing for difference of literary form makes such reading resemble the use of a microscope with an imperfectly adjusted focus; by thinking it is possible to make out what the blurred picture should be, but the observer's attention wearies, and all the while a turn or two of a wheel would give clear vision. To assist such mental adjustment to the form of biblical literature is the aim of the Modern Reader's Bible.

There are three points in which the historical books of Scripture differ in their outward form from modern histories. One relates to the special matter which, in any elaborate work of history, is used to supplement the main narrative, and which a modern book presents in the form of appendix and notes. Let a reader open a volume of Hallam. He will find on successive pages three lines, eight lines, twenty lines, of text in bold type, and below double columns of closely printed matter, not to speak of an appendix at the end of the chapter. Let the reader imagine such notes and appendix introduced into the text at their proper places, and printed without distinction of type: would any one read such a Hallam who was not compelled? The historical books of the Bible abound in such special matter — genealogies, statistics, documents — and in our Bibles there is nothing to separate them from the continuous narrative; in one important section, if my analysis is correct, the supplemental matter is three-fourths of the whole. I do not so far break with the ordinary arrangement as to use the form of notes and appendix: I make it a principle in no case to disturb the order of biblical paragraphs. But I have made such distinctions of type as will be impossible to mistake; the reader can, if he is intent on the narrative only, pass over the subsidiary matter, or he can come to it with the required change in the character of his attention, and then resume the narrative without break or confusion.

But the biblical narrative itself is not all of one kind: distinction must be made between narrative that is historic and narrative that is epic. To many the term 'epic' will seem strange in such connection: one reader understands epic as fiction, another associates it with a special branch of poetry, of which Homer and Virgil are types. Such limitations of the word are survivals from the narrowness of early critics, who used the Greek poets as a Procrustean bed to which the variations of other literatures were to be adapted. In its essence epic is narrative which appeals — not, as history, to our sense of information and the connections of things — but to our creative imagination and the emotions associated with poetry. To such an effect matter of historic fact, just as much as purely imaginary incident, may lend itself; it is a question of the mode of presentation. It is true that in Greek and other literatures epics are usually found to be in verse. But the great peculiarity of Hebrew among the world languages is the fact that it bases its verse system upon a thing which also belongs to prose — the parallelism of sentences; in such a language prose and verse overlap, and also there is an overlapping between the literary forms which associate themselves with prose and verse. It is therefore only what might be expected when we find that there is no verse narrative in Scripture, but what of epic there is has the outer form of prose. When these misunderstandings are removed, how is it possible to question the epic character of the great episodes which stand out with such distinctness from the surrounding history? To my own thinking there is no more ideal example of epic story anywhere to be found than the account of Joseph and his Brethren, with its varied interest of character, of incident, of picture, and of story movement. Not less ideal is the Story of the Plagues of Egypt: each incident, as it were, hewn out of the rock of historic narrative with a few epic strokes of description, while against the succession of wonders in the background are ever coming out into greater relief the contrasted heroic figures of Pharaoh with the hardening heart and Moses the deliverer, until the antagonism clashes in the final catastrophe. Ideal again, but of a different type of epic, are the strange adventures of David under the persecution of Saul; of yet another type, the long-drawn episode of Absalom's Rebellion. And when we have the giant figure of Elijah, sole against the organised worship of Baal, must the heroism cease to be epic simply because it is of a spiritual order? The counterparts of these stories would in other literatures have been poems, with matter invented for literary effect. The Hebrew epics are portions of the national history, fitted into their proper place in the narrative; and the elasticity of the Hebrew language has caused them to be attracted to the prose form of the surrounding matter. The literary appreciation of the Bible will then require a different mental attitude to these different kinds of narrative. The slightest warning of the difference will be sufficient; and I have done no more than separate the epic stories by a title for each.*

There is a third point in which Scripture history needs adjustment to the outer form of modern books. Even an essay or a sonnet is improved by being presented in its true form. History differs from these in being lengthy, and the mental grasp of the whole is proportionately more difficult, unless the effort of sustained attention is assisted by indications of plan, of divisions, and connections. The books of the Bible from Genesis to Chronicles, would make a work a little longer than that very long book entitled Green's Short History of the English People. In the work of Green constant assistance is given by the disposition of chapters and sections; only to read over the table of contents gives a clue which will carry the reader through the intricacies of the whole. How far the original writers or arrangers of biblical history were from the thought of such assistance, is well seen in the fact that the titles in the Hebrew Bible to the books of the Pentateuch are simply the first words of each. In the English Bible the titles of the books, mostly from the Septuagint, are fairly descriptive of the matter; but they contain no suggestion of the relation of each to the whole, and there is a total absence of larger groupings. In this presentation of Scripture then I have ventured, independently of all other divisions, whether of verses, chapters, or books, to arrange in what seem natural and logical sections, and indicate by a title the relation of each part to the whole.

The portion of the Bible devoted to history seems to present a singularly clear

* It will readily be understood that these two kinds of narrative, so widely separated in some cases, in others shade off into one another until a section of a book partakes of the nature of both. I have had a reason in my own mind for each classification, and sometimes I have stated the reason in the notes. In any case, the slightness of the mode adopted to distinguish the two will reduce the practical effects of a wrong classification to a minimum.

historic whole; clear, not through a unity of plan laid down by a single writer, but through the sheer force of national consciousness animating each annalist or editor, however many there might be. It is a history not only clear, but philosophical, regard being had in the use of this word to the different conception of the philosophy of history in ancient and in modern literatures. The modern historian is essentially an inductive worker, who begins upon the facts he can test, interrogates these for their connections, and in his constructive work so narrates incidents as to make them suggest their own interpretation. But the biblical writers brought to their work a philosophy of history ready made. History to them was the Chosen Nation exercising its commission to represent its God to the nations; round this point of view all incident grouped itself, to whatever portion of the past they turned their eyes. And round this idea the historical writings of the Bible fall into their natural divisions: a succession of 'books' presenting stages in the fortunes of the Chosen Nation, and wider divisions dealing with phases or national development so extensive that the very character of the history itself becomes changed in each.

The history in its First Part describes the Formation of the Chosen Nation; and is exactly coterminous with the biblical Genesis. Two of the lesser divisions, or 'books,' may be distinguished. The first might be entitled The Beginnings of Things: essentials of world history viewed from their bearing upon the Chosen Nation, previous to the call of Abraham. The second book presents the Chosen People as a Patriarchal Family; following the fortunes of Abraham and his descendants in Canaan, the land promised to their seed, until the strange incidents which bring them, in the third generation, into Egypt. Both books may in their general character be called Primitive History. The greater part of them is made up of incidents related with an epic simplicity suited to recollections of the world's infancy. What else there is — great world movements, chains of connection between nations, more special features of peoples associated with Canaan itself — makes a sketch map of general history, into which the story of the coming nation can be fitted.

Part Second starts with the descendants of Abraham as a nation; it relates the Exodus, or Migration of the Chosen Nation to the Land of Promise. But the Children of Israel are a nation only in numbers; the horde of slaves have to be converted into an organic people during their period of migration. Hence this portion of the whole is Constitutional History. Its matter — covering the biblical Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers — falls into two natural divisions: book three describes the Migration from Egypt to Sinai, book four the Thirty-eight Years' Wandering in the Wilderness. Both books are in the main composed of constitutional documents — laws and ordinances, covenants, statistical papers. Important incidents are often incorporated in these; otherwise the stream of historic narrative shrinks in these books to small dimensions. But the demand upon our severer attention is relieved at two points by epic interest of the highest: for the third book opens with the account of the Plagues of Egypt, and book four towards its close introduces the Story of Balaam.

If the deliverance from Egypt was the birth of the nation, the entry into the Promised Land constitutes its coming of age. Moses had been a patriarch to the nation in its wilderness wanderings; when this authority is withdrawn, independence soon brings out a conflict between two forces — the nation's sense of its special prerogative of a Divine headship, and on the other hand a craving for a visible king in imitation of surrounding nations: prototype of the perpetual conflict between the Church and the World. Accordingly the Third Part of the history presents the Chosen Nation in its efforts towards Secular Government. The Judges make a salient feature of this transitional period from which it might appropriately be named. But in detail there is a division into three books. Book five is occupied only with the Conquest of Canaan; and here the authority of Joshua is a paler reflection of that of Moses. With book six we get the Succession of Judges, and the sporadic efforts of the nation towards united action; here the idea of secular kingship first crystallises in the abortive usurpation of Abimelech. But round Samuel — alike judge and prophet — the antagonism of the theocratic and the secular forces in the people becomes pronounced; and our seventh book deals with the Establishment of Kings and the Rise of the Prophetic Order. Through all three books the character of the history adapts itself to a transitional period. It is Incidental History: striking incidents are narrated with epic fulness, while the historic framework, except at the close, is slight and formal.

Part Four of the history brings us to the Kings. With David the institution of kingship was fully established; but not less fully established was the succession of prophets, who were the outward representatives of the original conception that God was the direct ruler of his people. In Moses the prophetic authority had been the sole and supreme ruling power; under the kings there remained to the prophets only the power to make protests, and utter Divine warnings; if the phraseology of modern politics might be allowed, prophetic authority instead of being the government had become the opposition. Hence this portion of the history of Israel presents the Chosen Nation under a Secular Government side by side with a Theocracy. It suggests obviously three divisions. Book eight deals with the kingdom under David and Solomon; book nine with the Schism, and kingdoms of Israel and Judah side by side; the tenth book follows the kingdom of Judah by itself to its Captivity. And the whole is Regular History; there is arrangement of matter, and the relation of incident in proportion to its historic bearing. But the epic element, instead of being lost, takes a new departure in the stories of the prophets and their valiant witnessing for God amid national corruption.

The Captivity makes an historic break; the river of Israelitish history runs underground, and when it reappears its whole character is changed. The Bible contains no 'history' of the exile, though the spirit of the period is admirably conveyed in the 'stories' of Daniel and Esther. When the history is resumed in its final section the Chosen Nation of Israel has become the Jewish Church; the place of the prophet in protest against the king is taken by the scribe cherishing the religion of the law. The Chronicles (with their continuation, the books of Ezra and Nehemiah) do not make a sequel to the history of the Books of Kings; but the whole is retold from a different point of view, according to which things change their proportions. If a history of England had been written under Oliver Cromwell, its spirit might have differed from that of other histories of England as the spirit of Chronicles differs from the spirit of Kings. Accordingly Part Five of our history is Ecclesiastical History.

To sum up. Bible History, in the Old Testament, is a framework of historic outline, into which are fitted stories, or other forms of creative literature, which emphasise the spirit of the narrative, and bring out as it were the high lights of the picture. The whole is an ordered scheme of philosophic history, its philosophy being the religious conception of the People of Israel as the Chosen Nation, ordained to represent their God to the other nations of the world, that through them all peoples may be blessed.

Genesis

The first of the five divisions of Bible History coincides with the biblical Book of Genesis. It is concerned with the Formation of the Chosen Nation. The stories, or historic sections, into which this divides itself have each an interest of their own. But it is not difficult to catch the further interest of the connection between them, and the bearing of each part on the whole thought of the mission of the Chosen Nation. It is chiefly on this last that I touch in the brief notes which I offer at the close of this work. The first book treats of such world beginnings as the creation, the first appearance of sin in the world, and then, in the curse of Cain, the first formal separation of righteous and wicked. When the history of the world begins over again after the Flood, there is again a separation in the family of Noah between the righteous and the wicked of the future; and it is Canaan who is the prototype of the sinful peoples, soon by the confusion of speech to be dispersed over the face of the earth. All this makes stages of approach to the calling out of the righteous nation, to whom the land of the Canaanites is to be given for their Land of Promise. And these landmarks in the history of the world are linked together by strings of genealogies.

The second book begins with the Call of Abraham, and follows his migration into the land of Canaan. Many of the stories bring out the careful sifting of the seed that is to inherit the promises; one after another falls out of the line of kinship o succession — Lot, Ishmael, Esau — to become ancestors of Israel's troublesome neighbours in the days to come. The offering of Isaac emphasises how the seed of Abraham is not its own, but devoted to a Divine mission. Some of the sections of a more historic character are occupied with accounting by their traditions for local names in the Land of Promise; or they prepare the way for understanding future relations between Israel and the surrounding peoples. But the main stream of interest follows the succession of the Fathers, and it becomes fuller as it goes on. Thus at last is reached Joseph, the link between the family of Abraham and the world empire of Egypt; round him is centred the elaborate story which covers one-fifth of the whole of Genesis, and is a noble climax. Here and elsewhere it will be seen how the two kinds of narrative which I have distinguished have nevertheless a close mutual relation; and how in the Story of Joseph and his Brethren epic is used as a mode of historic emphasis.

The spirit of the whole is Primitive History: and as such its literary interest has never been surpassed. The devout spirit of Abraham the world's first missionary, the tent life of Sarah and Hagar or Leah and Rachel and their maids, the idyllic negotiation by which the marriage of Rebekah is arranged, the perplexities of a patriarchal family in the midst of settled peoples, the fraternal strife of Esau and Jacob, the character development of Jacob that hovers so strangely between shrewd worldliness and the dawning of a spiritual life — these touch the modern imagination with as much force as the psychology of the latest novel. And perhaps the twofold character of the narrative is nowhere better illustrated than in the Story of the Burial of Sarah. On the surface this has the quaint interest of retaining the garrulous pomposity with which oriental life invests so ordinary an incident as the purchase of a piece of land. In its deeper sense the incident makes an epoch: the embryonic nation is in the nomad stage which has no point of fixity but its sepulchres; in buying a tomb for the first of its dead the Chosen Nation has taken possession of the Promised Land.

The Exodus

The second division of Old Testament history is The Exodus, or Migration of the Chosen People to the Land of Promise. But the details of the migration itself are the least part of the biblical Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers; the period of the journeyings in the wilderness is utilised for the gradual formation of the indiscriminate families of Israel into an organic nation. Hence the bulk of this portion of Scripture is occupied with such documents as laws, covenants with God, ordinances of rites and ceremonies and a sacred calendar, specifications of sacred architecture, census and statistical information, allotments of territory, and an itinerary. It is thus the Constitutional History of Israel. With other peoples the constitution is a thing of gradual development, an unfolding which follows the progress of the nation through all its stages. But in the case of Israel its constitution is elaborated once for all in this its period of discipline in the wilderness; and the constitutional lore of its literature is massed together at this one point of its history.

I fear that in this part of the Bible the mode of presentation I have thought necessary to adopt will try the reader's patience. He will be disappointed, in approaching a great period of a nation's history, to find what seems a rivulet of narrative running through a wide meadow of documentary supplement. But a little attention will show him that this outer appearance is true to the logical character of the content. If the purpose of the sacred history was only the story of Israel in the wilderness, then certainly several incidents the relation of which I have put into small type might stand as part of the main historic narrative. But the history that stretches from Genesis to Chronicles must be looked at as a whole. In that whole the portion here under consideration appears as the constitutional organisation of the people; constitutional enactment becomes the governing interest, and the incidents gravitate to the enactments in which they find their importance.

Thus the reader must guard against supposing that the use of small type in this part of Scripture indicates inferior importance. Some of the sections so presented are no doubt of minor interest. But under this form will appear the Law of the Ten Commandments from Sinai; the Covenant of the Second Table, with the incidents of popular rebellion, of Divine anger and propitiation, which led up to its institution; the Covenant of Holiness, with its impressive promises and warnings; in a mere legal assignment of Levitical and priestly functions will be found incorporated the stirring events of the rebellion of Korah; a whole Midianite war is narrated as a preliminary to a Law of Spoils. In this Constitutional History it would be more nearly correct to regard the supplementary sections as the main interest, and the narrative as secondary.

This thread of historic narrative follows a few incidents of the march from Egypt incidents bringing out the miraculous rain of manna, and the miraculous provision of water in the dry wilderness. So we are brought to Sinai, the great centre to the law-giving portion of the history of Israel. This has been book three in my arrangement of the whole: The March from Egypt to Sinai. When the narrative of the journeyings recommences we have book four, The Thirty-eight Years' Wandering in the wilderness. Thus the turning-point in the whole period is the incident of the Spies, the murmurings arising out of which led to this backward march, until the generation enervated by Egypt should be wholly consumed, and a new generation, growing up under the growing constitution of Moses, should be prepared to take possession of their Land of Promise. In contrast to former pictures of murmuring and mutiny we now get events which bring out the glad surprise of the new people as their strength is tried against the gigantic Sihon and Og, and the foes are utterly exterminated. The future history is partly anticipated by the further incidents which describe a portion of Israel as settling the conquered lands on the east of Jordan.

Two incidents stand out from the rest, in which the narrative takes upon itself the graphic fulness that belongs to epic poetry. The choice of the two illustrates how biblical history uses epic as a means of historic emphasis. The first of the two presents the actual deliverance from Egypt. We can follow as if they were contemporary events the deliberate attempt to exterminate a whole people; the marvellous preservation of the babe Moses; his life choice between Egyptian royalty and the championship of an enslaved people; his exile and solitude, made the scene of the revelation to him of the new Divine Name. All the natural symptoms follow of a private individual nerving himself with difficulty for an heroic task. Then the tone of the story rises to the chain of miracles which is to crush the obstinacy of an imperial power; the very elements of nature, as the Wisdom of Solomon reflects, interchanging like musical modulations to compass the freedom of God's people. There is the final night, with its rapid transitions between panic and rejoicing; until the final culmination of the story is reached in the Song of Deliverance: Moses and the men of Israel, in augmenting stanzas, celebrating with growing fulness the inexhaustible wonder of the theme, while Miriam and the women fill up the intervals between stanzas with the dancing refrain of ecstasy:

> Sing ye to the LORD, for he hath triumphed gloriously:
> The horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea.

Forty years of toilsome travel and legislative history pass, and once more the strong light of epic picture is turned upon the same people in the Story of Balaam, — the Balaam appropriately chosen in the prophetic drama of Micah to be Jehovah's witness to his dealings with his people. Balaam belongs to the scattered worshippers of Jehovah unconnected with the Chosen Nation; he is brought by the enemies of Israel, a stranger to all that has happened, to curse in the powerful name of his invisible God this rising people of the desert. He stands for this purpose on the solitary mountain peak, from which the encampment of the sons of Israel is visible on the plain below. But the sight he sees overpowers him, and the curse becomes a blessing. In strains of prophetic rapture he sings of a people dwelling alone, not to be reckoned amongst the nations; their numbers are countless as the dust; their ordered camp in contrast with the rude tents of the nomad peoples is as aloes which the LORD has planted, as cedar trees beside the waters. It is God who has brought them out of Egypt, and the shout of a king is amongst them. There is no divination against the sons of Jacob; like the wild-ox they shall smite through their enemies. And a prophetic vision succeeds, a future in which the foes of Israel fall helpless all around, until the vision becomes dim by the very extent of its horizon:

> Alas, who shall live when God doeth this?

Two vivid pictures, of slaves under the taskmasters of Pharaoh, of an irresistible people just about to enter upon its career of conquest, with the long-drawn process of constitutional development which has transformed the one into the other: this makes the form in which The Exodus is presented in the biblical history of the Chosen Nation.

Deuteronomy

At the point of Old Testament history we have now reached is found what is only in appearance a break. We have followed the interweaving of history, story, and document through long periods of time. It is only a single moment of history that is covered by the Book of Deuteronomy: but that moment is the Farewell of Moses to Israel. The place of story is taken in this book by oratory and song; the place of historic outline by the prefaces and notes connecting the orations and songs; while the single document is the Book of the Covenant on which orations and songs are founded.

It is not an exaggeration to say that no work of literature which has ever appeared has produced a greater sensation than the Book of Deuteronomy. Every one knows the romantic episode of its first appearance in history — a discovery, or a rescue from oblivion which would be the equivalent of a discovery.* King Josiah with youthful fervour is meditating a repair of the temple; the treasury is cleared out, and in it is found 'a book.' Whether this was Deuteronomy itself, or a larger roll including it, we have no means of determining; but it was certainly the contents of Deuteronomy which produced the effect that followed this discovery. The book was read before the king; he rent his clothes as he listened; a thrill of horror went through the nation at the denunciations of woe against idolatry coming to light when the idolatry was fully established in the land. There ensues the most sudden reformation movement in all history. First there is the great gathering in the temple, "all the men of Judah and all the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and the priests, and the prophets, and all the people, both small and great." The book is read before them; they enter into covenant with the Lord, the king leading them from his lofty platform. Then they turn to a fury of purging zeal: there is breaking of idolatrous vessels, shattering of obelisks, defiling of high places throughout the land and slaying of their priests. Then with a recovered sense of national purity the people feel able to keep the feast: "surely there was not kept such a passover from the days of the judges that judged Israel, nor in all the days of the kings of Israel, nor of the kings of Judah."

From an external reformation the masses of the people soon fell away. But the effect of Deuteronomy was not transient. It henceforward became the chief religious literature of the people of Jehovah. Every true Israelite recited one of its chapters as his daily devotion. The most spiritual of the prophetic writers are deeply imbued with its thought and its expressions. Alike the polished Amos and the rugged Hosea reflect the influence of Deuteronomy; Isaiah and Ezekiel show traces of it; the writings of Jeremiah are saturated with it through and through. When, centuries later, the great prophet of Nazareth appeared, even to him Deuteronomy was the great book of the law. Its phraseology weaves itself into his speeches, and it is almost invariably from this one book of the law that he quotes. Sentences of Deuteronomy rise instinctively to his lips as weapons with which to repel the tempter. And when he sums up the whole of God's law to his chosen people in two words, it is the central sentence of Deuteronomy which he cites as "the first and the great commandment."

In the critical discussions of our own day it is again Deuteronomy which is the chief storm centre around which controversy rages. And here I should like to say that this book affords a specially clear illustration of the principles of treatment underlying the Modern Reader's Bible. From this work are excluded, not only theological questions and religious dogma, but also questions of historic criticism. To this last objection has been taken: it has been pronounced unsound to dissociate literature from history. Of course, in one sense of the term no one proposes to separate them. No one suggests that an individual reader, because he takes an interest in a purely literary treatment of a work, should therefore be debarred from also taking an interest in its history. No one disparages the importance of historic criticism: the questions of history raised by biblical criticism are not so much important as inevitable. I do not even say that historical investigations into ancient documents are without results on purely literary appreciation, though I do believe that this particular element of literary study has been overestimated. Historic criticism deals with questions of authorship, and with the connection between a work of literature and its age. But I have long been of the opinion — though it is an unfashionable one — that it is a disturbance to literary appreciation to have the personality of an author interposed between the reader and the work he is studying. For myself I desire such a study of Shakespeare's plays as would be unaffected in a single detail if it could be proved that the plays were written by Bacon; nor can I see that the orations of Moses in Deuteronomy become one whit less eloquent if it be shown that the Moses of history had nothing to do with them. And even as regards the light thrown upon a work by its historical surroundings, though this may be considerable, yet it is least important just where the literature is most worthy of study. Lesser works may owe much, or even all, to their historic setting. But the masterpieces of literature, which are for all ages and all peoples, carry within themselves light enough for their interpretation.

But what I am most concerned to insist upon is that historic and critical analysis on the one hand, and literary appreciation on the other hand, should not be united in the same treatment. A specialist, who is devoting a large amount of time and attention to a confined field, may be able to hold the two side by side. But the general reader, whether he be reading merely for pleasure, or studying a work as an item in universal literature, ought to take his criticism and his literature separately; like oil and water, they are alike essentials of life, but they will not mix. When literary appreciation and critical discussion come together, it is the literature that goes to the wall. Does any one suppose that a play of Shakespeare could hold its own if the curtain had to descend two or three times on a scene, while Dr. Furnivall and Professor Dowden came forward to discuss whether the scene were Shakespeare's or Fletcher's, or whether Middleton might not have had a hand in it? Must the Porter in Macbeth wait for his cue until Dr. Furness has had time to enumerate before the audience the 'best views' from Coleridge to Hudson on the question whether such jesting was worthy of Shakespeare? Yet to ask this is not to doubt the value of such discussions in their proper place. When criticism has finally settled the matter, let us strike the passage out altogether; but until we are prepared for this, let us have it without a hint of interpolation. And if any one objects that my parallel is an exaggerated one, I reply that the very objection is fresh evidence in favour of my contention. It is only because the text of Scripture has been so broken up and overlaid by commentaries that it seems unnatural to go to the sacred writers for the same intensity of literary effect for which we look in Shakespeare.

To some it appears like a plea in favour of looseness and inaccuracy thus to advocate a study of literature from which one of the forces determining literature has been designedly excluded. They forget the other kind of looseness and inaccuracy that comes in when two incompatible treatments are mingled together. For is there any element of accuracy more fundamental than perspective? Yet critical studies by their very nature tend, while they are in progress, to distort literary perspective. The disputableness of a detail is by no means in proportion to its intrinsic importance. Yet the historic analyst — on pain of inaccuracy — must do the detail justice to the full extent of its difficulty. When he has finished, the small has been expanded, as regards demand on mental attention, to the dimensions of the great, and perspective is upset. The impression of the whole has been disturbed like the disturbed consciousness of a man with a trifling ailment: in fact his nose is slightly swollen, in feeling he is all nose. More than this, the perspective of historic and of literary treatment are two different things, and the Book of Deuteronomy is an excellent illustration of this. When I turn to a modern critical work dealing with this portion of the Bible, I find three-fourths of the discussion or more concentrated upon the 'Book of the Covenant,' and the difficult questions which it undoubtedly raises; the rest of Deuteronomy is merely paraenetic matter which can be despatched in a few pages. But when one approaches the volume as part of world literature, it is this 'merely paraenetic' matter which becomes the one claim on our attention — the orations culminating in song which no other oratory has ever surpassed; while from this point of view the 'Book of the Covenant' may be relegated to small type, as a document to be taken as read. Again, the 'structure' of Deuteronomy, from the standpoint of historic criticism, is (so to speak) a horizontal structure — elements drawn from different sources running side by side; the literary is a vertical structure — the succession of parts from beginning to end. Neither treatment is more accurate or more important than the other; they are merely different.

I go further, and lay down that the purely literary examination of an ancient work is a necessary stage in its historic discussion. The literary treatment takes a work as it stands; history goes behind this to inquire by what means it has obtained its present form, and accordingly what authority it carries. In the case of Deuteronomy the historic analyst must determine whether it was written by the author traditionally associated with it, or by some different author, or written by an author and modified by an editor, or whether it may not have been compiled from various sources. But whichever of these alternatives proves true, there must be a somebody who is responsible for the book in its present shape. As a literary student I desire to get at the point of view of that somebody — author, editor, or compiler — or rather at the point of view of the readers to whom he presented the book, and I desire to see it as they were intended to see it. For no one suggests that Deuteronomy was received by the people of its age as a compilation; that their interest was historic and not literary; that the impression which created a religious revolution was an enthusiastic discrimination between D and JE. It is the aim of this series to put the present-day reader into the position of the readers who received the successive works of Scripture. To print the work as it stands is not sufficient, for the mental attitude of our readers has changed, and expects more than was expected in antiquity: to disappoint this expectation is to create a false and inaccurate impression. Deuteronomy (to take a slight illustration) has several passages which its text presents as parentheses, whereas a modern writer would have made them footnotes; a modern reader dealing with the exact text gets an impression of awkwardness of style, where there is nothing but difference of page setting. When by various methods a reader has been able to come to an ancient work with no merely accidental obstructions of form to divert his attention, and when he has, without distracting questions of correlative interest, been able to follow it from beginning to end, and take it in as it stands, then and not till then is he in the position for further inquiries as to its origin and history.

This plea for independent literary study is not mere theorising. It is a consideration thrust upon me by experience, by my own personal experience, and experiences I have gathered as a lecturer on literature. The splendid critical enterprise of our times, whatever it is destined to achieve in its own field, has yet by an oblique effect tended to retard rather than stimulate the literary enjoyment of the sacred books. It is a thing just calculated to foster that which is the great literary weakness of our age. The enormous multiplication of reviews and magazines on the one hand, and on the other hand the totally inadequate training in literature offered by universities and schools, combine to produce a tone of mind that prefers reading about literary works — which is easy — to reading the literature itself — which will often need strained attention. So biblical criticism is ready to hand and in full currency; but to drink in the beauty and impressiveness of the sacred writers at the fountainhead is not a popular occupation. I have known persons of culture, who could have given off-hand a very fair statement of the difficulties of the Deuteronomic covenant, yet hear with astonishment a reference to Deuteronomy as oratory, and turn to certain neglected chapters to see if there were any foundation for this. I have known a man of considerable literary taste, in arranging a programme of lectures in biblical literature, strike out Deuteronomy as a 'dull book.' I quite believe that this interference of criticism with literary appreciation is no more than a passing phase of its progress. And meanwhile the Modern Reader's Bible attempts to do something towards redressing the balance between the two: laying before the most general reader works of Scripture to be interpreted from themselves, without the distraction of critical difficulties, and with such illumination as comes from adjustment between the spirit and the form that is presented to the eye.

Deuteronomy then, as a literary work, is a collection of the Orations and Songs of Moses, constituting his Farewell to the People of Israel. This much is obvious. It is true that the prefatory matter connecting the various parts presents, even from the literary point of view, obscurities which are not easy to understand. I have endeavoured to deal with these in the notes. Here I would speak of only two points: the splendour of the oratory in itself, and the further interest, separating this from every other collection of speeches, connected with the mode in which the parts are united into a succession.

In dealing with oratory it is natural to speak first of the correlation of sentences. What in other departments of literature is subordinate, here comes to the front; as drama presents a scene in the medium of dialogue, so the medium of rhetoric is the concatenation of sentences. The 'rush of speech' which belongs to oratory is in this book seen in its perfection: yet is always held in perfect command. The speaker will begin in the simple style of historic survey, entirely free from the straining after effect which makes a speech all peroration. But when the feeling rises — when Moses tells of all the way the Lord has led the people in the wilderness, or depicts the bright prosperity of life in the good land, or contrasts with recurrent rebellions the simple requirements of service and love — the musical poise of sentences lays hold of the reader. As the motion of a vessel in a long voyage continues itself in the traveller's brain after he has landed, so no one can read Deuteronomy through without the swing of its sentences being felt even when there are no words to fill them out. And when the orator's passion rises to a climax, we have a breathless torrent of woes sustained to a length without precedent in the literature of denunciation. I am tempted to a personal reminiscence. When I was a beginner in literary studies I recollect setting myself as an exercise to read through on three successive days, each at a single sitting, an oration of Demosthenes, one of Burke, and the Book of Deuteronomy. I would not be understood as recommending such comparisons of merit, but I well recollect the feeling I had at the time that neither of the other two rose to the oratorical level of the speeches of Moses.

But oratory does not consist merely in sentences: it has a soul as well as a body. In the thought of this book what is most impressive is a strange clash between opposing tides of feeling. On the one hand Deuteronomy has been well described as the most spiritual book in the Old Testament. In common with a few of the psalms, and the loftier parts of prophecy, it breathes an ardent love to the invisible God, a spiritual awe of the unseen I AM, a heart religion penetrating through the surface of duties to the spring of holy motives. The speaker may well have been in the mount forty days and forty nights: his speech shines as well as his face. All this is true; but on the other hand it is true that nowhere else in Scripture does the utilitarian side of religion appear so nakedly stated or so urgently pressed. When a proverb declares that the way of the wicked is stumbling, or unites righteousness with all good things to enjoy, it comes as a general statement, and may mean no more than that the God of providence is also the God of morals. But Moses holds out direct material consequences in all their details. When he threatens, he almost catalogues the plagues and diseases that will follow disobedience; when he promises, he speaks in set terms of the basket and the kneadingtrough, of vineyards and fig-trees, and increase of cattle and sheep. He even goes so far as to draw attention to the difference between the Egypt from which the people have come out and the land of promise to which they are journeying: how that the fertility of Egypt lay in the diligence of those who cultivated it, while Canaan, as a land of hills and valleys, was at the mercy of the God of heaven's rains, and disobedience to his service would mean a heaven shut up and barrenness of soil. Whence this close union between the highest spirituality and the appeal to the lower motives? It lies in that which makes the supreme interest of this book, — the personal position of the Moses of Deuteronomy. In himself he is a lofty, spiritual nature, yearning with a parent's love to the people he leads. But this people a long experience has revealed to him as incapable of rising to his spiritual plane; a people yet in the childhood of what we call real life, to be enticed with promises and frightened with threats. And alternately he pours his spiritual fervour into their dull ears, and then falls back helplessly on to the material considerations which alone will move them. Moses "whom the Lord knew face to face" is a spiritual conception which tasks the imagination to take in. Moses as a lonely leader, yearning to impart himself to a commonplace people yet in the bonds of sense and fear — here is a human interest such as belongs to none other of the world's great orators.

There is something more even than this in Deuteronomy. It reflects not the whole career of Moses, but only its close. It is his Farewell to the people he has led. The personal situation underlying the succession of speeches is a situation of all the most pathetic. Moses alone realises all that the life in the promised land may be; and Moses alone of all the vast assembly is the one who will never see it. "The Lord was angry with me for your sakes:" this is the phrase under which the speaker veils the breakdown of his life task; this, with the thought that he must never go over Jordan, comes again and again as a pathetic break in the majesty of his periods. This situation, from its first appearance to its final consummation, makes the scope of Deuteronomy. Other books of oratory are collections of miscellaneous speeches, perhaps unified by some general period of history. Here a succession of orations is wrought into the dramatic catastrophe of a life.

The first oration is the beginning of the end. It is the Announcement by Moses of his Deposition from his office of Leader. He describes the accepted authority by which he led the people through the great and terrible wilderness; the rebellion against that authority at Kadesh-barnea, which brought about the thirty-eight years' wandering in the wilderness until the rebellious generation was consumed. But Moses himself had been entangled in the rebellious outbreak of his people; and then was made known to him his doom to leave the passage into the land of promise to another leadership. He describes again the new era that commenced with the crossing of the brook Zered, and how kingdoms went down helplessly before a people under approval of their God. And now we are allowed to see how the personal hopes of Moses rose with the successes of Israel, and he besought that the strong hand of God might achieve for him the sight of the land beyond the river; how he was bidden, Ask me no more of this matter; the Pisgah sight, but not the land itself should be his. So his leadership is at an end: the commandments of which he has been the interpreter can be no more added to nor diminished from: to obey them shall be Israel's wisdom amongst the nations. And the final thought is the 'jealousy' of the holy God — Moses himself has had to bow to it — which will brook no departure from his law. But with jealousy is found the mercy that shall be theirs in the future as in the past.

> For ask now of the days that are past, which were before thee, since the day that God created man upon the earth, and from the one end of heaven unto the other, whether there hath been any such thing as this great thing is, or hath been heard like it? Did ever people hear the voice of God speaking out of the midst of the fire, as thou hast heard, and live? Or hath God assayed to go and take him a nation from the midst of another nation, by temptations, by signs, and by wonders, and by war, and by a mighty hand, and by a stretched out arm, and by great terrors, according to all that the LORD your God did for you in Egypt before your eyes? Unto thee it was shewed that thou mightest know that the LORD he is God; there is none else beside him.

The second and third orations belong to the same day: the great day which was in the life of Moses what in David's life was the inauguration of Jerusalem, or in the life of Elijah the sacrifice at Mount Carmel. The commandments and statutes given by Moses from time to time are now drawn together for the first time into a written 'Book of the Covenant': and this is the day of its installation. Moses is to deliver the Book of the Covenant — so I read the indications of the prefaces — to the Levites and elders: the Levites to have the custody of the book itself, the elders standing in the presence of the whole people as their representatives to receive the Covenant from Moses' lips. The oration which commences the day invokes the Great Name.

and immediately places side by side with the love of that Name the love of the Law, which the people shall have in their minds and hearts, speaking of it when they sit in their houses or when they walk by the way, when they lie down and when they rise up. The past of God-protected journeyings through the wilderness, the future of Divine discomfiture of the foe, pass alternately before us, each used to find fresh matter of urgency for obedience to the law. At the close there is a reference to the further ceremonial which will make the sanction of the Covenant. But at this point the lengthy Book of the Covenant is inserted, and it is to be understood that it is here recited, a prototype of a long series of periodical recitals in the days to come.

When we pass on from the chapters containing this Book of the Covenant, we seem to find arrangements in progress for the rehearsal of a great ceremonial. The ordinance laid down by Moses establishes the ceremonial of the Blessing and the Curse as an institution of the promised land. Meanwhile Levites are moving amongst the people, impressing upon them that they are that day become the people of Jehovah. Moses is seen arranging a division between the tribes who shall represent the Blessing and the Curse on the Gerizim and Ebal of the future. The rehearsal actually commences: curses in ritual form are chanted by the Levites, and the whole multitude answer Amen. But it is only a rehearsal; and at this point Moses stops the ceremony, and takes the whole into his own hands. In the language of oratory, and not of ritual, he portrays the crowd of blessings. And then, in the full strength of oratorical denunciation, he goes again over the ground of the curses. Three times in this most terrific of speeches does the wave of holy passion rise and fall. At first the exuberance of the woes enumerated overpowers our attention; the musically parallel sentences, which in other speeches make perorations, here come for intervals of relief. Another stream of denunciation brings the serving the LORD with joyfulness, and with gladness of heart by reason of the abundance of all things, into contrast with the serving of the enemy in hunger, and in thirst, and in nakedness, and in want of all things; and the siege laid by this mystic enemy is extended in picture to the last horrors the mind can conceive. Yet another flood of speech begins with the 'glorious and fearful' Name; and there passes before us the fading of the life of promise into plagues and exile; in exile the trembling heart, and failing of eyes, and pining of soul; until for a final climax the original salvation of Israel is reversed in a voluntary returning to the land of bondage, the people selling themselves to their enemies for bondmen and bondwomen, — a climax yet more final than this, for "no man shall buy you."

The fourth oration has the same locality, the same audience, and the same general appeal. Yet it is distinctive. Between Orations III and IV the book takes the greatest stride that can be taken in religious development, — the advance from merely national to personal religion. Moses reviews the different orders of people before him, all assembled to make covenant with God: heads, tribes, elders, officers, all the men of Israel, the little ones, the wives, the strangers: he thinks of others who shall hereafter take part in such solemn acts. His appeal is, whether there be any man or woman, any family or tribe, nourishing evil in their hearts, and trusting to escape in the general righteousness. He proclaims how the sinful individual shall be separated for evil, the land of a sinful tribe overthrown in a curse. But he adds words of mercy; he urges how the word is not afar off but in the mouth and heart of the people; and he makes solemn appeals to choose life and not death. There remains the sad personal farewell: though Moses speaks of his failing frame, none but words of strength and courage are on his lips as he installs Joshua in his place, and retires from his leadership for ever.

From the parallelism of oratory we rise to the parallelism of Hebrew verse, and Moses seeks to embalm in poetry the message of his life to Israel. Round the central thought of the Rock of Israel, immovable in his faithfulness and judgment, we have successive pictures of Divine tenderness and rich bounty, of Jeshurun waxing fat and kicking, of kindled vengeance heaping up mischiefs and destructions, of blindness and utter misery, of God returning to avenge his people in their last extremity, while the nations rejoice in their restoration.

The Song has commenced the final day of Deuteronomy: in the course of this day the long-expected summons comes. The whole people understand the mysterious doom, and line the route by which Moses sets out on the journey from which there will be no return. Like a father laying his hands from a death-bed on the heads of his children, the departing leader blesses the several tribes, as he passes along: each tribe gathers up the words spoken to it, to be treasured along with its battle cries and its folk lore, as part of the tribal heritage. Then turning to behold the whole multitude for the last time, Moses lifts his hands in general blessing:

> There is none like unto God, O Jeshurun,
> Who rideth upon the heaven for thy help,
> And in his excellency on the skies.
> The eternal God is thy dwelling place,
> And underneath are the everlasting arms.

Simple, bare prose tells the rest: the solitary ascent into the mount, the long gaze over the land of promise, the death. But no wealth of poetic imagination could have made a close for Deuteronomy more harmonious with the body of the book. The life of the lonely leader has passed out into solitude: and "no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day."

The Judges

This third division of Bible history is devoted to the Great Transition in the history of the People of Israel. Hitherto this people of the invisible Jehovah have stood out from the other nations of the world as a nation with an invisible king. Henceforward they will be found assimilated in the form of their government to other peoples; in theory God is still their ruler, but the visible representatives of Jehovah are no longer men raised up by a spiritual call, but 'kings' succeeding by natural descent. The intervening period then presents the Chosen Nation in its efforts towards Secular Government. The period may be named after 'The Judges': in the title of this office we have the history in embryo. It is the most general of biblical terms for a ruler, and may be applied to government of different types. As the judges are raised up from time to time by the Divine authority, the name reflects the office of the prophets. On the other hand, the function for which the judges are required is the more or less complete union of the nation for purposes of national defence; and this was the basis of the popular demand for kings: "We will have a king over us; that we also may be like all the nations; and that our king may judge us, and go out before us, and fight our battles."

This third part of the history covers three books. Book five is concerned with the Conquest of Canaan. In spirit it is a continuation of what has preceded; Joshua is a second Moses. He wields an authority not inferior to that of his predecessor:

> All that thou hast commanded us we will do, and whithersoever thou sendest us we will go. According as we hearkened unto Moses in all things, so will we hearken unto thee: only the LORD thy God be with thee, as he was with Moses.

The passage of the Jordan is a counterpart to the passage of the Red Sea. The 'Doomsday Book,' as it has well been called, occupying ten chapters of Joshua, carries on the documentary legislation of the Exodus. And the Farewell of Joshua, and the covenant which he inaugurates, are an echo of the successive appeals of Moses, and the covenants in the land of Moab, which constitute the Book of Deuteronomy.

It is in the sixth book that the character of the period becomes apparent — a Succession of Judges. Isolated stories describe these officers raised up in times of national emergency, and wielding an undefined authority as long as they live. The intervals between are conveyed by the characteristic formula that there was no king in Israel, and every man did that which was right in his own eyes. As we traverse the order of events, we seem to catch an approach to the coming unification of the people in the hegemony of various tribes in succession according to the quarter from which the national danger comes. At the opening of the book the tribe of Judah takes the leadership by the Divine appointment of the lot; Simeon uniting with Judah by invitation. In the achievements of Deborah and Barak, with the enemy in the north, the tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali come to the front. When Gideon and Jephthah are waging war against such external foes as the Midianites and Ammonites, the men of Ephraim seem to claim an hegemony; the leaders indeed do not come from that tribe, but the Ephraimites make it a grievance that they have not been called upon as a matter of course; and in the case of Jephthah this leads to a civil war. Under Samson the 'Philistines' are the foe, and the tribe of Dan has the lead; the stories of Samson are followed by the interesting narrative of the Danish migration. And at the close of the sixth book the tribe of Benjamin has attained such power as to be able for a long time to carry on a successful war against the whole of the rest of Israel. Though it seems paradoxical to cite a civil war as evidence of unity, yet this cohesion of eleven tribes is the largest advance that has yet appeared in the transition from tribeship to nationality.

It is in this sixth book that we find the idea of kingship distinctly formulating itself It comes upon us quite suddenly in the story of Gideon. After the great deliverance wrought by him the appeal is made in these terms:

> Then the men of Israel said unto Gideon, Rule thou over us, both thou, and thy son, and thy son's son also: for thou hast saved us out of the hand of Midian. And Gideon said unto them, I will not rule over you, neither shall my son rule over you: the LORD shall rule over you.

After the death of Gideon, however, his illegitimate son, Abimelech, obtains the help of his mother's brethren, slaughters in oriental fashion the seventy sons of Gideon, and is crowned 'king' in Shechem. As Israel's first royal procession is marching in triumph, an escaped son of Gideon suddenly confronts them from the safe height of Gerizim, and pours upon them the biting satire of his fable in scorn of people and king, and of the whole idea of kingship.

> The trees went forth on a time to anoint a king over them; and they said unto the olive tree, Reign thou over us. But the olive tree said unto them, Should I leave my fatness, wherewith by me they honour God and man, and go to wave to and fro over the trees? And the trees said to the fig tree, Come thou, and reign over us. But the fig tree said unto them, Should I leave my sweetness, and my good fruit, and go to wave to and fro over the trees? And the trees said unto the vine, Come thou, and reign over us. And the vine said unto them, Should I leave my wine, which cheereth God and man, and go to wave to and fro over the trees? Then said all the trees unto the bramble, Come thou, and reign over us. And the bramble said unto the trees, If in truth ye anoint me king over you, then come and put your trust in my shadow: and if not, let fire come out of the bramble, and devour the cedars of Lebanon.

In the application of his fable, Jotham prays that fire may come out from Abimelech and devour the men of Shechem, and that fire may come out from the men of Shechem and devour Abimelech. The usurped kingship continues three years, and ends in the feud which Jotham had foreseen; in the most literal sense fire comes forth from Abimelech and devours the men of Shechem, and a fate not less ignominious than fire brings vengeance from the men of Shechem upon Abimelech.

When we pass to the seventh book, we see, not in precise statements, but in what the incidents imply, that the national sense of unity which gave strength to the demand for visible kingship, has been making advances. Eli is called a judge; yet it is evident that in his time Shiloh and its 'temple' has become the national centre; the ark, moreover, is regarded even by the wicked Hophni and Phinehas as the symbol of unity and national strength, and several sections of the history are devoted to the wonders of the ark in the hands of the enemy. Again, a notion seems vaguely to have established itself of the authority of the judge as descending in his family; not only is prominence given to the doings of the sons of Eli, but the unworthiness of Samuel's sons is distinctly associated with the demand of the people for a recognized king. Of course the centre of this seventh book is Samuel. He is the last of the judges. Unwillingly, by Divine command, he becomes a king-maker. And he is above all things a prophet. It is in the stories of Samuel, moreover, that we first come across the companies of prophets: at the very time when an hereditary kingship is commencing we find the beginning of a prophetic order that would maintain prophetic traditions from generation to generation. Thus the seventh book is the Establishment of Kings and the Rise of the Prophetic Order.

All three books may be described as Incidental History; and the separate pictures of notable incidents, which have made the bulk of the narrative, draw together at the close into the long epic history of the Feud of Saul and David, filled with the interest of strange adventure, and made yet more beautiful by the link of tenderness which joins together Jonathan and the man who by Divine appointment is to take from him his inheritance. Over and above the interest of story, the successive episodes have shown a growing tendency to connect themselves with other literary interests. Even Joshua, in the thick of the battle of Gibeon, breaks out into the ballad of the sun and the moon standing still. The war against Sisera produces the Song of Deborah, in which the full power of the lyric ode is revealed. The story of Abimelech, we have seen, has the literary association of a pointed satiric fable; and the wedding of Samson gives occasion for a complete game of popular riddles. When the birth of Samuel is narrated, we get the lyric thanksgiving of Hannah. And the final words of this section of the history are the exquisite elegy on Saul and Jonathan which brings us in contact with the founder of the Book of Psalms.

Another type of literature has a notable illustration in one of the stories of this division, which in ordinary Bibles appears as the distinct Book of Ruth.

This story of Ruth is the very ideal and type of the Idyl: so delicate in its transparent simplicity that the worst service one can do the story is to comment on it. Suffice it to say, that the warp and woof of the tale is a friendship between two women, and the grand climax up to which all is working is the birth of a baby. Instead of war, of national strife, of political struggle, we have here great harvest festivals, ceremonial transfers of land, family contingencies such as hard times and emigration, marriage, and the strange process by which an extinct family might be restored to the genealogies of Israel: such little things as are great to the little man of every day life. Even in the little there are gradations: in this book are found such minutiæ as attentions shown to a shy stranger girl at the harvest feast, petty contrivances for giving her unfair advantages in the gleaning field; details still more minute — how Ruth pockets the scraps at the feast to bring home to her mother in law, who has been sitting solitary at home while she herself has had the excitement of the harvesting,

Trifles like these, fitted into their natural frame the idyl, have kept afloat over some thirty centuries of time; and this story has done more to enable us to live over again in remote Hebrew antiquity than all the heroic achievements of Joshua and Judges put together.

The Kings

Though kings may give a title to their period of Bible history, they are not its heroes. The earlier course of history has brought out how the people of Israel had revolted from the invisible kingship which had once distinguished them from the nations, and had insisted upon visible rulers who should succeed by natural descent; how at the same time had grown up a never-failing order of Prophets, for whom no commission was necessary except the spiritual power of their message as they claimed to speak in the name of Jehovah. Thus two opposing forces henceforward constitute the government of Israel: it is a Secular Kingship, side by side with a Theocracy of which the spokesmen are the Prophets.

It will be remembered that it is not the purpose of the present work to construct a scientific history of Israel such as would satisfy historical inquiry, but to render assistance in catching the impression of the national history that is part of the national literature, its elements standing to one another in just such relations as commend themselves to the national consciousness. Of the three books entering into this section the first and third present no difficulties in this respect; the sacred history is here transparently clear. But in the book which intervenes, from the nature of the case the history is complex; and the reader will do well to grasp the landmarks of the period before he plunges into the details.

The first of these books — eighth in the whole series — narrates the reigns of David and Solomon. The general character stamped upon this period of history is hardly apparent in this book; there can be no great conflict between king and prophet when the spirit of prophecy has been absorbed by the king. The personality of David is perhaps the most splendid in all history. The great of other peoples have to choose between different kinds of greatness; they may be mighty in the world of action, — heroes of war, of policy, of enterprise; or as poets, artists, thinkers, they may have a greatness that belongs to the world within. David is in both kinds of greatness the supreme hero of his nation. He is the warrior of Israel, and the founder of the monarchy from whom all kings trace their reigns. He is equally the centre of Hebrew poetry, with whose name both earlier and later song is associated in the Book of Psalms. He is the inventor in musical art;* whereas the Greeks never learned the art of combining lyre and flute, David's orchestra of cornet, trumpets, cymbals, psalteries, and harps shows the union of strings, wind, and percussion which is supposed to constitute the distinctiveness of modern music. With him as head is further associated whatever else of art is permitted to the Hebrews: the architecture of Solomon's temple is designed by his father, and he establishes the courses of sacred ritual which constitute Israel's highest art. And all this splendour of achievement is crowned with a personality that is intensely human, and lovable in all human relationships. Accordingly, David is the hero of this book of the history; it is occupied with narrating his capture of the impregnable Jerusalem, its solemn inauguration as the capital of Jehovah's monarchy, with his building of the royal palace and the preparations for the temple, and with the various wars by which the kingdom was consolidated, and neighbouring peoples thrown into such subordination that henceforward Israel appears as one of the family of great nations, with no foes to fear but such as constitute the great empires of history. Most appropriately this book includes some of the royal minstrel's poetical compositions: a song of victory which may be called the masterpiece of sacred lyrics, and the touching 'last words' of David, acknowledging how the Divine favour has been over his reign, —

* Compare Amos vi. 5.

> — as the light of the morning, when the sun riseth,
> A morning without clouds;
> When the tender grass springeth out of the earth,
> Through clear shining after rain.

But the history of David includes the story of a crime, — an adulterous passion ending in intrigue and murder. This brings a curse upon his household; and a large portion of this eighth book is occupied in narrating, with the full power of epic story, the feud between the sons of David and the rebellion of Absalom. Here then is an opportunity for prophetic remonstrance to appear even in the reign of the man after God's own heart. At three points is found the prophetic opposition to the king: by Nathan the project of building the temple is suspended in the name of God; by the same Nathan the rebuke is sent for the sin of Uriah's murder; and after the sin, whatever that sin may have been, of numbering the people, the prophet Gad appears to denounce the judgment.

What David achieves, Solomon carries further. If David founded a kingdom, Solomon extended this to an empire. If David had the honour of ordering the service of Jehovah, it was reserved for his son to lay the art and riches of Tyre under contribution to crown the Divine service with the temple. David is the centre of Hebrew poetry, Solomon is the founder of its wisdom, — a wisdom which the queen of distant Sheba comes to admire. It would seem that this wisdom of Solomon, which the incident of the dream at Gibeon makes in a special degree a thing of heavenly gift, occupies at this point of the history the position of prominence which elsewhere is given to prophecy. But the son no less than the father falls a victim to female influence. And Solomon sins on an imperial scale; 'strange women,' from the daughter of Pharaoh downward, fill the kingdom with external and idolatrous rites. Thus at the close of the reign the antagonistic elements reappear; from the commencement, when Nathan assisted to secure the inheritance to Solomon against the usurpation of Adonijah, there is no mention of prophets until Ahijah is seen giving the sanction of the theocracy to the rebel Jeroboam.

We are thus brought to the ninth book, which deals with the Schism and the Kingdoms of Judah and Israel side by side. This complex and difficult book has in external appearance a mechanical arrangement: successive sections keep the history of Judah and Israel as nearly parallel as the nature of the case permits. But the spirit of the narrative is quite different from what this might suggest. The whole is told from the prophetic point of view; and accordingly it is the kingdom of Israel which has the prominence, as the main theatre of the contest between Jehovah and the false worship of other gods. The history of Judah is here subordinate, and is treated as it appears from the point of view of the northern kingdom.

Three periods may be distinguished in the history of the double kingdom. The first is the Revolution of Jeroboam, hero of the schism; the second extends from the Revolution of Omri to the Revolution of Jehu; the third is the Fall of Israel and partial Restoration of Judah. The first is occupied with the house of Jeroboam, and the house of Baasha which followed in the second generation. At first, as already noted, prophecy is on the side of the revolt. But Jeroboam is scarcely secure on his throne before he establishes the worship of the calves, to intercept the pilgrimages to Jerusalem; he at once becomes the chief aim of prophetic denunciation, — the Jeroboam the son of Nebat who taught Israel to sin. The inauguration of his idolatrous worship is encountered by the nameless prophet from Judah, who afflicts the king, rends the altar, and with prophetic insight points through the future generations to the grand reformation of Josiah. And Ahijah himself lives long enough to denounce to the wife of Jeroboam the immediate death of her son, and the further doom of her seed until the kingdom shall be rent from them.

After various usurpations we reach the central period of the northern kingdom in the house of Omri. The founder of the dynasty builds Samaria, the splendid capital of the north. In the next generation we have Ahab, and his more famous queen, Jezebel of Tyre. Here it is no case of derelictions in the worship of Jehovah; the religion of Baal is fully established throughout the land, and the worshippers of Israel's God have to be hidden in caves and dens. The crisis brings out the full strength of the prophetic order in the splendid names of Elijah and Elisha. The two are inseparable; not only is Elisha "he that poured water on the hands of Elijah," and obtained a double portion of his spirit, but the commission actually given to the older prophet at the cave of Horeb is in the main carried out by his successor. Another feature of this period must be borne in mind: there is at this point a rapprochement between Israel and Judah. Jehoshaphat is the king of Judah who seeks to unite the service of Jehovah with the friendship of Ahab, until the ill-fated alliance meets its doom in the battle of Ramoth-gilead. And his son weds a bride of the house of Omri, — the notorious Athaliah, who as queen-mother to Ahaziah establishes the worship of Baal for a time in Jerusalem itself. This whole phase of history culminates in the famous conspiracy of Jehu, who under commission from Elisha extirpates the family of Ahab and Jezebel and the worship of Baal, and as a detail in the process brings death to the allied king of Judah. Throughout this period of the house of Omri biblical history reaches its most vivid picturing. The leading figures stand out with individual distinctness: Ahab, luxury-loving, with a heart never entirely weaned from the old worship, and reaching by a tardy repentance the mercy of not seeing the worst with his own eyes; Jezebel, grim and whole-hearted in her contest on behalf of Baal; Jehoshaphat, the courtly trimmer; Jehu, the 'furious driver,' who drives his commission of Divine vengeance through all bounds of fraud and violence; while as representatives of the spiritual forces in antagonism with these, Elijah and Elisha stand out as the giants of prophetic history.

The third period in the history of the northern kingdom is occupied with the house of Jehu, and the usurping kings that followed. Here the two kingdoms fall away from their temporary rapprochement, and their history moves in different directions. In Judah, Athaliah and her worship of Baal are overthrown by the revolution which puts on the throne the youthful Joash, and the high priest Jehoiada is able to make a covenant between the LORD and the king and the people, that they should be the LORD'S people. The lukewarmness of successors, even the personal idolatry of Ahaz, do not seem seriously to infect the people of the southern kingdom. On the other hand, the reigns of Jehu and his successors seem so many stages in the fall of Israel. Under Jehu himself "the LORD began to cut Israel short," and the east of Jordan is lost to the Syrian foe. The Syrian oppression continues during the next reign:

> But the LORD was gracious unto them, and had compassion on them, and had respect unto them, because of his covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and would not destroy them, neither cast he them from his presence as yet.

Under Jehoash and Jeroboam there is a restoration of the border of Israel —

> according to the word of the LORD, the God of Israel, which he spake by the hand of his servant Jonah the son of Amittai, the prophet, which was of Gath-hepher. For the LORD saw the affliction of Israel, that it was very bitter: for there was none shut up nor left at large, neither was there any > helper for Israel. And the LORD said not that he would blot out the name of Israel from under heaven: but he saved them by the hand of Jeroboam.

But when we reach the fourth descendant of Jehu, and his usurping successors, the Assyrian foe appears that is to make an end to the history of the northern kingdom; and the narrative grows into a general review and denunciation of the sins of Israel: their secret service in the cities, and Asherim on every hill; their hardening of the neck against the prophets and seers sent to warn them.

> And they rejected his statutes, and his covenant that he made with their fathers, and his testimonies which he testified unto them; and they followed vanity, and became vain, and went after the nations that were round about them, concerning whom the LORD had charged them that they should not do like them. And they forsook all the commandments of the LORD their God, and made them molten images, even two calves, and made an Asherah, and worshipped all the host of heaven, and served Baal. And they caused their sons and their daughters to pass through the fire, and used divination and enchantments, and sold themselves to do that which was evil in the sight of the LORD, to provoke him to anger. Therefore the LORD was very angry with Israel, and removed them out of his sight: there was none left but the tribe of Judah only.

The book ends with a brief description of the carrying away of northern Israel into captivity at Babylon; and in a tone of scorn tells of the hybrid people left to fill their place in Samaria: a people who "feared the LORD and served their own gods."

The tenth book is simple and straightforward in its history, following the Kingdom of Judah to its Captivity. It commences with the glorious reign of Hezekiah, a period dominated by the personality of the prophet Isaiah. After the reign of Manasseh, related without any suggestion of his repentance, and that of Amon, in whom no redeeming feature appears, we reach another great name in Josiah. The one event of the reign is the reformation ensuing upon the discovery of the roll of the law; a reformation too late to save the guilty kingdom, though the righteous king is to be spared the sight of the overthrow. Though it is a prophetess who foretells the coming doom, yet the heroes of this episode are a scribe and a priest, discoverers of the law; and here we seem to have a foretaste of what is to be the history of the future. The troubled reigns which follow are so many stages of the coming captivity.

All three books, though in form regular history, are in their spirit history told from the prophetic point of view; where secular events are treated it is in the barest style of annals, where events touch the controversy between God and his people the narrative rises to the height of epic interest. And not less interesting than the history of kingship is the history of prophecy so revealed. A few points may be noted. Immediately after the division of the kingdoms is found one of the strangest of Bible stories. A 'man of God' from the southern kingdom beards Jeroboam in his own land, and rebukes his idolatry: when the rebuke is supported by miracle, king Jeroboam submits, and offers his visitor hospitality. The man of God replies that his divine commission forbids his eating or drinking until he has returned to his home. On his journey back 'an old prophet from Bethel' overtakes him, offers hospitality, and is met with the same answer. But, says the Bethel prophet, "I am a prophet as thou art," and asserts that it is by divine command he is inviting his fellow prophet to return. Then the man of God from Judah returns, and eats bread. In the midst of the meal his host is overpowered by the prophetic spirit, and speaks the doom of his guest to perish for disobedience to the divine mandate. Hastening away to his home the southern prophet is slain by a lion; the prophet from Bethel weeps over him bitterly, and buries him, with every mark of contrite affection, in his own tomb.

The strange story becomes significant from the point of the history at which it appears: the schism of the kingdoms has been followed by a schism in prophecy itself — the false prophecy is henceforward to encounter the true.

At this stage how small, comparatively, does the falseness appear: a genial impulse of hospitality had tempted a worthy prophet to cover with the divine name what modern flippancy would only call a polite lie. But the other end of the scale of prophetic corruption is revealed in the Story of Micaiah. Here a politic king of Judah has joined hands with the idolatrous king of Israel; yet, uncomfortable in his impious surroundings, asks to consult with a prophet of the Lord. The schism of prophecy is embodied in the single Micaiah confronting the four hundred prophets of Baal. Invited with outward decorum but secret threats to exercise his office, Micaiah makes at first an ironical compliance, which exasperates the royal auditors. Then, rapt with spiritual fervour, Micaiah breaks into what seems a prophetic fable. He is facing the two kings in their military pomp, with aides-de-camp coming and going: Micaiah pictures Jehovah with the hosts of heaven, and his ministers waiting to go on his missions; the problem is the enticing Ahab to his ruin, and the solution is found in the minister of heaven who will make himself a lying spirit in the mouths of Ahab's prophets. By this bold figure is brought home to us how the false prophecy that had begun in trifling has grown to be the supreme agency in moral ruin.

When the history reaches the name of Elisha we seem to see a change of another kind affecting prophecy. Prophetic action will naturally include miracle, but we now begin to find the miraculous part of it becoming an interest in itself. The 'sign of the prophet' is at first the symbolic act — tearing of robe or rending of altar — which serves merely as text for the prophetic message. But gradually it comes to be the wonder-working act which draws attention for its own sake: the cycle of Elisha stories reads for the most part as a succession of mystic wonders, much like the cycle of Samson with its feats of physical strength: wonders of axe heads swimming, a cruse of oil multiplying, children cursed and destroyed by bears, leprosy healed or returning at the prophet's word. There appears a decadence, not in prophecy itself, but in the attitude of the public mind to prophecy; the wonder of the sign becomes to the onlooking people more than the moral truth which that sign is to convey. When the national corruption has proceeded so far as to use the Divine instrument of its correction for a means of wondering diversion, the ministry of prophecy is nearing its end. So in the far future, when the history of Israel shall have reached its last period, the nation will have become "an evil and adulterous generation that seeketh after a sign."

Supplementary Stories of the Exile

As a supplement to The Kings are placed in this edition two stories — in other versions of Scripture two complete books — which fall into none of the divisions of Bible History. They represent the exile of Israel, which, as a breach of continuity, the formal History of the People of Israel refuses to treat. Besides these, the period of the exile is illuminated by the brilliant stories of Daniel. But these are too closely associated with prophecy to be separated from the prophetic book in which they are found.

The Book of Tobit

In the apocryphal Book of Tobit the Hebrew Idyl reaches its perfection of naïve simplicity. The book is a picture of loving family life, and whole-hearted devotion to the simplest type of Hebrew religion and Hebrew wisdom; a story further of marvellous providences, and of angelic ministrations mingling with the common round and daily task.

The story is in its earlier part told in the first person by the father, Tobit, with garrulous simplicity. In his own land Tobit had been faithful to the law when all his tribe were false. In exile he delighted with his abundance to relieve the poor among his brethren; and incurred danger and persecution by burying the bodies of Israelites who fell victims to the cruel tyrants, and mourning over the corpses that had no other mourners to pay them their last rites. Tobit is not ashamed to show appreciation of a good dinner. But from such an untasted meal he springs up one day to bury a strangled Israelite, though this must be done at the cost of uncleanness, and loss of the festive occasion. Instead of this bringing him reward, it proves the beginning of his great misfortunes: for while he is sleeping, as unclean, in the open air, his eyes are blinded by sparrows' dung; and though he goes to the physicians, they help him not. He has to live on the bounty of his nephew; and his wife Anna ekes out their scanty means by spinning for wages.

Now comes a commonplace conjugal quarrel. In the irritation of helplessness Tobit becomes suspicious; he hears the cry of a kid in the house, given to his wife by her employers as a bounty over and above her wages, and accuses her of theft. She loses her temper, and reproaches him with his misfortune: wounding him in his tenderest part, for the taunt implies that his accident has revealed the hypocrisy of his godly life. So do small stories and great run on the same lines: Tobit is exactly in the position of Job, whose ideal patience had withstood all the trials of heaven and the adversary, yet broke down when his friends hinted that misfortune revealed sin. Tobit is crushed, and prays Job's prayer that God would let him die, since life has nothing left when his honour is gone.

Now it happens marvellously that this very day, in the distant city of Ecbatana of Media, another righteous Israelite, kinswoman of Tobit, has incurred the same misfortune of unrighteous reproach. The maiden Sarah was of beauty so surpassing that a fiend loved her, and caused the death of the seven men who successively had been given her for husbands, strangling each as they entered the bridal chamber. This mysterious doom, we must suppose, the maiden had borne with patience. But on this day, when Sarah was scourging her maids, as every Israelitish mistress believed it a point of wisdom to do, they turned on her, and under the smart of correction spoke wicked words implying that her calamity was her crime. Sarah's first impulse at the cruel suggestion was suicide. But she bethought her how she was an only child, and such a deed would bring down her loved parents with sorrow to the grave. So she also was driven to the prayer of Job, that God would let her die; and thus on the same day these same prayers of Tobit and of Sarah are offered from these distant places. "And the prayer of both was heard before the glory of the great God." The wonder-working Providence is to interpose in the troubles of these widely separated kindred families; and the angel Raphael is to be the providential instrument which is to draw the two together.

Tobit has prayed to die. But death needs solemn preparation: and Tobit, commencing to set his house in order, bethinks him of a pledge of money left by him in a city of Media. He sends for his young son Tobias. First he pours into his ears the conventional father's last counsels to a son; and a wisdom discourse, of great beauty, occupies several paragraphs of the story. Then he gives him the commission to go into Media to collect the pledge. But a guide is necessary; and Tobias seeking a guide encounters the angel, who offers himself under the name of Azarias, a fellow tribesman. There is idyllic irony as the guide is closely scrutinised by Tobit, to see whether he is a trustworthy person, and when the wages are proposed — a drachma a day, with expenses, and something extra if the expedition prospers; again when the father, consoling the weeping mother, says that a good angel shall go with their son.

So "they both went forth to depart, and the young man's dog with them." In that sentence is the quintessence of the idyllic spirit. It is not as if the dog had any function to perform in the journey. It is not recorded that he barked at the great fish, nor howled when the fiend was approaching, nor even sniffed suspiciously at the mysterious 'Azarias.' He is not mentioned again till the return journey, when "they went their way, and the dog went after them." There was nothing for Tobias's dog to do in this famous expedition, but he had to be there all the same. There may be a flaw here in the Hebrew colouring of the story, for the Jews did not use dogs as friendly companions. But to the general reader this dog has made Tobias a real flesh and blood young man for all time.

The journey involves a marvel: a great fish that threatens Tobias, but is finally eaten; and the heart and liver and gall of the fish are, by the angel's advice, preserved for certain sovereign uses hereafter. There is another incident of the travel: the terror of Tobias when, as they approach their destination, the mysterious guide announces his purpose to marry the youth to the notorious Sarah. Tobias urges against the dangerous honour that he is the only son of his parents. But the guide instructs him how to meet the evil spirit with prayer and the fumes of the fish's heart and liver.

> Fear not, for she was prepared for thee from the beginning; and thou shalt save her, and she shall go with thee. And I suppose that thou shalt have children of her.

This produces such a change of feeling in the young man that, when they have arrived, and greetings are passed, and the family likeness has been duly noted, Tobias refuses to eat until the marriage proposal has been made, and the contract signed. In the bridal chamber that night all goes according to the saying of the angel. But outside the parents have their misgivings; and when morning has come the father of Sarah works off the anxiety of waiting by digging a grave, to be prepared for all emergencies. But bride and bridegroom are found unharmed, and the wedding feast is kept up with magnificence for a whole fortnight, the holder of Tobit's pledge being one of the guests.

Meanwhile at home the parents were counting the long days, Tobit consoling his wife with what hopes he could. When at last the son is seen approaching, Anna runs forward to fall weeping on his neck. The blind father seeks to follow, and stumbles; his son catches him, and (by the angel's directions) spirts the wondrous fish's gall on to his eyes. Tobit rubs the smarting eye-balls, and rubs the film away. He breaks out in blessings to God, for he sees his son Tobias. There are general rejoicings, and a second wedding feast has to be celebrated in the bridegroom's home.

But now comes the time when the guide has to be discharged. Father and son lay their heads together, and come to the conclusion that for such signal services nothing less can be offered than the half of Tobias's large dowry. This is communicated to 'Azarias': and then the great revelation comes. It is made with fresh stores of wisdom lore, that terminate in the explanation how all their pious thoughts had been known to God, how a vision had been with them all these months, until the climax is reached: I AM RAPHAEL. They fall on their faces, and when they rise, the angel is gone.

The story is wound up with hymns of praise, with pictures of prosperous old age of magnificent obsequies both of parents and parents in law, and finally the life of Tobias in Ecbatana, where the pious Israelite of the second generation sees fulfilled his father's great hope, — the destruction of the cruel city Nineveh and vindication of the prophecies of Jonah.

The Book of Esther

Very different in tone from this is the Book of Esther, which indeed hovers on the boundary line between Idyl and Epic History. When we consider that it depicts a crisis in the fortunes of Israel, which threatened to extirpate the race from the hundred and twenty-seven provinces of Ahasuerus by the cruel vengeance of Haman, it might seem necessary to classify the book as epic, if not as formal history. On the other hand, the instrument of deliverance is a girl, newly raised from her quiet life with her cousin and guardian Mordecai to the throne of an empire. And her course of action is girlish rather than heroic. Esther is no Judith, to devote herself to a bold deed for the salvation of her people. She feels all the tremors of an ordinary woman when suddenly called upon to fill an heroic role.

> Fast ye for me, and neither eat nor drink three days, night nor day: I also and my maidens will fast in like manner: and so will I go in unto the king, which is not according to the law: and if I perish, I perish.

The further details of her action are eminently girlish. When the critical moment is passed, and the sceptre is held out to her, she does not invoke vengeance on the foe, but simply asks the unusual boon that the king and Haman and herself may banquet together. Instinct seems to have taught her that against all the power of Haman and the king she must fight with the attraction of her beauty; and by the banquet of the three Esther is bringing to bear upon the royal voluptuary the new force of beauty seen in what might be called domestic attractiveness, so different from the place of woman in the revel such as Vashti had refused, or from the merely sensuous intercourse of a king with the chief favourite of his harem. Moreover, as if to balance these tête à tête banquets we have, on the other side of the story, the two family councils of Haman and his wife Zeresh and their friends. Again, the turning point in the narrative is a thing no more heroic than a sleepless night of the king, with its strange consequences in the reward of Mordecai and the mortification of Haman. The story concludes picturesquely in the 'Feast of Lots,' in which will be ever commemorated how Providence disposed where the Chance of the lot had proposed, and used as its providential instruments the fidelity of Mordecai and the girlish beauty of Esther.

The Chronicles

This last division of Old Testament history introduces a great change in the character of the history of Israel as presented by itself. Previous divisions — Genesis, The Exodus, The Judges, The Kings — have followed a chronological succession of events from the creation to the captivity. The Chronicles, it is true, carries forward the narrative to the Return of the Exiles: but this is only a fragment of its purpose, and the whole is presented afresh, from Adam to Nehemiah. And the spirit of the literature is changed from National to Ecclesiastical History; the Hebrew people have silently changed into the Jewish* Church. Nor is it merely in the story of the Return that the change appears: the first of the nine Chronicles into which the whole seems to divide itself, before the narrative of events has commenced, is a collection of genealogies leading up to the allocation of the returned families in Jerusalem and in the other cities, necessary as basis for the Temple service and the dues by which that service was to be supported. And the whole succession of Chronicles is animated by the conscious ecclesiastical spirit; that the ideas of State and Church have become separated in men's thoughts is manifested by the very zeal of Ezra and Nehemiah to identify the two. The history of The Kings and of The Chronicles is alike religious: but different aspects of the religious spirit make themselves apparent. Up to this point we have had what is essentially prophetic history. Now the prophets are above all things representatives of one single religious idea — the theocracy: their interest is the kingship of Jehovah as the basis of Israel's politics, the struggle of Jehovah against usurping idols; and their ministry appears mainly in the northern kingdom where Baal worship has the greatest chance to establish itself. In the light of this supreme struggle for the worship of Jehovah the prophets can let particular modes of worship drop into the background. But the priests and scribes who give us The Chronicles can ignore northern Israel, as shown by its history to have fallen outside the pale of the Church; it is the unfaithfulness of Judah, the avowed people of Jehovah, that attracts their attention. They of course notice and denounce sin and idolatry where it appears; but they go beyond this, and seize with fulness and animation upon every detail of past history which can have any bearing upon the constitution and order of the Temple service.

To the change in the spirit of The Chronicles must be added a change in the outer literary form: while in parts we have, as before, continuous history, elsewhere, at the beginning and end, we have not history but historic materials — a collection of such original documents as constitute the sources from which history may be constructed. The principles of arrangement underlying the Modern Reader's Bible are perhaps nowhere more essential than in the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah. The reader who has nothing beyond the traditional printing of our bibles to guide him might well suppose himself to be reading a consecutive narrative where, in reality, he has before him a succession of isolated memoirs and papers; an interval of several decades may, without anything to signify a break, intervene between the end of one sentence and the beginning of the next. The question is not of minute historical analysis discovering gaps and discrepancies in what presents itself as an harmonious unity; there is nothing but the faulty printing of our bibles — with its absence of forms and divisions universal in other books — to mislead the reader into understanding as a unity what makes no profession to be other than a succession of extracts. I have separated the different Chronicles, and by titles indicated where the reader is to expect statistical and genealogical information, and where the personal memoirs of Ezra and Nehemiah with connective matter binding them together.*

The greatest interest in this section will perhaps be in that part which goes over the ground already traversed by the history of The Kings. There can be few better exercises in the study of historic literature than to compare these two divisions of Bible history, alike in their treatment of the same incident, and again in the general historic perspective which may be traced through lengthy portions of narrative. An incident that is necessarily prominent in both works is David's bringing of the Ark to Jerusalem, the ceremony by which was inaugurated the metropolis of Jehovah's monarchy. I proceed to indicate in parallel columns the two treatments of a common theme.

II Samuel vi	I Chronicles xiii
	David's proposal to the Assembly in the matter of the Ark: with the special mention of priests and Levites.
The Assembly, and first attempt to bring up the Ark, ending in the death of Uzzah, the leaving of the Ark in the house of Obed-Edom, and the blessing on the house of Obed-Edom.	The same matter as in the corresponding section of Samuel: considerable verbal agreement, with some difference of names, etc.

* Perhaps we may think of such personal memoirs as taking, to some extent, the place of the stories which, in other divisions, have alternated with history.

II Samuel vi	I Chronicles xiii
	David's recognition that none but the Levites should bear the Ark — long lists of appointments both for the bearing and the musical performance.
The procession of the Ark — David's part in it — Michal's displeasure — the inauguration carried to the point of a dole to the assembly.	Substantial agreement with the corresponding section of Samuel — but fuller musical details.
	Appointment, apparently dating from this festival, of a regular ministry before the Ark: names of officials and citation of (leading) songs used.
Return home of the people and of David.	Exactly as in Samuel.
Sequel of Michal's displeasure.

In the essential facts of the day's proceedings there is almost complete verbal agreement. But the long account of the Chronicles recognises the interest of the Levites in the proposed action from the outset, and interprets the violent interruption of Uzzah's death as a judgment on the overlooking of the Levitical function of bearing the Ark; musical details are elaborated, and even the names of those officiating are inserted; moreover a long section brings out the ritual ministry dating from this day of inauguration, and cites in full the anthems of worship. On the other hand, the narrative of The Kings includes a detail which is unrepresented in the other version, and this is the bearing of the day's proceedings on the household and family affairs of David.

It is even more important to survey the whole period over which The Kings and The Chronicles move side by side, in order to catch the difference of historic perspective by which particular incidents bulk large or small in the two versions. The reader will find in the Notes (below, page 1562) a detailed conspectus of the sections in which I have divided the two works, arranged so as to show correspondences. To whatever portion we turn of the history covered by such a table we find indications of the different treatment of events in the national history of the prophets and in the ecclesiastical writings that make up the Chronicles. Beginning with David's reign, we find the Chronicles giving the briefest notice to the death of Saul and David's reign in Hebron; the other narrative not only tells fully the incident of Saul's death, but devotes several later sections to David's relations with the house of Saul all through his reign. The prophetic version gives David's lament over Jonathan; in The Chronicles the absence of this is characteristically balanced by the addition of a genealogy for Saul's house. Other poetic compositions of David are cited at length in The Kings: the other narrative offers no specimens of his poetry, but, as we have seen, in narrating the inauguration of Jerusalem cites in full the sacred anthems of worship. The wars of David's reign are substantially the same in the two versions. But the Ammonite war, which in The Chronicles makes a single section, is in The Kings broken in the middle by the prophetic story of the sin of David and Bath-sheba; there follows a lengthy section, quite a book in itself, relating the feud in the family of David and the rebellion of Absalom; at the end of David's reign, where the chronicler briefly records his death, The Kings relates at length the disputed succession. It is obvious that the family history of king David, which the ecclesiastical history passes over in silence, is a noteworthy department of affairs to the wider view of the prophetic writers. And perhaps a similar reason may explain, what is at first surprising, that the theme of Solomon's foreign marriages, and the idolatries they encouraged, disappears from the books of Chronicles.

When we come to the schism and the kingdoms of Israel and Judah, we find that the natural divisions of The Chronicles in this part of the narrative are twenty-five, as against seventy-six in the corresponding part of The Kings: this becomes natural enough when it is seen that forty-six out of the seventy-six sections of The Kings are occupied with the history of the northern kingdom, which the chronicler excludes from his consideration. A consequence of such exclusion is the loss of what makes the most notable feature of The Kings — the stories of Elijah and Elisha and the lesser prophets, to say nothing of the brilliantly told incidents that make the Conspiracy of Jehu. Unimportant reigns like those of Jehoram, Ahaziah, Jotham, and some weighty events, like the usurpation of Athaliah and the reformation under Joash, are nearly identical in the two versions. In the case of Hezekiah and Josiah, Judah's greatest reigns, the leading incident of each is expanded in both versions; though the invasion of Sennacherib is more fully told in The Kings, because no doubt of the prophet Isaiah's prominence in that crisis. On the other hand the remaining years of Hezekiah's reign are touched briefly by the chronicler, fully by the prophet historian, whereas the close of Josiah's reign is expanded in the ecclesiastical history and condensed in the other. It is surprising to find so much made in The Chronicles of the repentance and subsequent religious zeal of Manasseh, whereas the prophetic historian relates the whole reign without a suggestion of any change in the character of the king. Another surprise is that the history of The Chronicles is scanty just where it might have been expected to be most full of details: the reigns immediately preceding the captivity are hurried over with less of detail than even in the history of The Kings.

No single incident brings out the contrast of the two versions better than the reign of Abijah (called in The Kings Abijam). The prophetic account of the reign is a brief notice of the wickedness of the king, so great that only for David's sake was the succession continued in his family. Also mention is made of wars between Israel and Judah. The chronicler relates these wars at length, and in particular gives a fine address of Abijah to the enemy, in which the whole spirit of The Chronicles is concentrated:

> Ought ye not to know that the LORD, the God of Israel, gave the kingdom over Israel to David for ever, even to him and to his sons by a covenant of salt? Yet Jeroboam the son of Nebat, the servant of Solomon the son of David, rose up, and rebelled against his lord. And there were gathered unto him vain men, sons of Belial, which strengthened themselves against Rehoboam, the son of Solomon when Rehoboam was young and tenderhearted, and could not withstand them. And now ye think to withstand the kingdom of the LORD in the hand of the sons of David; and ye be a great multitude, and there are with you the golden calves which Jeroboam made you for gods. Have ye not driven out the priests of the LORD, the sons of Aaron, and the Levites, and have made you priests after the manner of the peoples of other lands? so that whosoever cometh to consecrate himself with a young bullock and seven rams the same may be a priest of them that are no gods. But as for us, the LORD is our God, and we have not forsaken him; and we have priests ministering unto the LORD, the sons of Aaron, and the Levites in their work; and they burn unto the LORD every morning and every evening burnt offerings and sweet incense: the shewbread also set they in order upon the pure table; and the candlestick of gold with the lamps thereof to burn every evening: for we keep the charge of the LORD our God; but ye have forsaken him. And behold, God is with us at our head, and his priests with the trumpets of alarm to sound an alarm against you. O children of Israel, fight ye not against the LORD, the God of your fathers; for ye shall not prosper.

The battle that follows this address is a complete victory for the true worshippers of God, notwithstanding Jeroboam's ambush. Of the wickedness of Abijah the Chronicle contains nothing beyond possibly this equivocal hint:

> But Abijah waxed mighty, and took unto himself fourteen wives, and begat twenty and two sons and sixteen daughters.

The last five Chronicles (according to the division in this edition) are not, as has already been said, continuous history, but a series of genealogies and memoirs, some of them personal memoirs of Ezra and Nehemiah, leading actors in the events they narrate. All five bear upon the Returns of the Exiles, and the reconstitution of the holy city and the Temple worship. Here it is that the spirit which has underlain the whole of the chronicle history appears in its most pronounced form. On the one hand, the substitution of the church for the nation is seen in the spirit of exclusiveness; the strict guardianship of purity of descent has risen into a passionate interest in the genealogies of Ezra and the reforming zeal of Nehemiah. But any such ecclesiastical exclusiveness in the people of the Return is accompanied with a deepened spirituality. The narratives of the Chronicles breathe the spirit of modern religious history. The foundation of the Temple is not, as in the time of Solomon, a royal pageant, but a sacred ceremony. The renewal of the covenant gives us, not a lawgiver Moses putting a final sanction to the divine constitution revealed through him, but a governor and scribe leading a religious service of penitence, prayer, and praise. There is a suggestion of Scotch Covenanters on their bare hillsides when we read of the people standing before Ezra in the "much rain" to make confession of unholy marriages; the companies of exiles braving the dangers of the wilderness in order to restore the desolated land of promise are a variation of the pilgrim fathers crossing the ocean to find a land of promise in an uncultivated continent. Or perhaps Nehemiah may be regarded as an Israelite Oliver Cromwell, conscious of a mission to do zealously the Lord's work against all the machinations of a Sanballat and his latitudinarian Samaritans. Such religious history cannot but be interesting. But when we view The Chronicles as an element in universal literature, we must feel that here the historical literature of Israel is a river that has run into the sands. Ezra and Nehemiah are devoting their consecrated energy to resuscitating an ideal that belongs to the past. They are outside the wider hope, which breathes not from the histories but from the prophetic literature of their people: the hope by which the fall of Israel as an organised people grows into a vision of a larger Israel, made not by exclusive weeding of its ranks, but by gathering in the nations, in hope of a Messiah in whom all peoples of the earth should be blessed.

THE BOOKS OF THE PROPHETS

To the literary mind no part of the Old Testament is more attractive than the Books of the Prophets; they make the most unique contribution of the Bible to world literature. In the religious use of Scripture, which is the special province of the churches, these books have in the past held a foremost position; if at the present moment they are less prominent — and I believe that is the case — the reason is plain: it is not the books which have worn thin, but the mode of interpretation. Traditional interpretation was at first hampered by a narrow conception of prophecy itself; when it recovered from this it was swayed out of its natural course by historic problems belonging in reality to a different sphere. The true starting point for the interpretation of any literature is a grasp of its exact literary form; when this principle is applied to biblical prophecy I believe it will recover its full interest, an interest which will be found to be not more literary than historical and religious.

In approaching this subject one misconception needs special notice. It seems almost impossible to eliminate from the popular mind the idea that 'prophecy' means 'prediction.' Yet this is a purely modern modification of its meaning. It rests upon a false etymology: the pro in this word is not the pro which means beforehand (as in prospectus), but the other pro which means in place of (as in pronoun): a prophet is one who speaks in place of another. Where Moses has been shrinking from the mission to Israel on the ground of his inefficiency as a speaker, and Aaron is granted him as an assistant in this respect, the words are:

> See, I have made thee [Moses] a god unto Pharaoh: and Aaron thy brother shall be thy prophet. [Exodus vii. 1.]

As Aaron is thus the mouthpiece of Moses, so regularly in Scripture the prophet is the mouthpiece of God. Of course prophecy, like any other form of literature, can contain, and in fact does contain predictions; but such predictions are the accident, not the essence of prophecy. Yet in traditional interpretation the idea that prophecy must be prediction has distorted the study of the books; particular passages, often of minor importance, have been over-accentuated, while the spiritual richness of the books when read as literary wholes has usually been missed.

In this broad sense every one who stands forth as a representative of God has a claim to the name of prophet. Moses thus speaks of himself; Deborah is called a prophetess; even to the nation of Israel itself, as representing its God to the other nations of the world, the hundred and fifth psalm applies the same term:

> Touch not mine anointed,
> And do my prophets no harm.

But there is a more specific sense of the word, of which much has been said in these introductions. Israel begins as a theocracy; the government of God is exercised through such as Moses and Joshua. But when at a later period the people insist upon visible kings, then prophets, who hitherto have appeared sporadically, become a settled order, ready at any moment to appeal from the secular kings to the Divine ruler of Israel. They are prophets as being representatives of the theocracy. It is easy for the modern mind to fancy the prophets of Israel as preachers or spiritual pastors. Now it is one of the many interests of the Book of Ezekiel that we can in this book see the gradual transition of the ancient prophet into the modern pastor. But apart from this special case the prophets of the Bible are not preachers but statesmen; not statesmen only but opposition statesmen; they do not minister to sympathetic congregations, but fling themselves into active life as antagonists of the prevailing system. A fine illustration of this is the account of Elijah at the cave of Horeb. As we read we feel how this story of the supreme prophet is shaping itself to the story of the founder of the Law; like Moses Elijah fasts forty days and forty nights; he ascends the mountain from which the Law was given; there is the same convulsion of all nature — earthquake, fire, wind — as the moment nears of the Divine message. But what is the Divine message so impressively ushered in? Not some deep moral truth; not some new revelation of the Divine nature. It is what may with all reverence be described as a political programme: Elijah is to work for the enthronement of a particular king of Israel, a particular king of Syria, and for the appointment of a successor to himself. If any reader of the sacred narrative has at this point a feeling of disappointment, it is only because he has been cherishing a mistaken conception of the prophetic office. When once he realises the prophets as national leaders, the full weight of the Divine message at Horeb is apparent: it contains, in embryo, the whole subsequent history of Israel to the Captivity.

To this must be added an important distinction between the earlier and the later prophets. The earlier prophets, such as Elijah, are men of action. There is no 'Book of the Prophet Elijah'; men like Elijah, Elisha, Micaiah, enter into literature as heroes of stories which others narrate. But the later prophets, like Isaiah and Jeremiah, without ceasing to be men of action, are also men of letters. Ancient Israel is one of the great literary peoples of the world. In its first stages, as with other peoples, story and song predominate; when it reaches its maturity the higher literary forms develop. The prophets become lyric poets, orators, dramatists; even — to take in the special case of Ezekiel — we must add, artists. Thus for these later prophets there is a double function. To their own day and generation they, like their predecessors, are leaders of national action. But beyond this function their literary gifts have fitted them for a wider and a perpetual audience. The same spiritual message which they have from day to day fitted to passing emergencies they now, through these other literary channels, convey to the spiritual world of all time.

This double function of the later prophets has a bearing upon the interpretation of prophecy. We call the first chapter of Isaiah discourse. But in what sense is it discourse? If it be read side by side with one of the orations of Deuteronomy a great difference will be found. In every sentence of the oration we are conscious of the presence of a great audience, and the influence of an audience upon a speaker. Either the oration was actually spoken by the historical Moses to an assembly of Israelites; or — if other views of the origin of Deuteronomy are taken — the imaginative author has done what is done in many of the orations of Cicero, he has kept the imagined audience constantly before the reader. In the chapter of Isaiah we have impassioned oratory, but without anything to suggest a visible audience or a particular occasion. The matter of this chapter will no doubt have been used by Isaiah on fifty or a hundred occasions; used as a whole, or in parts; in formal address, or passing remonstrance, as he labours in season and out of season in his prophetic vocation. The content of our chapter is something different: the essence of the message, the concentration of these multiplied prophetic ministrations, stripped of what is accidental or occasional, has adapted itself to a different literary type, and become universalised in its appeal. And what is true of so simple a thing as discourse is yet more true in application to the more elaborated prophecies of the nature of rhapsodies and doom songs. In such cases it becomes a misuse of critical ingenuity to scrutinise for indications of historic date what has its highest literary value in its independence of time and occasion.

Thus the contents of these books of prophecy will be of two kinds. In what this edition makes the second and sixth books of Isaiah — the ministry under Ahaz and Hezekiah — we have prophetic history; the writer clearly describes historical crises, and the action they called forth. Large part of the Book of Jeremiah is of this nature. The prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah are precisely dated, and are obviously special messages called forth by special occasions. But other prophecies — lyric, dramatic, rhapsodic — are clearly universalised; a rhapsody like that of Joel will be as objective a poem as a drama of Shakespeare. It is hardly necessary to add that the inspiration of an Isaiah, precisely like the sense of a Divine message announced by Milton, will find in the highest literary forms an appropriate channel of expression.

Of special interest in this connection is the Book of Amos. This prophet, besides the regular prophetic work — of appeals to the national conscience with denunications of sin, and appeals to the national imagination with pictures of judgment — has clearly had a special experience that has weighed upon him; as an outsider ministering to a people more worldly minded than his own people he has at every step encountered bitter opposition to his prophetic claims. Now I doubt if there is to be found anywhere a work of more elaborate literary structure than this Book of Amos. As one element of this elaborateness Amos — like Isaiah, but with much more intricacy — makes great use of the parenthetic interruption; what to most of us is a mere makeshift Amos wields as a weapon of rhetoric style. When this book in its full literary setting is before us we find a masterpiece of structural elaboration, with recurrent reiterations of form, rising through a sustained crescendo to an impressive climax. But we find this movement continually broken by parenthetic interruptions of passages outside the structure of the rest of the work; some of them mere snatches of interruption, others with a new elaborateness of their own. When we survey the whole, we catch the idea that these different elements in the elaborated prophecy convey different sides of the prophet's consciousness: in the sustained movement we have rhapsodically presented his lite message of sin and judgment, while in the passages of parenthetic interruption we see the prophet glancing at the personal opposition that has from time to time sought to obstruct his work of prophesying.

The relation of these Books of the Prophets to the rest of sacred literature can easily be indicated. Bible history is an historic framework connecting other literary forms which bring out the spirit and force of the narrative. These literary forms are usually story and song. But when the People of Israel reach their maturity there is a sudden expansion of literary spirit; the literary elements expressing the national consciousness break away from the historic framework, and become an independent literature in themselves. Thus the Books of the Prophets are to the later period of the nation's history what the stories and songs of the historic books have been to the earlier periods. It follows that the prophetic books should be read in their historic surroundings. But here I take a distinction. The question is not of authorship, and the biographic chronology of authors, to attain which scientific history must wade through balancings of imperfect evidence to dubious conclusions. What literary interest seeks is the historical surroundings of the prophecy, not of the prophet: these, if they are important at all, will lie on the surface of the literature itself. To appreciate the historic setting of these prophetic books nothing more seems necessary than such simple grouping of the books as I here subjoin.

Isaiah

To him who at this day reads in the Book of the prophet Isaiah the paramount question is still, 'Understandest thou what thou readest?' The literary instinct is drawn to this wonderful book by a charm which often seems to be flying from us if we press it beyond beauty of expression to clearness of thought. The version of King James's time, so grand in its English sentences, so imperfect in that connectedness of thought which lifts language into literature, has lulled too many of us into being content with prophecy as a storehouse of sacred sayings. If, desirous of something more, we go to the commentators whose Hebrew learning makes them our natural advisers, we find them intent upon other things: upon constructing out of Isaiah's writings the history of his times, upon the grand question of authorship — whether there are two or even more Isaiahs. And when in regard to some particular obscurity we seek from them exactly what has been said, no matter by whom nor when, our eagerness is dashed by finding that in the opinion of these eminent authorities we may have only the rough notes of the prophet, made yet more disconnected by the illegitimate glosses of some wholly superfluous editor.

From the Modern Reader's Bible questions of authorship are excluded: what is elsewhere claimed to be a Second Isaiah will here appear in its place as a seventh book, nothing more being postulated than what all schools of criticism may admit — that we have in these chapters a separate literary composition complete in itself. In dealing with the Biblical Isaiah, all other discussion must be subordinated to the settlement of the text. Not indeed in the ordinary sense of that phrase: for the critical determination of the Hebrew text, and the translation of its sentences into their English equivalents, it is a principle of this work to accept the Revised Version (text or margins). But an editor's work is only half completed when he has printed his author in solid columns of type, like a newspaper without the assistance that even a newspaper gives with its headings. The true form of the literary work must be presented to the eye. At present the effusion of a poetaster in the corner of a provincial journal is printed with more discrimination of poetic form than the masterpieces of the Bible. The problem of this edition of Isaiah is to ascertain, from internal evidence and the analogy of other prophecy, what are the separate compositions of which the whole book is made up, and what is the true literary form of each, and to present these to the eye with the conventional external arrangement to which a modern reader is accustomed.

It has been no easy task: the morphology of Hebrew literature goes far outside that which has been made familiar to us in a criticism founded upon modern and classical authors. We cannot repeat too often the distinction of Hebrew among the great literatures of the world: how its verse is based upon a parallelism of clauses which also belongs to rhetoric; how there is therefore an overlapping in Hebrew of verse and prose, and also of those modes of thought to which verse and prose serve but as outer expression. In the Introduction to Job I endeavour to describe how marvellous an instrument of literary power is found in this infinite flexibility of Hebrew style. But what is true of Job is true in an equal degree of Isaiah. In this writer it is easy to see that we have an orator, who wields with ease the whole armoury of rhetoric. It is easy to see also that with him imagery and poetic expression are much more than accessories: he loves to linger upon his images, and rapidly shift them, until they become lovely pictures which we dwell upon for their own sake. But Isaiah goes far beyond this: he is essentially a creative writer, and regularly conveys his thought in indirect forms of dramatic presentation. And I would suggest further that we find in his writings a fusion of all other literary forms in that new form which is here called a Rhapsody.

I am sensible of the awkwardness of attempting to introduce a new technical term in connection with literature so sacred and so familiar. But the new term is needed because the matter to be described is not paralleled in other literatures. If we are to be limited to received nomenclature, perhaps it would be best to describe the compositions which I have in view as 'spiritual dramas.' The highly dramatic instinct of the Hebrew mind, denied its natural outlet of a theatre, permeates all branches of literature alike; and so prophecy has special forms which certainly leave on our minds as we read the general effect of dramatic realisation. But these prophetic dramas are such as no theatre could compass. For their stage they need all space; and the time of their action extends to the end of all things. The speakers include God and the Celestial Hosts;. Israel appears, Israel Suffering or Israel Repentant; Sinners in Zion, the Godly in Zion; the Saved and the Doomed, the East and the West, answer one another. There is often one who speaks in the name of God, yet is not God — the Voice of Prophecy may express the idea; at times the same personality seems to be present in the scene of his ministry, and becomes the Prophetic Spectator. Not infrequently 'Voices,' 'Cries,' with no more of personality than these words imply, carry on some part of the movement. Monologue is made to do the work of dramatic dialogue; especially where the Divine monologue, apostrophising nations or classes, makes them thereby present to the scene; or where it alternates between judgment and mercy, indignation and tenderness. Nay, paradoxical though it may sound, Silence itself is a speaker in these dramas: when, in the great Isaiahan rhapsody, Jehovah challenges the idols, their dumb impotence is made by him a step in the action of the scene; similarly in the Awakening of Zion, the movement of this realistic vision is made by reiterated appeals to Zion which are met with no response, until at the very end the Watchmen of Jerusalem awake and rouse their city to the glad tidings.

Thus what of drama these prophecies contain is purely spiritual drama. But they contain also elements that are distinctly non-dramatic. The discourse of God, or of some other speaker, will be interrupted by lyric songs, rejoicing over or emphasising what has been said: and with these lyrics no personality can possibly be associated, but they come, like the chorales of an oratorio, as abstract meditations upon the situation that has been dramatically presented. Even prose discourse may have at least a prefatory place in the rhapsodies. At times, again, the movement may be carried on by fragments of narrated vision; or critical points may be announced by the author in his own words, like the elaborate 'stage directions' of the theatrical drama: in both these cases the work of drama being done by the narration which is the very antithesis of dramatic presentation. There is a difference greater even than this between the sacred rhapsodies and the drama of secular literature. In the nature of things dramatic action can never go back: the acts of a play must succeed one another in order of time. This characteristic is found in some rhapsodies, in others it is markedly absent: there may be an advance in the movement of such a rhapsody, but it is an advance which is logical and not temporal. The 'Rhapsody of Judgement' with which Isaiah concludes his 'Dooms of the Nations' falls naturally into three parts. In the first we have a destruction that embraces the whole earth; in the second it has extended to take in heaven as well as earth. The scope of the prophecy cannot be further enlarged, but in the third section there is an advance in intensity: what before was a whole picture is now seen in the steps of its progress; the destruction which was complete in part two, is only threatening to fall upon the world at the commencement of part three; yet through this third part the quickened alternation of doom and hope makes an adequate climax. Dramatically such retrogression in time would be impossible: we have here a spiritual literature which transcends the limits of dramatic form.

Thus Hebrew prophecy obliges us to make an addition to the nomenclature of literature; and the term 'Rhapsody' — consecrated alike by poetry and music to express the most vivid presentation, and that a subjective or spiritual presentation, combined with the smallest limitation of form — may serve the purpose. It is to be observed that not only must we recognise complete rhapsodies, but the rhapsodic form is found to leaven other literary forms of prophecy in all degrees of completeness. The great Assyrian discourse of Isaiah is purely discourse, except that just as the crisis of the boastful invasion is reached there is a momentary change to rhapsodic realisation — panic cries tracing the enemy's advance to the very gates of Jerusalem: then discourse resumes to narrate the overthrow of the invader and the Messianic peace that succeeds. Again — if my interpretation is correct — Isaiah's discourse of comfort to Ahaz is punctuated by snatches of the enemy's ballads repeated by the prophet in realistic scorn; the climax also to this group of prophecies is made by triumph cries of the invading enemy alternating realistically with bursts of vision of their overthrow. A type of rhapsodic treatment more developed, yet still incomplete, is found in the interesting cluster of prophecies that centre around the idea of the Prophetic Watchman. He is presented as taking up his post on the outskirts of the Holy land, peering over the eastern wilderness into the darkness of the future. Floods of vision rush upon him at intervals: the Divine voice is heard cheering on the hosts to their work against Babylon, or spectacles of rout and panic are seen: these realised visions are made to alternate with the prophet's own feelings at what he sees, or his explanations and admonitions. In the Book of Isaiah we may distinguish three portions of prophecy as rhapsodies in the completest sense: and of these the most elaborate is that which covers the last twenty-six chapters — the Rhapsody of Zion Redeemed, with its seven acts or 'Visions': The Servant of Jehovah Delivered from Bondage; The Servant of Jehovah Awakened; Zion Awakened; The Servant of Jehovah Exalted; Songs of Zion Exalted; Redemption at Work in Zion; and The Day of Judgement.

As regards literary form then Isaiah is discourse tempered by rhapsodic presentation in various degrees. What is the character of the thought which under such various forms is presented to us?

The Isaiah of the first six books may be described as a man of one idea: and his one idea is the main thought of all prophetic writing. To the corruption and evil around him he holds up a picture of a golden age in a future to be reached through a purging judgment from which only a remnant will escape. Whatever may be the immediate circumstances in which he speaks, this is always the drift of his message. He and his children are for signs and wonders in Israel: one son he has named 'Remnant Return,' the other 'Spoil and Harry.' In the vision of his call, when amid rocking temple and smoking altar and answering voices Isaiah, like Moses, is permitted to see the skirts of the Divine presence, his lips must be purified with the coal of fire before he may offer himself as messenger. And his message is to confirm the guilty in their guilt — to make their heart fat and close their eyes and ears — until the land has been purged into a desert: even if there be but a tenth left it shall be purged again, and the final remnant shall be as the stock of a tree that has been felled.

The topics of sin and judgment are everywhere being emphasised. Sin is the rebellion of children against the Divine parent, the unfaithfulness of a wife to a husband; it is the carefully tended vineyard bringing forth wild grapes; it is to forsake the rock of strength for the planting of pleasant plants and setting of strange slips and watching over the morning of blossoms — but the harvest is a heap in the day of grief and desperate sorrow. The judgment is the burning of fire under the glory of the thickets until they roll upward in volumes of smoke; it is a Day of the Lord, cruel with wrath and fierce anger, when men fling away their idols to go into the caves and rocks and holes of the earth before the terror of the Lord, and his glorious majesty when he ariseth to shake mightily the earth. The message is not always in general terms: the prophets are the statesmen of Israel, opposition statesmen, standing for the theocracy against the established secular government. To the panic-stricken Ahaz the ideal of Divine presence is held up in the child Immanuel and the child Wonderful; elsewhere the rulers of Judah are denounced as confiding in a refuge of lies, a covenant with death, which will be swept away by the overflowing scourge that is to pass through; the Divine vision has become a closed book, which the ignorant will not read because he is not learned, and the learned will not read because it is closed; the national iniquity is a breach ready to fall swelling out in a high wall, whose breaking cometh at an instant. Judgment is to descend also upon the foes of the chosen people: these advance like rushing waters, they are chased away like dust whirled before the storm. Babylon, for all its glory, will become like Sodom and Gomorrah, a desert where not even the Arab wanderer will harbour, but doleful creatures will inhabit there and satyrs dance on its ruins: the morning star falls, and the underworld moves to meet him, peering curiously at the power that once made the earth to tremble. Or all things are included in one general judgment, when the heavens will be rolled up like a scroll, and the host of the heavens fall like fading fig leaves, rivers of earth will become pitch and its dust brimstone: the smoke will go up for ever.

From such universal judgment there will be gleanings — the shaking of an olive tree, two or three berries in the top of the uppermost bough, four or five in the outmost branches of a fruitful tree. For such a remnant there will be a golden age: when the scarlet sins will have become white as snow, when the harlot city will be the city of righteousness, purged with the blast of judgment; when the mountain of the Lord's house will be established at the head of the mountains, and many peoples will be flocking there, as to a judge whose reign of peace will beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks. Sometimes the happy future appears gradual in its coming: amidst the bread of adversity and water of affliction there is yet the blessing of visible teachers and voices guiding at every turn of the way; the picture enlarges with pastoral imagery of streams of water on the high hills, cattle feeding in broad pastures, the increase of the ground fat and plenteous; again the light of the moon becomes as the light of the sun, and the light of the sun increases sevenfold; songs of victory abound as in the night when a holy feast is kept, while every stroke of the appointed staff laid on Assyria is with tabrets and harps and rejoicing. Or, on the other hand, the veil of judgment darkness that wraps the nations is suddenly rent for the Saved on the holy mountain, and there break out songs of death swallowed up for ever and tears wiped away from all faces. On such a mountain of holiness the Shoot out of the stem of Jesse will judge with equity in a reign of eternal peace, the venom passing from the snake, the wolf, fatling and lion's whelp playing together with a little child to lead them, while songs of deliverance rise daily around the wells of salvation. The happy remnant will see the King in his beauty, their eyes will behold a far-stretching land, a place of broad rivers and streams, where no war galley can pass along: Jehovah will be judge, law-giver, king, saviour.

Quite apart from any question of theology, it may be said that no more precious legacy of thought has come down to us from antiquity than this Hebrew conception of a golden age to come. It is difficult to overestimate the bracing moral influence of an ideal future. The classic thought of Greece and Rome took an opposite course: their age of gold was in the remote past, the progress of time was a decline, and the riches of philosophy claimed to be no more than a precarious salvage. The result was the moral paralysis of fatalism, or at best individualism. The imaginative pictures of biblical prophecy inspire spiritual energy by bringing a future to work for, and, on the other hand, the weakness of a luxurious optimism is avoided in the writings of an author who, while he puts forth all his powers to exalt the future, insists always that the only way of entrance to this future is the forcible purging out of evil.

The Rhapsody of Zion Redeemed

When we turn from the six books to the Rhapsody of Zion Redeemed, we find the same general conception, which indeed is the thought of all prophecy, but it is now expanded, and placed in a new setting, associated with new historic surroundings. It may be safely asserted that nowhere else in the literature of the world have so many colossally great ideas been brought together within the limits of a single work.

The first of these great ideas is the prophetic significance put upon the conquering career of Cyrus and his deliverance of Israel from Babylon. The force of this part of the prophecy has been much obscured by the widespread tendency to dwarf 'prophecy' into 'prediction,' and it has been argued as if all the tremendous machinery of the first Vision, with its scene of all the nations of the earth summoned before the bar of God, were put in motion for no further purpose than to exhibit Jehovah as capable of predicting a future which he was capable of making. In actual fact, the words of the Vision associate 'foreseeing things to come' with 'declaring the former things': what the idols are challenged by Jehovah to do is to put upon the course of events such significance as the significance these events are found to bear when they are viewed in the light of Jehovah's purpose. This counsel of Jehovah is elaborately brought out: how he had chosen his people from among the nations; how, unfaithful to their calling, they became blind and deaf, and, to magnify the law, they were permitted to be hidden in the prison houses of exile; how their captors abused their office, and laid burdens on God's people, as if these were but their natural captives; how therefore Cyrus is raised up as an instrument of righteousness to strike the nations down and set Israel free; how Israel comes forth from his prison houses 'a blind people that hath eyes, a deaf people that hath ears.' It had been too light a mission for Israel to raise up his own fallen people, he is to bring forth judgment also to the Gentiles; the dispersion of Israel has been the means of leavening the nations, and opening to them a way of salvation by which all nations of the earth may be blessed. It is as if the ages had been slowly and blindly dragging into place the different elements of some magnetic circle: the final event of Cyrus's career has completed the circle, and Jehovah's purpose from the beginning has been flashed forth to the world. If we go no further than this, it appears that in this rhapsody men's thoughts are for the first time lifted to a philosophy of world history.

Closely associated with this is another of the great ideas of the rhapsody — that of spiritual conquest. The authority that proclaims Israel as Jehovah's Servant to bring judgment to the Gentiles, proclaims also that this work is to be done without violence: he is not to strive nor cry; the bruised reed he is not to break, nor quench the smoking flax. The image describing his mission is the gentle agency of 'light', with its irresistible illumination: he shall not burn dimly until his light has reached the farthest ends of the earth. This is among the loftiest moral conceptions of all human thought. How new an idea it was is measured by the length of time it has taken even the leaders of thought to grasp it. In actual history, the men of the Return were distinguished by a spirit of violent exclusiveness, that sought to draw tighter the bonds of hereditary privilege; their literary production, The Chronicles, delights to dwell upon a religious reform like that of Asa, with its covenant 'that whosoever would not seek the LORD the God of Israel, should be put to death, whether small or great, whether man or woman.' Fifteen centuries of Christianity exhibited Jews persecuting Christians and Christians persecuting Jews; Catholics Protestants, and Protestants Quakers; before the idea began slowly to make its way that force cannot conquer spirit. This ideal of purely spiritual dominion is found, adorned with all the beauty of poetic setting, in the Hebrew rhapsody.

It should be noted again that in this work of Zion Redeemed, the fundamental conception of God is put upon that basis on which discussions of theism must ultimately rest. The rhapsody of course is filled with scorn of idolatry. The idol worshipper must first plant his tree and wait for the rains of heaven to nourish it; meanwhile he sweats over the forging of his axe; when at last he can cut down his tree, the more important functions of firewood and cooking must still have precedence: the rubbish that is left is to be converted into a God of worship. But scorn of idols, if it stands alone, is open to an obvious retort: no idol worshipper, it will be said, ever supposes that a bit of wood saves him; the wood is the symbol of a supernatural power. In the Isaiahan rhapsody this scorn of idols is associated with an antithesis of another kind: contempt is poured upon the forming of idol gods to contrast with a God who has formed the people he redeems; the idols are carried in procession — Bel bowing over one beast, Nebo stooping over another — but Jehovah has carried his people from infancy, and even to old age will he carry them. We are thus brought into contact with the fundamental question of theism: Is God something to be 'made,' 'recognised,' 'accepted'; or is he the maker of the very mind that would 'recognise' or 'accept'? A man may not choose his parents; may he choose his God? Is God a supreme induction of human inquiry, or has he been revealed as something beyond human thought? Or, to take the phraseology of a modern epigram, Is man the noblest work of God, or is it that God is the noblest work of man? Thus on one more topic the Hebrew prophet is keeping us among the fundamentals of universal thought.

The rhapsody, once more, is filled with the idea of Redemption: and the familiarity of this word in modern theology must not make us forget that among the moral conceptions of human thought the world has reached nothing higher than this. All force of poetic presentation is put forth to exalt this idea. In the first Vision inexhaustible tenderness is made to play around the new thought that the Maker of Israel has become his Redeemer. The sixth Vision is a picture of the redeeming presence at work in Zion, from the first sight of a vineyard given up to the beasts of the forest, while watchmen sport and dogs slumber, to the song of Zion in her glory as the City of Salvation. Besides this direct treatment there is an indirect mode of exalting the idea of Redemption that is very potent: such imagery and allusion is employed as will exhibit the return across the desert from Babylon, with mystic food and waters of comfort, as the parallel of the original deliverance from Egypt. The words are found in the Book of Jeremiah, but it is the thought of this rhapsody that they express:

> Behold, the days come that it shall no more be said, As the LORD liveth, that brought up the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt; but, As the LORD liveth, that brought up the children of Israel from the land of the north, and from all the countries whither he had driven them.

Judgment, the final vindication of good and destruction of evil — the fundamental thought alike of Hebrew wisdom and Hebrew prophecy — appears in the rhapsody as the point up to which the whole dramatic movement has been working. Jehovah is seen in the vision of the Watchmen as coming from Edom, with crimsoned garments from Bozrah: he has trodden the winepress of judgment on the nations. And the judgment in Zion itself is the finale of the whole rhapsody, displayed with that pendulum swing of alternating thought which is in Hebrew literature the highest mode of emphasis. Vengeance and mercy are poured out upon the one side and the other, amid a background of confused terror and glad surprise. The final note is a holy mountain with its sacred feasts for the saved of all nations: darkened only by the occasional glimpse of transgression consuming outside under an undying worm and a fire that is not quenched.

There is yet one more idea to be reckoned among the prominent thoughts of the Rhapsody of Zion Redeemed. In the literary sense it is the leading idea of the whole, yet the literary interpreter finds it difficult to handle, so closely has the idea in question become entangled with theological discussions. It is remarkable that Christian and Jewish theology, so different from one another, yet make their appeal to the same prophetic writings. The literary interpretation of such prophecy is something distinct from both. Theology will base its conclusions on more than one piece of literature, and can bring one part of sacred Scripture to fix the limits of interpretation to another: in literary analysis each individual work must be interpreted for itself. Theology again has its own canons of exegesis, which extend to secondary, symbolic meanings: literary interpretation, quite as much as grammatical analysis, is confined to the natural primary sense. Hence it is what may be expected, that the literary analysis of Scriptural works should be a common ground upon which opposing theologies may meet. Approaching then the Isaiahan rhapsody in a purely literary spirit we may ask, What is the significance to be attached to the 'Servant of Jehovah,' who occupies in it so prominent a place? In the first of the seven Visions the nation of Israel is unquestionably the Servant of Jehovah. The use in a familiar passage of St. Matthew of words from this Vision in application to Christ is an example of secondary interpretation; it must not blind us to the fact that the Servant who is delivered from prison houses, and is to bring light to the Gentiles, is in explicit terms the nation of Israel. In the second Vision the Servant of Jehovah is again explicitly identified with Israel, and in set terms he awakes to the mission which, in the previous part of the rhapsody, had been imposed on him. Yet even here it would seem that there is some idealising of the nation, for we see Israel rousing Israel; and at the close of the second Vision there has been associated with the Servant of Jehovah just so much of personality as is implied in the idea of a martyr who gives his back to the smiters, and his cheeks to them that pluck off the hair. In the third Vision the Servant of Jehovah does not appear; in the fourth he is announced by Jehovah as highly exalted, to the astonishment of the nations which had misread his humiliation. As the chorus of astonishment follows, we are able to see how the Servant of Jehovah has grown into a mystic personality, with which are associated in the clearest of language the idea of vicarious sufferings, and a soul made an offering for sin. From this point the 'Servant of Jehovah' no longer appears. But when, in the sixth Vision, there appears a presence striving for the redemption of Zion, the question must inevitably arise: Is the hero of this sixth Vision the same as the hero of those that went before? Has the original conception of the nation of Israel been still further idealised into a new conception, or have we here a distinct personality? The more I have studied this rhapsody the more I have become convinced that we have in this case a real literary obscurity. Theology may on independent grounds argue for or against the identification; but, so far as regards the simple analysis of the literature, the question must be left unsolved, and the personality of the sixth Vision described simply by the name, 'The Redeemer.'

I have thus briefly reviewed the main thought in the biblical Book of Isaiah, and the literary forms by which that thought is brought home to the imagination and heart. Even in literary form the world has produced nothing greater than Isaiah; and the very difficulty of determining its literary form is so much evidence how cramped and imperfect literary criticism has been made by the confinement of its outlook to the single type of literature which has come to monopolise the name 'classical.' But when we proceed to the matter and thought of Isaiah — the literary matter, quite apart from the theology founded on it — how can we explain the neglect of such a masterpiece in our plans of liberal education? It is the boast of England and America that its higher education is religious in its spirit: why is it then that our youth are taught to associate exquisiteness of expression, force of presentation, brilliance of imaginative picturing, only with literatures in which the prevailing matter and thought is on a low moral plane? Such a paradox is part of the paganism which came in with the Renaissance, and which our higher education is still too conservative to shake off. The friends of literary education who rebel against the thought of so one-sided a culture have a definite issue to contend for: that at least Isaiah and Job should take their place beside Plato and Homer in the curricula of our colleges and schools.

Jeremiah

The Book of Jeremiah needs little in the way of introduction. Its most important interest is also that which lies most upon the surface, — the personality of the prophet himself. There is no other of the sacred authors who has taken us with such intimacy into his life, both public and private. We know not only the discourses of Jeremiah, but also the details of their reception; we hear the prophet's bursts of despondency, his secret communings with God; he is not only influenced by the history of his time, but also helps to make it. We must of course not assume that the successive portions of the book stand exactly in the order of their composition: there are places — for example, Book VI — where obviously chronology is subordinated to similarity of subject-matter. Such cases, however, cause no real difficulty; and, broadly viewed, the Book of Jeremiah is a prophetic autobiography.

Here, however, an important distinction must be taken. It is customary to think of the prophets of Israel as the preachers of their times, — preachers and statesmen, since they ministered among a people with whom the modern distinction of sacred and secular had no legitimate place. This was no doubt their most general function. But some of them, notably Isaiah and Jeremiah, added to this another function: they were poets. By this I do not merely mean that in their discourses these prophets allowed themselves a wider scope for poetic modes of expression than has been customary with other orators. What I desire to emphasise is that portions of the prophetic works stand altogether apart from the literature of address; they consist of ideal imaginings, musical singing, all that the student understands as creative poetry.

Very few of the Doom Prophecies contain any suggestion of being addressed to the peoples they denounce; the 'Rhapsodies' of Isaiah are spiritual dramas. The subject-matter of such prophecies may very likely have entered again and again into oral discourse, but in their present form they are independent of it. It is hardly necessary to remark that such portions of the prophetic writings are not less sacred than the rest: the claim of Divine inspiration covers them, and these as all other kinds of prophecy rest on the one basis, 'Thus saith the Lord.' The distinction is one of literary form. But to the literary reader there is a wide difference between the discourse that is addressed to an audience, and the pure poetry that offers itself as food for devout meditation and imagination. Milton "justified the ways of God to men," as he understood them, in the idealised scenes of the Paradise Lost; and so may the prophetic poet embody thoughts with which he feels inspired in forms that appeal to the imagination as well as to the reason.

Of poetry, in this sense, Jeremiah, besides the Doom Songs, has given us only two considerable examples.* The shorter of these is the 'Rhapsody of the Drought': a poem of wonderful tenderness, which, starting from a vivid picture of drought, presents Repentant Israel pleading with a God who turns away, and will answer only through the prophet, until at last he is softened, and recognises a purged remnant who "take forth the precious from the vile." The other is the lengthy composition which follows immediately after the call of the prophet, and which I have entitled 'The Prophet's Manifesto' as embodying the full message of his ministry. In form it is an elaborate rhapsody. The first of its seven divisions is made up of pleadings with Judah: great wealth of imagery is used to express the Divine remonstrance and pity. In the second section the example of (northern) Israel is held up, already cast off for her sins; the example becomes the more pointed when at the close Israel suddenly appears repentant, and is forgiven. The third section returns to Judah: and the successive sections dramatically present, along with Divine pleading and panic-stricken woe, a constantly advancing judgment: at first it is only in rumours of coming foes, striking Judah with a terror that is but half understood; then full destruction appears, but only in vision; then, with a reminiscence of Abraham interceding for Sodom, God arrests the destruction while the prophet searches for one just man on whose account pardon might be given; now is heard the command to the foe to advance, but not to make a full end, while fresh pleadings are poured forth in vain; finally the advance of the foe is traced in all its stages — the setting out at noon, the approach under the shadows of night — while the last anguish is seen of a people surrounded by swords in the fields and the ways, and terror on every side. It is noteworthy that only to these two compositions has Jeremiah appended the epilogue which appears at the conclusion of his call: as if to bind together these poetic compositions with the productions of his regular ministry.

To Doom Prophecies a whole book is devoted: and Jeremiah's Doom of Babylon is by far the most extended and elaborate example of this type of composition in the Bible. It has the structure so familiar to us in the poems of Isaiah: the Divine word of denunciation and threatening interrupted by outbursts of lyric song realising and celebrating. In the present case this structure is crossed by another — a sevenfold division, of which the central and climax section is itself sevenfold in form, elaborating the thought of Babylon's doom under seven images: a sword is upon her, turning boasters into dotards; a drought making her waters a desert; a destroying wind fans her empty; the foes settle as a plague of cankerworms upon her land; Babylon has been the Lord's battle-axe, now to be broken in pieces; the destroying mountain shall be rolled down and become an extinct volcano; the threshing-floor has found the harvest time when it will be trodden. The interrupting lyrics are in one case an exaltation of Jehovah over the idols, in another a wailing dialogue of afflicted Zion and Jerusalem; but for the most part they are an unwearied reiteration of the one glad theme — Babylon fallen; the swarming foes, the pitiless shouts, the sudden surprise, the total ruin:

> Shout against her round about — she hath submitted herself;
> Her bulwarks are fallen — her walls are thrown down;
> For it is the vengeance of the LORD, — take vengeance upon her;
> As she hath done — do unto her.

Jeremiah's Doom of Babylon may be classed with Isaiah's poem on the same topic, and Deborah's Song, as the foremost representatives of realistic lyrics in sacred literature.

The greater part, however, of the Book of Jeremiah is a reflection of the life and ministry of the prophet. The epilogue of which I have spoken — three times repeated in substance — presents Jeremiah under the figure of a solitary besieged city amid his people. The image is expressive, for Jeremiah's lot was to fling himself directly against the ardent patriotism of his generation, in behalf of the righteousness that is above all consideration of country. National corruption had gone too deep for Judah to stand alone; all that seemed left to her was a choice of lords, and two parties had formed themselves, leaning to Babylon or to Egypt. There could be no doubt which side would be taken by the prophetic order. Egypt was the symbol of the sloth and luxury which undermines the moral fibre; Babylon suggested energy, and conquest by the Chaldeans would destroy only that secular government against which it was the mission of prophecy to testify in the name of the theocracy. King Josiah had been on the side of the prophets: his eldest son, after the fashion of heirs apparent, had supported the opposition. When Josiah lost his life in assisting Babylon against Egypt, the Babylonian party was still strong enough to pass over the eldest son, and seat on the throne the unfortunate Jehoahaz — the Shallum of Jeremiah's dirge (xxii.10). His lot was to be carried away into lifelong captivity in Egypt; Jehoiakim regained his birthright, and with him a tide of Egyptian luxury set in (xxii.13). It is no wonder then that Jeremiah celebrates in a spirited war ballad (xlvi.2) the Battle of Carchemish, which settled forever the supremacy of Babylon over Egypt. But before and after this Jeremiah's prophetic attitude was to oppose all hopes of national independence, and to proclaim that Judah's highest hopes must be humiliation under the power of Babylon.

The call to the prophetic ministry came to Jeremiah early in life, and it is expressly dated as five years before the discovery of the book of the law and the Reformation of Josiah, which constituted the last flicker of spiritual life in the history of Judah. If we may argue from the order of compositions, the years following this call are represented by the elaborate poetic work (ii–vi) which I have called the Prophet's Manifesto. Immediately following this we have the first distinct appearance of Jeremiah in public: his commission is to stand in the Temple precincts, and proclaim how these buildings of Jehovah's Temple in which men trust may nevertheless be overthrown, like Shiloh, for the nation's sins. More of this bold denunciation occupies Book II, along with lamentation for Judah, and rhapsodic picturing of Zion heard from a far land, wailing that the harvest is past, the summer is ended, and she is not saved. The third book starts with the high hopes generated by the Reformation of Josiah: the prophet receives a commission to enter upon a missionary journey, preaching 'the Covenant' throughout the cities of Judah, and accepts the task with a hearty 'Amen.' The record of this commission is immediately followed by a record of utter failure; the prophet encounters persecution in his own native city of Anathoth, and in personal experience is confronted with the bitter problem of the prosperity of the wicked. Throughout this and the following book despair of his country is seen to have taken complete possession of Jeremiah; though a later book is devoted to prophecies of future restoration, yet it has become abundantly evident at this point that all hopes for Judah lie on the other side of ruin. The Lord is to be known no longer as the God who brought Israel out of Egypt, but as the God who has brought them from the land of the North, and from all the countries whither he had driven them (xvi.14).

The turning-point in the public career of Jeremiah is made by a single discourse and a single symbol. He receives an inspiration from the work of the potter:

> And when the vessel that he made of the clay was marred in the hand of the potter, he made it again another vessel, as seemed good to the potter to make it. Then the word of the LORD came to me, saying, O house of Israel, cannot I do with you as this potter? saith the LORD.

The image of 'clay in the hand of the potter' has passed into our ordinary speech. But it is easy to imagine how this idea, on its first presentation, would penetrate to the very quick of the national conscience. The people are sitting careless to righteousness in sublime consciousness of Jehovah's selection of the chosen nation: they are confronted with the idea that the Divine potter may remould his clay into a vessel of dishonour. The sensation thus produced can be traced in the succession of prophecies. Jeremiah appears at once as the head of a party: 'elders of the people' and 'elders of the priests' support him in a public demonstration (xix.1). The solemn procession passes out through 'the Gate of Potsherds' into the Topheth valley; Jeremiah holding a potter's bottle in his hands proclaims the hopeless doom of the country, and seals the word by breaking the bottle on the spot henceforth to be known as 'The valley of Slaughter.' Then the procession returns, or at least Jeremiah returns, to the court of the Temple to repeat his denunciation there: the chief officer of the Temple seizes him and places him in the stocks. War has been declared, and from this point the life of Jeremiah is part of the history of Jerusalem; he is the centre and rallying-point of all who are on the side of Jehovah. A royal deputation begs of him in vain a comforting prophecy. Priests and false prophets indict him of a capital offence, princes and people interpose to secure his acquittal; again princes procure his imprisonment, and a weak king secretly works for his release. From his place of custody he formally negotiates (not without secret misgivings) a purchase of land in the midst of the Babylonian conquest as token of the hopes for the future; it is, as Mr. Streane justly remarks, like the Roman buying the land on which Hannibal was encamped. The Babylonian commander treats him with deference, offering him the choice of remaining in his own land or removing to Babylon; the officers of the besieged arrest him as a deserter; finally, a body of refugees carries him off by main force into Egypt.

Jeremiah may well have been 'the weeping prophet' of Israel.

> Woe is me, my mother, that thou hast borne me a man of strife and a man of contention to the whole earth! I have not lent on usury, neither have men lent to me on usury; yet every one of them doth curse me.

He stands between this outer life of universal unpopularity and an inner life of irresistible inspiration.

> And if I say, I will not make mention of him, nor speak any more in his name, then there is in mine heart as it were a burning fire shut up in my bones, and I am weary with forbearing, and I cannot contain.

Compelled in the exercise of his ministry to quench the hopes of patriotic pride, the fulfilment of his prophecies makes him an exile from a ruined country; fighting all his life against Egypt, he is forced to end his days a captive in that idolatrous land. Attempting even in the midst of ruin to prosecute his ministry among his fellow-exiles, he finds that they attribute all their woes to the doctrines he has preached: "Since we left off to burn incense to the queen of heaven . . . we have wanted all things." Like a smouldering taper, his life goes out in obscurity and oblivion.

If the judgment of posterity could atone for contemporary neglect, Jeremiah might well have wherein to glory. Modern thought has recognised him as the central point in the religious history of his people, where the overthrow of a national religion becomes the starting point for the religion of the individual life and the 'new covenant' written on the heart. Yet this seems a reflection unworthy of the prophet who has left us as the most sublime of his many sublime sayings this:

> Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let the mighty man glory in his might, let not the rich man glory in his riches: but let him that glorieth glory in this, that he understandeth, and knoweth me, that I am the LORD which exercise lovingkindness, judgement, and righteousness, in the earth.

Ezekiel

Ezekiel, in all respects one of the Greater Prophets, has a very special place in the history of literary form. What in his predecessors has been occasional and subordinate becomes in his prophecy a dominant form of utterance. And again, the reflection in written record of the prophetic life and ministry takes shape in Ezekiel as an elaborately arranged literary work.

The form of discourse so characteristic of Ezekiel may be termed Emblem Prophecy. Its simplest illustration is when, for example, the prophet appears before his audience holding in his hands two sticks, with the name of Judah written upon the one and Israel upon the other. In the eyes of the people he solemnly joins these sticks together, and from this emblematic text proceeds to enlarge upon the healing of the national schism, and the glory of a united people under a Davidic rule. Of course, such objective emblems have been seen in other prophets: in Isaiah, walking barefoot as a captive; in Jeremiah, holding up his stained girdle; in Samuel, rending his mantle before Saul. The use of dumb show as a starting-point for other modes of presentation has characterised literatures widely separated from one another. In the early tragedy of the Renaissance the spirit of a scene was regularly conveyed in emblematic action to the eye before the dialogue commenced; and this has been made familiar to the most general reader by the example of it preserved in Hamlet, where the gesture of pouring poison into the sleeping king's ear startles the conscience of the guilty murderer in the audience before a word of the play has been spoken. In written literature dumb show becomes hieroglyph; and, in connection with such names as Alciati in Italy, Jacob Catz in Holland, Quarles in England, Emblem Poetry — hieroglyphic texts with discourses in verse — formed for more than a century the chief religious literature of Europe, and, though now forgotten, furnishes thousands of volumes to the libraries of curious collectors.

In studying Emblem Prophecy it is very important to recognise that the emblem is no more than the text, from which a regular discourse takes its departure. This principle will guard the student against opposite errors of interpretation. On the one hand, some writers have not only read the symbolic action of biblical prophecy with extreme literalness, but have treated it as if it constituted the prophecy itself. It is true that there was in Israel a rude prophecy which consisted wholly in action, and which is still to be seen in the fakirs and dervishes of Semitic peoples, with whom a reiterated howl or a contorted body is the whole of their religious act. But the pro phets of biblical literature use such gesture language only as a prologue to verbal utterance. On the other hand, some commentators show a tendency to explain away the dumb show of prophecy, until it is left as little more than a literary image. They are actuated by a feeling that much of what is so described seems puerile and beneath the dignity of prophecy. But such a feeling is one to be resisted, more especially if the reader be of the English-speaking peoples: it is due largely to the notorious deficiency in gesture which makes our speech so dull and clumsy to our European neighbours. Any one who has heard a Gavazzi preach, or seen a Salvini act, will know how much of dignity, as well as force, accompanies the vivid action that half tells the tale before words come to complete it. Thus to herald speech with dumb show is only an extension of the well-known principle of oratory, that the significant gesture should, by however slight an interval, precede the words, the mind being thus unconsciously inflamed by force of curiosity into a receptive attitude that is of itself a mode of emphasis.

It will be well to take particular examples. The emblematic action in the Book of Ezekiel reaches its greatest minuteness in the Mimic Siege of Jerusalem (iv.1).

> Thou also, son of man, take thee a tile, and lay it before thee, and pourtray upon it a city, even Jerusalem: and lay siege against it, and build forts against it, and cast up a mount against it: set camps also against it, and plant battering rams against it round about. And take thou unto thee an iron pan, and set it for a wall of iron between thee and the city: and set thy face toward it, and it shall be besieged, and thou shalt lay siege against it. This shall be a sign to the house of Israel.
> Moreover, lie thou upon thy left side, and lay the iniquity of the house of Israel upon it: according to the number of the days that thou shalt lie upon it, thou shalt bear their iniquity. For I have appointed the years of their iniquity to be unto thee a number of days, even three hundred and ninety days: so shalt thou bear the iniquity of the house of Israel. And again, when thou hast accomplished these, thou shalt lie on thy right side, and shalt bear the iniquity of the house of Judah; forty days, each day for a year, have I appointed it unto thee. And thou shalt set thy face toward the siege of Jerusalem, with thine arm uncovered; and thou shalt prophesy against it. . . . Take thou also unto thee wheat, and barley, and beans, and lentils, and millet, and spelt, and put them in one vessel, and make thee bread thereof; . . . and thy meat which thou shalt eat shall be by weight, twenty shekels a day: from time to time shalt thou eat it. . . . And thou, son of man, take thee a sharp sword, as a barber's razor shalt thou take it unto thee, and shalt cause it to pass upon thine head, and upon thy beard: then take thee balances to weigh, and divide the hair. A third part shalt thou burn in the fire in the midst of the city, when the days of the siege are fulfilled; and thou shalt take a third part, and smite with the sword round about it; and a third part thou shalt scatter to the wind, and I will draw out a sword after them. And thou shalt take thereof a few in number, and bind them in thy skirts.

This passage has been a stumbling-block to interpreters. So sympathetic a writer as Stanley has been misled into saying that Ezekiel "would lie stretched out motionless, for more than a year, like one crushed to the ground under the burden of his people's sins." On the other hand, Dr. Davidson in his valuable commentary would persuade us that such action as this was intended merely to be described in narrative. But this attenuation of the natural meaning is surely impossible in view of the simple explicitness of the language quoted above. What, on such a theory, is to be made of a passage like this?

> And, behold, I lay bands upon thee, and thou shalt not turn thee from one side to another, till thou hast accomplished the days of thy siege.

Take again the following: —

> And thou shalt eat it as barley cakes, and thou shalt bake it in their sight with dung that cometh out of man. . . . (Then said I, Ah Lord GOD! behold, my soul hath not been polluted: for from my youth up even till now have I not eaten of that which dieth of itself, or is torn of beasts; neither came there abominable flesh into my mouth. Then he said unto me, See, I have given thee cow's dung for man's dung, and thou shalt prepare thy bread thereon.)

Such scruple on the part of the prophet would indeed be puerile if it related to what was no more than a narrated symbol. These opposite difficulties are avoided when the emblematic action is understood literally, but as no more than the text for a spoken discourse. It is clear from the book as a whole that deputations of the people were in the habit of appearing before the prophet to hear a word from the Lord; such deputations were frequent, and, indeed, one passage * strongly suggests, if it does not demonstrate, that they were of daily occurrence. The natural interpretation of the prophecy cited is that, during the period it indicates of more than a year, the daily discourse had for its text some portion of the action so elaborately prescribed. Now the prophet would strike the attitude of the besieger of Jerusalem; now his dumb show would suggest the details of famine, or the choice of fatal evils that awaited those who miserably survived to the end of the siege. Such symbolic gesture — prolonged perhaps for no more than a few moments — would introduce a verbal discourse of the same tenor: and the closing paragraphs (v. 5) of the written prophecy are a summary of the matter reiterated in these many discourses. On this view the very minuteness of the prescribed directions assists towards the variety of symbol texts the prophet had to choose from. And the prolongation of this one theme through these multiplied presentations is amply justified, both by the position of the fall of Jerusalem as the very foundation of Ezekiel's prophetic mission, and by the obstinate incredulity of the infatuated exiles to which his words so often bear witness.

In this discourse of the Siege of Jerusalem the emblematic starting-point has been sustained dumb show. Similar dumb show, extended to a greater or lesser degree, seems to introduce other discourses. The prophet eats 'bread of trembling' when he is about to touch upon the panic of the besieged; more elaborately on another occasion, when the same topic is to be taken up, he is seen bringing out household stuff for removing, and then, as if in a sudden accession of panic, moving with his face covered to suggest a sudden escape by night. Sometimes the text is a gesture again and again reiterated: the prophet is to smite with his hands, stamp with his foot, as he expresses his horror at Judah's idolatry and doom. The speaker's attitude may serve the same purpose: he is to 'set his face' toward the south, or 'drop his word toward' the sanctuaries. When we recollect how much in the story of Daniel is made of Daniel's turning his face as he prays toward Jerusalem, under circumstances in which a more private prayer might have left him undisturbed, it is easy to understand how even so slight an action as this might be powerful in the hands of an Ezekiel. Again, a phrase or cry can make an emblem text. An early discourse (vii. 1) is made distinctive by the reiteration throughout its course of such words as 'It cometh!' 'The end is come!' And two other discourses (xix. 1 and 10) find an objective accessory in the familiar wailing rhythm which binds together their clauses. Immediately before the great crisis the prophet's whole demeanour is made emblematic; though the desire of his eyes is taken away at a stroke, he is to mourn only in silence, for so the people, when the city of their desire is fallen, will have no heart even to weep, but "ye shall pine away in your iniquities, and moan one toward another."

* Compare xxiv. 18, and note on page 1583.

An emblem in its fullest form is at once objective and symbolic. Some of Ezekiel's discourses find texts in things which are objective without being symbolic. On two occasions he seizes upon the attitude of the audience before him, as they sit waiting for an inspired word from God, and makes this a standpoint from which to denounce the apostasy from the divine law which deprives of all claim so to inquire of the Lord. Elsewhere he uses as texts the thoughts of his audience, and the proverbs that are habitually upon their lips. A nearer approach is made to the full emblem when a discourse is founded upon a parable: a parable is simply an emblem presented in narrative instead of in visible form. In one case the Vine — the national emblem of Israel — is mentioned for the unexpected purpose of suggesting that this stands among the other trees of the forest as the one wood which is fit for no use. On other occasions elaborate parables are sustained through the whole of a lengthy discourse. Such is the Parable of the Foundling, rescued in her helplessness, nurtured and made a spouse, yet turning to adultery. This thought, and the variation of it which presents Samaria and Jerusalem under the names of Oholah and Oholibah, are drawn out by Ezekiel with the most vivid minuteness; the yearning tenderness of the prophet, and his habit of calling coarse things by coarse names, make these discourses amongst the most powerful and characteristic of the prophet's writings. The dark parable or riddle must not be omitted (xvii. 1), in which cedar branches and eagles and rivers are strangely mingled to suggest political powers and movements. And in this connection may be mentioned a discourse of Ezekiel which stands out by itself — the Invasion of Gog. This is not to be interpreted as a specific prediction of an historical event, nor, on the other hand, as merely a parable; but under the typical names of Gog, Meshech, Tubal, — suggestive of the dimly known confines of the earth, — are generalised hostile forces however distant, which, after the 'many days' of a future however prolonged, may be massed in opposition to a purified people, only to fall in the holy soil by a destruction from on high, and to trouble Israel with no more than a notable burying.

Visions, as they appear in Ezekiel, are a variety of Emblem Prophecy. These emblems are visibly displayed to the eye of the prophet in his trance, but what is seen is presented as a symbol, not a reality. This is obviously the case with the Vision of Dry Bones, which, as Ezekiel prophesies, are inspired from the four winds, and become an exceeding great army. But similarly in the Vision of the polluted Jerusalem, the abominations viewed by the prophet are so many types of sins actually prevailing in the guilty city. And in the companion prophecy Ezekiel on the mountain of vision, like Moses upon another mount, has revealed to him the pattern and ideal of a purified temple and a holy land. In the supreme vision of all, which constitutes the call of the prophet, and underlies the final revelation of his ministry, what is seen is conveyed by the guarded expression 'the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the LORD.'

At one part of the ministry of Ezekiel, when the fall of Jerusalem is near and excitement runs high, symbolism seems occasionally to pervade the whole of a discourse, and there is a mingling and interchange of oratory and graphic action which is without parallel in other literature. An example is the section which I have entitled The Sword of the Lord (xxi); here attitude, gesture, visible emblem, sustained dumb show, are all mingled together and combined with song. At the opening, the prophet sets his face toward Jerusalem, and drops his word toward the sanctuaries. But as the address progresses, he suddenly draws forth a sword: this is the sword of the Lord which is to go forth out of its sheath against all flesh from the south to the north, and it will not return any more. Suddenly, the dramatic speaker has identified himself with the victims of this divine sword.

> Sigh therefore, thou son of man; with the breaking of thy loins and with bitterness shalt thou sigh before their eyes. And it shall be, when they say unto thee, Wherefore sighest thou? that thou shalt say, Because of the tidings, for it cometh: and every heart shall melt, and all hands shall be feeble, and every spirit shall faint, and all knees shall be weak as water.

Now the theme of the sword is resumed, and with it mingles what is evidently some military strain or folk-lore song, of which the augmenting lines suggest the gathering spirit of combat.

A sword,
A sword,
It is sharpened,
And also furbished:
It is sharpened that it may make a slaughter;
It is furbished that it may be as lightning!

For a single moment the other side is presented — a people careless and secure: "the Rod of my son, it contemneth every tree." But the impending destruction continues to gather force: —

And it is given to be furbished
That it may be handled:
The sword, it is sharpened, yea it is furbished,
To give it into the hand of the slayer.

There is a sudden change, and cries and howls proclaim how the sword has fallen upon the people, and the Rod that contemneth is no more. The emblematic movement seems to become more and more rapid: —

And let the sword be doubled the third time;
The sword of the deadly wounded:
It is the sword of the great one that is deadly wounded
Which compasseth them about.

I have set the point of the sword against all their gates,
That their heart may melt,
And their stumblings be multiplied:
Ah! it is made as lightning!

It is pointed for slaughter —
Gather thee together, go to the right;
Set thyself in array, go to the left — Whithersoever thy face is set.

A total change ensues, and the sword is now the sword of Babylon: its point traces a rough map on the floor, a meeting-point of roads, where the advancing conqueror stays to cast lots; dumb show just suggests the shaking of the arrows, the looking into the liver, and then the advance is decided for the way to Jerusalem. The denunciation that follows of the "deadly wounded wicked one, the prince of Israel," soon finds a climax in the uncrowning of the king, and the cessation of kingship "until he come whose right it is." There is yet another change, and the song of the sword continues: —

'A sword, a sword is drawn,
'For the slaughter it is furbished:
'To cause it to devour,
'That it may be as lightning': —

this time it is the sword of Israel's neighbour foes, the children of Ammon, and their boastful hope is to lay it on the necks of their hereditary enemy in his time of humiliation. But the speaker suddenly plunges the sword into its sheath: so is symbolically introduced the fate of Ammon to return to the land of his birth and be judged there.

Another example of complex and startling symbolism is the discourse of Ezekiel which centres around the idea of a caldron (xxiv. 3). This again has been a difficulty to commentators in regard to the interpretation of the emblematic action. Can it be supposed, objectors have asked, that the prophet in the performance of his sacred functions would go through operations of actual cooking, and throw pieces of meat about on the ground? But those who raise such an objection have failed to note that in this discourse the usual introductory formula has been varied: the passage reads, not "Take a caldron," etc., but "Utter a parable . . . and say . . . 'Set on the caldron.'" There is no question here of a visible caldron and actual cooking, but only of a rude folk song, which is suddenly reversed and brought to a spiritual application. For the fundamental idea underlying this utterance of Ezekiel we must go further back, to an expression that appears on the lips of the most abandoned among the inhabitants of Jerusalem, who express their confidence in the impregnable walls of their city under the image of the caldron that interposes between the meat and the fire: —

> These are the men that devise iniquity, and that give wicked counsel in this city: which say, Is not the time near to build houses? this city is the caldron and we be the flesh. (xi. 2–3.)

In elaboration of such an idea the prophet chants — possibly with suggestive action — the song of the cook at his work:

Set on the caldron,
Set it on, and also pour water into it:
Gather the pieces thereof into it,
Even every good piece, the thigh and the shoulder;
Fill it with the choice bones;
Take the choice of the flock,
And pile also the bones under it:
Make it boil well:
Yea, let the bones thereof be seethed in the midst of it.

But suddenly a burst of divine denunciation is interposed, and a suggestion of a very different kind is fastened upon the emblem of the caldron; the blood-stained city is a rusty caldron, which must cast out its meat and be plunged itself into the very hottest of the fire till it is purged.

Woe to the bloody city!
I also will make the pile great:
Heap on the wood, make the fire hot,
Boil well the flesh, and make thick the broth,
And let the bones be burned.
Then set it EMPTY upon the coals thereof,
That it may be hot, and the brass thereof may burn,
And that the filthiness of it may be molten in it,
That the rust of it may be consumed.

Emblem prophecy in its various forms has so regular a place in Ezekiel's discourses that it becomes interesting to examine the few cases in which it is absent. One of the discourses (xiii. 1) that lacks an introductory symbol opens with the epigrammatic phrase: "Prophesy against the prophets of Israel that prophesy."

Another (xiv. 12) has a structure of marked regularity — parallel sentences culminating in a similar sentence of climax. It is more interesting still to note the discourse against the Shepherds of Israel (xxxiv). This has no emblem text, but it maintains unbroken a succession of pastoral imagery: from the first denunciation of the shepherds that feed themselves, through the tender picture of the Divine Shepherd seeking out his flock, and delivering them out of all places whither they have been scattered in the cloudy and dark day, to the consummation of the secure dwelling in the wilderness and the showers of blessing on the holy hill. We seem to catch as a principle in the literary style of Ezekiel, that a discourse which lacks the introductory strength of an emblem text should be compensated by some other literary feature of marked definiteness; and the last example has suggested how of all literary devices sustained imagery seems most fitted to replace visible symbol. To the more important among the Doom Songs of Ezekiel individuality is given by the sustained imagery on which each is founded. The first attack on Tyre develops the picture of the bare rock to which Tyre shall be reduced, a place for the spreading of nets in the midst of the sea. What follows elaborates the thought of the mercantile metropolis as a glorious ship, to which all peoples of the earth — reviewed in long enumeration — have made their contributions; but the Ship of Tyre is brought into great waters, and broken in the heart of the seas. Again, the prince of this fairest of earth's cities is denounced under the figure of the Guardian Cherub of Eden, walking up and down in the midst of the stones of fire, until through unrighteousness he is cast out, and consumed with his own fire before the eyes of the nations. And the climax prophecy, the grand Doom of Egypt, has a sevenfold structure founded on the seven images which are successively elaborated. Egypt is the crocodile of his own rivers, to be drawn out with all the fish of his waters clinging to his scales, and cast into the wilderness. Egypt shall be granted to the Babylonian conqueror as wages for his fruitless campaign against Tyre. A third prophecy against Egypt turns on the familiar prophetic image, the Day of the Lord. A slighter Doom prophecy puts the thought of Pharaoh's arm broken; an elaborate outpouring follows which works out the image of the fallen cedar. Next Egypt appears as the dragon of the seas: and, by the link of the popular fancies about the dragon monster, imagery of eclipses and disastrous darkness is interwoven. Finally, there is a Wail for Egypt, as she goes down into the pit: the great ones of the underworld, each with her graves around her, are imaged in succession speaking their muffled greeting, while at each pause the refrain chimes its monotonous chant: —

All of them slain!
Fallen by the sword!

Such is the most striking of the literary peculiarities of Ezekiel: the use of emblems to introduce discourses, and in a few cases the saturation of oratory with graphic acting; while in the prophecy that is written and not spoken the visible symbol is replaced by the sustained image. If to any reader it seems that such features of prophetic delivery must be too secular for so sacred a function, and that there would be danger lest attention might be called from the message itself by the interest in the delivery of the messenger, the answer is that this is precisely what did happen in actual fact.

> And as for thee, son of man, the children of thy people talk of thee by the walls and in the doors of the houses, and speak one to another, every one to his brother, saying, Come, I pray you, and hear what is the word that cometh forth from the LORD . . . . And, lo, thou art unto them as a very lovely song of one that hath a pleasant voice, and can play well on an instrument for they hear thy words, but they do them not (xxxiii. 30)

Meanwhile, Ezekiel is not so far from us as the strange delivery of his prophecies might incline us to think. The visible emblems of this prophet are a thing of the past, but the tendency he emphasised to seek an external starting-point for discourse has continued. The Emblem Prophecy of Ezekiel is a transitional stage in the development of the modern Text and Sermon.

I have yet to speak of another of the literary characteristics of Ezekiel — the elaborate arrangement of the book. Both in the case of Isaiah and Jeremiah there are suggestions of editorial arrangement, whether on the part of the prophet himself or another editor. But with Ezekiel the matter of oral discourse has been in its written representation worked up into an artistic whole. The distinctness of the emblem text makes the divisions of discourses very marked, and we can say with confidence that the whole of Ezekiel falls into seven books, each (except the central book) divided into seven discourses; further, there is a tendency for the last discourse of each book to be a climax, and some of these final discourses are themselves sevenfold in structure. Such symmetrical arrangement must not be understood as implying anything unnatural or artificial on the part of the prophetic writer: all that is necessary is a tendency to think in numerical divisions, which is a widely diffused literary characteristic. Not to go outside biblical literature, I have pointed out (below, page 1462), how the wise men of Israel tend to divide their wisdom in divisions of five. Again, the final discourse of The Wisdom of Solomon has a sevenfold illustration broken by a sevenfold digression. Throughout prophetic literature the number seven prevails: The Rhapsody of Zion Redeemed not only has a division into seven acts or visions, but further, its opening act is made by an alternation seven times repeated. And the Book of Revelation, which gathers up all Old Testament prophecy in itself, has its seven churches, seven seals, seven angels sounding, seven bowls to be poured out. In the present case the disposition of Ezekiel's writings upon the sevenfold basis, which is here followed, gives the clearest conception of the unity of the whole.

The mass of discourses which makes up the whole ministry of Ezekiel comes to us enveloped in a glory of supernatural vision. To Isaiah and Jeremiah was granted a theophany; but this was in their case only the occasion of their call to the prophetic office and appeared no more. But the divine glory amid which Ezekiel received his call reappeared to him at critical points of his ministry, and mingled with his final vision of the ideal land of promise. Very elaborately, and by successive stages, is the whole glory of Ezekiel's vision made manifest to him as he stands beside the river Chebar. Forces of nature usher it in: the stormy wind, the cloud mass, and against this background a fringing radiance enclosing a centre of solid fire, — yet not solid, for it is soon seen to be a 'fire infolding itself,' for ever changing into a new body of splendour that is still the same. To forces of nature are now added forms of animal life: faces, feet, wings, shapes of men, of oxen, of eagles, yet all realised in a medium of fire, and fire that is alive with motion, living creatures traversed by running torches that flash lightnings as they run up and down. The life of inert matter is added, — mechanism: wheels within wheels, that mystically blend with the life already seen for their rings are high and dreadful, full of eyes round about. The whole is instinct with one will, and moves with a single impulse. The culminative power of the vision continues its stages: over the head of the living creature the gazer is aware of a firmament, its terrible crystal stretched forth over the amber glory below. Above the firmament is heard a voice, there is the likeness of a sapphire throne. So great is the prophet's dread of suggesting form in connection with the manifestation that is coming that he only speaks of 'a likeness as the appearance of a man' above the throne; and even this seems lost in a rainbow radiance of fire that flashes in all directions. Awe afflicts the prophet as the manifestation reaches its culmination, but spirit enters into him and carries him along.

I do not understand the commentators who call Ezekiel's description of his vision 'prosaic.' To me it appears that alike the terms into which he translates the details of the supernatural, and the stages by which the manifestation progresses towards its completion, are such as to affect us with all the power of the highest poetry. The difficulty in this vision is, not any deficiency of poetic power on the part of the describer, but the weight of symbolism with which the vision itself is charged, and which is sufficient to disturb the poetic sense of a reader who is not an Oriental. Hence the value of studying again the same picture as it comes to us transmitted through the imagination of a western poet.

> Forth rush'd with whirlwind sound
> The chariot of paternal Deity,
> Flashing thick flames, wheel within wheel undrawn,
> Itself instinct with spirit, but convoy'd
> By four cherubic shapes, four faces each > Had wondrous, as with stars their bodies all
> And wings were set with eyes, with eyes the wheels
> Of beryl, and careering fires between;
> Over their heads a crystal firmament,
> Whereon a sapphire throne, inlaid with pure
> Amber, and colours of the show'ry arch. . . .
> At once the four spread out their starry wings
> With dreadful shade contiguous, and the orbs
> Of his fierce chariot roll'd, as with the sound
> Of torrent floods, or of a numerous host. . . .
> Nor less on either side tempestuous fell
> His arrows, from the fourfold-visaged four,
> Distinct with eyes, and from the living wheels,
> Distinct alike with multitude of eyes,
> One spirit in them rul'd, and every eye
> Glar'd lightning, and shot forth pernicious fire.

> Paradise Lost, Book VI.

In presence of this awful glory Ezekiel receives his commission as prophet. It is a threefold commission: each part distinct in itself, with the delivery of the successive stages separated by movement in the vision surroundings. The first commission is to testify to the nation of Israel: through the community of exiles Ezekiel is to speak to the wider people, and denounce them as rebels against their God, whose chosen city must be ruined before the glory of the future restoration is possible. When this much has been brought home to his mind the retiring glory sweeps the prophet on his way, and he comes "in bitterness, in the heat of his spirit" to the community of exiles to whom he is to speak his denunciation. But the shock of contact with human life strangely checks the prophetic utterance, and he sits among his fellows 'astonied' for seven days. Then the conflicting impressions are harmonised, and the second element of his prophetic work is made known to him. He is to be the Watchman of the Captivity: amid the coming judgment upon the whole nation the individual souls before him are his care, to speak the warning by which each may be saved. Thus Ezekiel, like Jeremiah, stands at the point where the conception of national religion begins to yield to another conception in which the religion of the individual soul is more prominent. But the call of Ezekiel is not yet complete. Again the hand of the Lord is upon him, and he again beholds the glory upon the plain; and the third of the three words spoken to him is this:

> But thou, son of man, behold, they shall lay bands upon thee, and shall bind thee with them, and thou shalt not go out among them: and I will make thy tongue cleave to the roof of thy mouth, that thou shalt be dumb, > and shalt not be to them a reprover: for they are a rebellious house. But when I speak with thee, I will open thy mouth, and thou shalt say unto them, Thus saith the Lord GOD.

This Opening of the Mouth is the most distinctive mark divinely set upon the ministry of Ezekiel. Other prophets would go amongst the people, would mingle their prophetic words with common life and incident, until prophecy itself had become a thing common and familiar. Ezekiel is to refuse the popular rôle of prophet; he is to shut himself in his house, and the people are to come to him, not he to them. Even when the elders of the people are before him he is still to be dumb, until the word of the Lord suddenly comes to him, and his mouth is opened. It is Ezekiel's distinction to speak the inspired word at the very moment of its inspiration.*

The remainder of the first book opens out, in four discourses, the prophet's message to the nation of Israel. The mimic siege presents the destruction impending over the city and its criminal citizens; the section that follows speaks the doom of the land; another discourse — with its wailing refrain of 'Behold it cometh!' — realises the panic of the inhabitants. Then comes the climax to the first book in the trance that falls upon Ezekiel in the very presence of the inquiring elders. Again the glory of his first vision is about him, and he sees the pollutions of Jerusalem: the image of jealousy in the court of the Temple, the chambers of abominable imagery, women weeping for Tammuz, men with their backs to the temple and their faces toward the east. And he sees also the fire taken from between the whirling wheels to make destruction for the city, a destruction that shall begin at the sanctuary itself.

I have entitled the second book The Sevenfold Token: the message itself has been fully opened, the succeeding discourses address themselves to the susceptibilities and prejudices which accept or reject. Here we encounter the emblems of Stuff for Removing, and Bread of Trembling: the Mimic Siege had used signs which symbolised the various sorts of destruction, but here are given signs which realistically bring home to the imagination the sufferings of individuals. A third prophecy attacks the hopes bred of delay: as the contemporaries of St. Peter would say —

> Where is the promise of his coming? for, from the day that the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation:

so the sceptical among the exiles cry that —

> The days are prolonged,
> And every vision faileth.

The fourth prophecy attacks equally the false hopes that would explain away the prophetic visions as forecasts of a far distant future. The three remaining sections of this book are occupied with undermining delusive grounds of trust: trust in False Prophets, daubing a wall with untempered mortar when the overflowing shower is at hand; trust in Vain Inquiry — the special providences of the Hebrew religion, which shall be denied; trust, finally, in the Vicarious Righteousness of a few who might, as when Abraham interceded for Sodom, be the salvation of the whole people; but in this guilty land 'Noah, Daniel, and Job,' it is declared, shall save only their own righteous souls.

The discourses of the third book make a Sevenfold Parable: one and the same truth is conveyed under seven successive figures. Here we have the Parables of the Vine, of the Foundling (with its sequel based on the proverb, 'Like mother like daughter'), of the Eagles and the Cedar, which have already been mentioned. The fifth discourse has a proverb for text: —

* For this as against the other and more usual interpretation of the passage, see note on page 1583.

> The fathers have eaten sour grapes,
> And the children's teeth are set on edge.

The previous discourses of this book had addressed themselves to the hopes of the people, this parable is addressed to their despair. They are convinced that they are suffering helplessly for the sins of their fathers: Ezekiel is charged with the divine word that "all souls are mine," and with eloquent reiteration he declares that the man who turns from iniquity shall save his soul alive. There follow the wailing parables of the trapped Lion and the broken Vine.

We have reached the fourth, or central book of the seven. This is made up of a single discourse; but it is one well calculated to stand alone, for it comprehends in a single view the whole scope of Ezekiel's prophetic message. The elders of the people have come as usual to inquire of the Lord: in place of a word of response there suddenly falls upon them a word of judgment. The discourse passes in review the long conflict between the relenting justice of God and the obstinate sin of his people, from the first clinging in Egypt to the idolatries of the land down to the final corruption of the people in the very heights of the land of promise. Any one of these revolts might well have made void the covenantal relation of God to his people; but God has "wrought for his name's sake," that the original divine purpose might not be frustrated. At last a point has been reached when God refuses to be inquired of by the guilty people. But for his name's sake he will work still.

> That which cometh into your mind shall not be at all; in that ye say, We will be as the nations, as the families of the countries, to serve wood and stone.

The people called of God shall not be permitted at their will to sink back to the level of the peoples from among which they were chosen: there shall be a fresh exodus from the nations among which they are scattered into a fresh 'wilderness of the peoples'; those who are still rebels shall again fall in the wilderness; but finally in the mountain of the height of Israel shall all the house of Israel, all of them, serve their God, and he will "be sanctified in them in the sight of the nations."

The fifth book contains Seven Last Words before the crisis of the city's fall. The first discourse is a word of destruction and fire against the South, that causes Ezekiel in that incredulous circle to be deemed a speaker of parables. There follows the vivid symbolism of the Sword of the Lord. In the third prophecy the guilty city is brought up for judgment, and the catalogue of her crimes rehearsed. One discourse develops the Parable of Oholah and Oholibah, another carries it to a climax of judgment on the guilty adulteresses. In the sixth section the emblem of the Rusty Caldron mocks the mad confidence of the besieged in the very midst of the investment. And the final discourse of the book uses Ezekiel himself as a sign: his silent grief under his bereavement is a foretokening of Woe beyond Mourning, when the city which is the desire of all Hebrew eyes shall have yielded to her fate.

The seventh and last book is to start from the fall of Jerusalem, and to speak of restoration and a glorious future. Between that book and the point we have just reached is interposed the book of Dooms of the Nations; the position is appropriate, for the various nations are denounced because of their hostility to the chosen people, or their exultation over its ruin. Ammon has said Aha! against the sanctuary when it was profaned; Moab has rejoiced that the house of Judah is like unto all the nations; Edom and the Philistines have shown perpetual enmity; Tyre has hoped she shall be replenished now that Judah is laid waste; Zidon has been a pricking brier and a grieving thorn to the house of Israel. Even Egypt is to feel the hand of Jehovah — > because they have been a staff of reed to the house of Israel: when they took hold of thee by thy hand, thou didst break, and didst rend all their shoulders, and when they leaned upon thee, thou brakest, and madest all their loins to be at a stand.

And a single brief section makes unmistakable the purport of this sixth book, by dwelling upon the triumph of Israel amid the Doomed Nations, when the people of Israel are gathered into their own happy land, and their God is sanctified in them in the sight of the nations.

The first of the seven divisions of the seventh book stands by itself; it is not a discourse, but a collection of notes on the fall of Jerusalem, reflecting the many-sidedness of that event in the life and experience of the prophet Ezekiel. Five separate sections may be distinguished. The shock of judgment has emphasised the prophet's office of Watchman for the individual souls before him, and the first section repeats the matter of his original commission. In the portion that follows, we are able to see the overwhelming despair with which the confident people had been suddenly stricken : —

> Thus ye speak, saying, Our transgressions and our sins are upon us, and we pine away in them; how then should we live?

It is the prophet's privilege to declare that their God has no pleasure in the death of the wicked, and to dwell upon the way of return. The third note, of only a few lines, records how, according to the divine promise, the first news of the city's smiting was brought to Ezekiel himself; how again, hours before the messenger came, the inspiration of the message had opened the prophet's mouth. There is a section of denunciation for the triumphant neighbours of fallen Judah, and a mocking of their ambitious hopes. Finally another consequence of the critical event is noticed: the callous hearers of Ezekiel's discourses shall learn at last that he is something more than an artistic preacher.

The remaining discourses make the fall of the nation a basis on which to build up a prophecy of future glory. With the Shepherds of Israel who have fed themselves is contrasted the Divine Shepherd who will gather his scattered flock to his holy hill. The prophet turns his face toward Mount Seir, and tells how for its cruel triumph it shall be made an astonishment and a desolation; he turns to the mountains of Israel and proclaims how it shall be said, The land that was desolate is become like the garden of Eden. There is a momentary return of the opening Vision, and Ezekiel is inspired to see the Valley of Dry Bones, and the transformation which typifies the resurrection of the hopes of Israel. The emblematic joining of the sticks holds out a future for one nation under one king. Under the names of Gog and his allies a heathendom more distant than the distant Chaldeans is pictured as invading in a far-off future a purified land, and giving names to valley and city through the vast burying of their stricken hosts. There is a long interval of years, and then the prophet Ezekiel records his final revelation: amid the original glory on a mountain of vision he has seen the pattern of the holy city and the exalted land; and, with a minuteness paralleling the original minuteness of the revelation to Moses, he makes known all its laws and ordinances and portionings, until the final note is reached in the naming of the city from the Presence of Jehovah.

Ezekiel is less read by the modern reader than his two companions among the Greater Prophets: no doubt because of the peculiar literary form which distinguishes his writings, and the unfamiliarity of symbolism to the western mind. But surely, a little attention to this special feature of expression is sufficient to put us in touch with it, and then the very distinctiveness of the emblem prophecy becomes a source of literary attraction. Isaiah among the prophets was the great poet; Jeremiah was the great preacher; Ezekiel appears not less the great artist. Isaiah in the divine presence was conscious of unclean lips, and his mouth touched with the live coal from the altar became a fountain of spiritual purification. Jeremiah shrank from his call as a mere child, and was strengthened to become a solitary fortress in Israel, maintaining his lonely testimony amid unpopularity and ruin all around. The third prophet amid the glory of his vision has a book mystically stretched out before him: it is written within and without with lamentations and mourning and woe, yet when he eats it, it is in his mouth as honey for sweetness. It is not the least of the surprises of biblical literature that the most unmitigated denunciations of rebellion and threatenings of ruin are committed to the prophet whose mode of utterance has an artistic sweetness that is all his own.

Daniel and the Minor Prophets

We pass to Daniel, and to what are known as the Twelve or the Minor Prophets. Each book deserves separate consideration. Yet there is interest in the old tradition that has grouped the twelve into a corpus prophetarum: comments on the individual books may be preceded by comment on the whole group. And first as to a point of arrangement. All that in the Bible follows the eighth chapter of Zechariah will be found in the present edition under the heading 'Anonymous.' Every reader will be aware that the authorship of the latter part of Zechariah is disputed. Had it, however, been merely a question of disputed authorship, as with Isaiah, I should have considered the matter outside the field of the present work. But the issue in the present case is something entirely within the scope of the Modern Reader's Bible — the question of the divisions of the sacred books. The facts seem to be these. The prophetic literature of the Old Testament was arranged under the names of the reputed authors, ending with the book of Zechariah (our Zechariah i–viii); following these were anonymous prophecies with subject-titles. The last of these subject-titles was 'My Messenger' (Malachi). How positively this was understood as a subject-title is illustrated by the fact that the Septuagint translates it as 'angel,' and the Targum ascribes the authorship of the book to Ezra. But in process of time 'Malachi' was read as a personal name, and thus the closing section of the prophetic roll seemed to follow the general form; it was natural then that the intervening sections with their subject-titles should attach themselves to the preceding book of Zechariah. This account of the matter seems probable in itself, and is further confirmed by New Testament references. Four passages from the latter part of Zechariah are cited in the New Testament: three of them are cited without the name of any author, the fourth is ascribed by St. Matthew to Jeremiah.* Now if an anonymous prophecy is being quoted, it is natural for Jeremiah, the lengthiest of the prophetic writers, to give his name to the whole roll of prophecy, as David has given his name to the whole collection of psalms. If, however, the writing had appeared under the name of Zechariah, St. Matthew could not have ascribed it to Jeremiah without being guilty of misquotation. Under these circumstances, to have followed the biblical headings in this edition would have been to pronounce on a question of authorship; the plan I have adopted leaves the question open. In any case, authorship is a matter of importance chiefly to the historian. But it would have been a real literary loss to be deprived of the subject-title 'My Messenger,' which gives such unity and suggestiveness to the final division of prophecy.

* Matthew xxvii. 9–10; compare Zechariah xi. 12–13. The other passages are Zechariah ix. 9 (in Matthew xxi. 5 and John xii. 15); chapter xii. 10 (in John xix. 37 and perhaps Revelation i. 7); xiii. 7 (in Matthew xxvi. 31 and Mark xiv. 27).

It is hardly necessary to bespeak attention for the scriptures included in this group. They are 'minor' only in length: for the rest, it is doubtful if any collection of miscellaneous literature has ever brought together so many writers of such surpassing interest. They stretch over a period of time which, on one theory of dates, is as great as that which in English literature separates Wycliffe from Browning. Of the individual prophets, Amos was a herdsman and dresser of sycomore trees; Daniel a mage, and one of a triumvirate administering a world empire; Jonah was a missionary; Micah a plain countryman; Zephaniah of royal descent; the rest have died away from human record leaving only their works to speak for them. As we go through these prophetic writings we are introduced to Babylon, land of mystery, of dreams and interpreters, of mutations in a single moment from an emperor intoxicated with omnipotence to the dim consciousness of beast life, from a royal orgy to the writing upon the wall of doom. We see the Chaldean again as a world conqueror, taking the nations in his net and sacrificing only to his drag. In one prophetic book Nineveh appears as a vast city of three days' journey, swept through and through with an infectious thrill of penitence; another prophet gives us a realistic word picture of Nineveh in her careless gaiety, Nineveh smitten with bewildering destruction, Nineveh desolate and a thing of the past. Here it is that we view most clearly the picturesque corruption of northern Israel, where the sterner Hebrew strain was adulterated by the luxury and joyous imagination of Tyre. At one point we have a glimpse of border warfare and border hate. Elsewhere the prophecies deal with Judah, or with Israel in general. We see this Israel in the full strength of national hope, looking for a King of Peace who shall enter in lowly triumph, and garrison his land, with his people as the weapons of his war. We see the ebbing of these hopes, and the gradual withdrawing of the Divine Shepherd, until Israel is left a flock for the slaughter. Jerusalem is presented under the siege, yet with mighty hopes of repentance and deliverance. The exiles are seen as a scattered 'church' witnessing in the heart of the Babylonian 'world.' In Haggai and Zechariah we have the return from exile, and the reweaving of the strands of national life in renewed Temple service, a recovered prophecy, and a princedom taking the place of the old kingship. And Malachi reflects the dull period when the impulse of the exile has been exhausted, and there is nothing but a weary looking for a Messenger of God, who shall effect a rousing for which native energy is no longer left.

The sacred thought embodied in these varied scriptures is at once varied and the same. Hosea loves to dwell upon God's yearning love, the love of the husband for the fallen wife, of the father for his prodigal son. Amos takes his stand for morals as against religion itself, when the two have irreligiously clashed. Micah presents the true and the false prophecy contending in the struggles of daily life. But other themes grow together into the one prophetic theme of judgment — the Hebrew counterpart of our modern providence. With Nahum it is a judgment upon the foe, as a form of mercy to God's people; Jonah comes as a corrective, with the thought of Jehovah's mercy extending outside his people to the sixscore thousand innocents of Nineveh. The mystery of judgment which troubled the wise men of Israel — the impunity of the wicked — appears in Habakkuk magnified to the scale of nations: this prophet's problem is the sight of the Chaldean allowed to prosper and punish wickedness less great than his own. Several of the prophecies are filled with a 'Day of the Lord': the judgment regularly appears as a visitation first upon Israel, to destroy the evil that is in it; then there is a purification and restoration, and finally a judgment between Israel and the nations; there is at the last an inauguration of a heaven, but it is a heaven upon earth.

The literary forms under which this thought is conveyed cover the whole range of prophecy; moreover, they involve certain minor peculiarities of structure which render specially important what the present work endeavours to supply — the reflection of literary structure in the printed page. The simplest of all literary forms is the story: this is ideally represented in Daniel and Jonah. For prophecy a natural form is discourse: the sermons of the Minor Prophets seldom remain at the dead level of discourse, but flash into realistic pictures or dramatic dialogue. In Amos the most artificial rhetoric is sanctified for spiritual effects; he has a grasp of style which can draw in even the preface as an artistic interruption. In Hosea scattered outbursts of prophetic truth in conflict with everyday life have crystallised into brief epigrams. In several prophets we have the 'doom form,' which produces in speech the effect which music produces when it combines recitative and song. The emblem — which is in prophecy what the fable is in philosophy — is used to express stages of spiritual declension or of advancing doom. Elsewhere we have the apocalypse, or great 'unveiling,' — unveiling of the future in a philosophy of history, and unveiling of the unseen world with its angelic spectators of human affairs. And drama is exhibited by the Minor Prophets in various degrees of fulness: Micah moulds a single brief thought in dramatic form; Hosea dares to embody in monologue the varying moods of Deity; Joel and Habakkuk give us the full force of the 'rhapsody' which is the dramatisation of the spiritual.

I write from the standpoint of literature, not of theology, and I cannot refrain from insisting once more upon the injury done to our liberal education by its ignoring of biblical literature. The Hebrews no less than the Greeks were our literary ancestors; to train ourselves in the productions of the one and not of the other means a distorted culture. Criticism can never be scientific that makes its inductions from a single field; and the literature it neglects is rich in forms of the first importance, both for their artistic interest and as vehicles of profound thought and powerful feeling. Nor can I understand those writers who seem to assume that in elaboration and finish of literary detail the Hebrew Scriptures are inferior to the productions of the Greeks. Comparisons of merit can never be more than personal judgments; but, speaking for myself as a student of world literature, I do not know to what I should turn for specimens of literary perfection rather than to the rhapsodies of Habakkuk and Joel. And if to another class of readers this last remark appears objectionable because of the sacredness of Scripture as Divine Revelation, I can only answer that it must be a strange theology which can see incompatibility between Divine inspiration and perfection of literary setting.

The Book of Daniel

Before a literary work can be correctly described it is necessary to grasp it in its unity. A difficulty in regard to this attaches to the Book of Daniel, from the fact that two distinct structures underlie the surface of the work, which need explaining and, as far as may be, harmonising. As regards matter, the book is a series of stories followed by a series of visions; in language it is Hebrew, changing suddenly to Aramaic, and almost as abruptly becoming Hebrew again. The twofold structure may be thus represented to the eye.

> Hebrew narrative tells a brief story of Daniel and his companions, is commencing a second story when it
> abruptly changes to Aramaic, in which this second story is concluded; a third, fourth, fifth, sixth story is added: then the narrative in the third person introduces Daniel seeing a Vision, from which point Daniel speaks in the first person:

Hebrew resumes with three more Visions, different in spirit to the first: Daniel speaking throughout in the first person

Thus (1) on the one hand the book contains first, a series of six prophetic stories, presenting Daniel and his comrades as faithful to their religion amid Babylonian surroundings, while Daniel himself is described as miraculously endowed with power to read mysteries supernaturally manifested to others. This part of the work is told in the third person, and seems to be brought to a conclusion in the words: So this Daniel prospered in the reign of Darius, and in the reign of Cyrus the Persian. Then follows, as a seventh section, an apocalypse or revelation, in which alike the supernatural manifestations and their interpretations are given to Daniel himself from without; throughout this revelation Daniel speaks in the first person. (2) On the other hand, it is to be noted that the commencement and the latter part of the book are in Hebrew, while the middle is in the Aramaic dialect.* The Aramaic portion commences just where (in the second story) certain Chaldeans are described as speaking in the Syrian language; the dialect continues, however, long past the speech so commenced, and through subsequent sections; until Hebrew is, for no obvious reason, resumed in the middle of the seventh section (the revelation), at the commencement of the second of the four visions of which this section is made up.

A simple explanation of this double structure would be to suppose that the Aramaic portion was a fragment, — a fragment in the strictest sense, commencing abruptly in the middle of a sentence; and that this was completed by a Hebrew writer, who both supplied an introduction leading up to the abrupt commencement of the fragment, and also added further visions. For both his contributions he would probably use traditional material: that there was plenty of such material attaching to the history of Daniel is clear from the stories of Daniel that are preserved in apocryphal scriptures. It will be observed that, on this supposition, both the literary types which are united in the complete Book of Daniel — prophetic story and apocalypse — would be within the Aramaic fragment; the Hebrew editor enlarged, but did not alter, the charater of the work. He even kept up the narration in the first person, which is found in the Aramaic portion from the point where the revelation commences.†

If such a supposition be correct, it might be expected that difference of detail would be perceptible between the style or spirit of the original and the additional matter: and this is found to be the case. So far as the supplementary commencement is concerned, it amounts to no more than an explanation as to who Daniel and his comrades were, and the addition of the circumstance, entirely in keeping with what follows, that they made a stand against defiling themselves with the king's meat. But it is different with the three visions added to the single vision which constituted the revelation of the Aramaic fragment: here important differences of spirit are noticeable. (1) The elements of the original revelation are within the limits of the typical, and thus entirely in the spirit of emblem prophecy: four portentous beasts, symbolising mutations of kingdoms, contrasted with the reign of the saints. In the visions which are added we get particular kingdoms, specific events. The two-horned Ram and the He-goat are at once interpreted as the king of Media and Persia and the king of Greece; we read subsequently of a 'king of the north' and a 'king of the south,' and elaborate details of their union and discord. The whole spirit of the revelation is changed: from what has been called the prophetic philosophy of history we pass to a very different interest—specific prediction of the future. (2) Again, in the fragment the machinery of vision (so to speak) is taken for granted: I saw in my vision by night, and behold — I came near unto one of them that stood by, and asked him, etc. In the Hebrew portion great pains is taken to emphasise the supernatural character of the visitation: it is said how the prophet was in reality in one province while in the vision he seemed to be in another; elaborate details are given of the physical prostration attending the contact with the superhuman; it is remarked how Daniel alone saw the vision, while those with him quaked and fled but saw nothing. If the Hebrew editor has kept within the form of his original, he has enlarged from it in the spirit of the writing.

As the Book of Daniel is found to have a twofold structure, so the motive or purpose of the work must be pronounced two-fold. If the book be taken as it stands, and the relation of its component parts examined, then the general purpose of the whole seems to be this: the six stories emphasise the character of Daniel and his God-given power to read supernatural mysteries — a power tested of course by the events — as a basis of credibility for the final revelation made to himself, much of which (it must be supposed) yet remained to be fulfilled. When, however, we read the Aramaic fragment by itself, any such underlying purpose is thrown into the background by another. The older Book of Daniel is, like the Book of Esther, a story of the Captivity. Daniel is the chief of several Judean captives who maintain their Hebrew faith and life against all the power of Babylon. They all, and especially Daniel, surpass the Chaldeans in their own boasted power of soothsaying and dream interpretation. They draw from the conquerors recognition of the superiority of the Hebrew God: at the close of one incident Nebuchadnezzar worships Daniel with oblation and sweet odours; on another occasion he makes a decree that every people, nation, and language that speak against the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego shall be cut in pieces; the dream of the tree that was cut down is told in a proclamation made by the Babylonian king to his whole empire in honour of the God who has brought such a marvel to pass. And as the stories of the Aramaic fragment picture the Hebrews in their captivity, so the vision which follows them foreshadows the period when that captivity shall end. Different motives then seem to underlie the original fragment and the work in its complete form. But these distinct motives find their reconciliation in the suggestion that the complete book is addressed to an age of persecution; and that the mystic predictions of coming events added to the original prediction of return from Babylon form the consolation for a national distress not less signal than the Babylonian captivity.

Of the literary qualities of Daniel it is not necessary to speak at length. The Revelation of Daniel was the most prominent example of a long course of apocalyptic literature culminating, for the biblical reader, in the Revelation of St. John. The rest is the perfection of mystic story. It is the delight of children; but none the less its salient ideas — the stone cut out without hands striking down the mighty image, the three children braving the burning fiery furnace, Nebuchadnezzar eating grass like oxen and wet with the dew of heaven, Daniel in the den of lions, the writing on the wall — have been absorbed into the common heritage of poetic associations which makes the groundwork of literary speech.

Book of Hosea

Hosea is perhaps the most powerful, certainly the most difficult, of the Minor Prophets It is easy to sum up his general thought and prophetic attitude: it is extremely difficult to follow him with detailed exegesis. This difficulty arises partly from the unusual literary forms in which his writings are cast, more from the rugged obscurity of his style, — an obscurity which, like that of Ecclesiastes, is an element of power in the impression of the whole, however much it may perplex the interpretation of the details. The best treatment for such a writer is to state briefly the landmarks of thought in the book, and to leave the rest for the discussion of each section in the notes.

The dominant thought of Hosea is the passionate love of Jehovah for his fallen people. If any reader is startled by the term 'passionate' in application to God, it can only be because the writings of this prophet are so unfamiliar: no word short of this will do justice to the language of Hosea. The imagery he applies to the Divine Being belongs to the strongest types of human passion: he presents in God the burning love of the husband for the wife of his youth who has turned unfaithful, the yearning tenderness of an outraged parent for his wayward child. It is passionate love again in another sense: the God of Hosea is swayed to and fro by conflicting passions — of righteous indignation that will blot Israel out for ever, of relenting tenderness which, in spite of all, will find a way of mercy. The several sections of the book end, some in hopeless judgment, others in restoration and peace.

The people of God in the Book of Hosea is northern Israel, called, as if by a name of endearment, Ephraim; Judah is not left out of view, but is referred to in a subordinate position, as a degree less corrupt, yet included in the general prophetic denunciation. The details picture an Israel just answering to the suggestion of the title-page: we can trace the merely material prosperity of the reign of Jeroboam II, and the political break-up that followed, as exhibited in rapid succession of short-lived and weak kings, factious struggles of an Assyrian and an Egyptian party, the last stage before the fall and captivity. Stanley calls Hosea the Jeremiah of Israel, Cheyne the prophet of the decline and fall of the northern kingdom. Such a people appears in this book of prophecy as wholly gangrened with corruption. Hosea sees corruption in the schism itself: by the way in which he speaks of Israel "seeking the LORD their God and David their king" he seems to regard the political rupture as the embryo of a rupture with Jehovah. The seed has already germinated in an adulteration of religious worship. Not indeed that there is, as in the days of Elijah, an open Baal worship to denounce; the worship in the high places is worship of Jehovah, under symbols of the calves, but the sacred rites are being saturated with the sensual nature worship of the idolatries that are all about. There is corruption again in the wild abandonment to luxury and dissipation, for which the prosperity of Jeroboam's reign had furnished material. Worst corruption of all, the weakened people are coquetting with the neighbouring powers, instead of seeking their salvation in a return to their offended God.

Notwithstanding the obscurity of particular passages, the whole Book of Hosea has a clear and pointed arrangement. It divides into the usual seven sections. The opening and closing sections are masterpieces of prophetic literature, founded on the two leading images under which Hosea conceives the relations between Jehovah and his people. The first is the elaborate emblem prophecy of Gomer, the unfaithful wife. The concluding section is a still more elaborate dramatic presentation of the Divine Yearning — the father's yearning over his rebellious son. Three sections are simple discourses of prophetic denunciation, discourses however which at points reach rhapsodic realisation or dramatic dialogue. The discourses are separated by two sections of the prophetic 'sentences' which have been recognised as characteristic of Hosea from the time of St. Jerome downwards. The whole is concluded by a lyrical epilogue.

Book of Joel

The Book of Joel is a single poem, the Rhapsody of the Locust Plague: a masterpiece of imaginative prophecy. It utterly refuses to connect itself with any time or event; hence the perplexity of historical critics, who at one time have been almost unanimous in proclaiming it among the latest, at another time among the earliest of biblical prophecies. Upon only two points of real life does the imaginative picture rest; and its connection with these is of the slightest. The basis of the first half is a locust plague; but the advance of the irresistible locust cloud is idealised into a march of mystic forces, described mainly by the effect produced —

> The land is as the garden of Eden before them,
> And behind them a desolate wilderness! —

but also with riddling suggestions of locusts:

> The appearance of them is as the appearance of horses; and as horsemen, so do they run. Like the noise of chariots on the tops of the mountains do they leap, like the noise of a flame of fire that devoureth the stubble. . . . And they break not their ranks: neither doth one thrust another; they march every one in his path; and they burst through the weapons, and break not off their course.

For the latter part of the poem a basis is found in an item of local geography — the Valley of Jehoshaphat: the name signifies 'Jehovah's Decision,' and suggests the shadowy Valley of Decision in which "multitudes, multitudes" are seen by the prophetic spectator as Jehovah makes his final combat with his people's foes.

The movement of the poem is the beautiful movement of the regular arch, with its turning point in the centre, while every stage in the rise of the action has its counterpart in the fall.

4. Relief and Restoration

3. Repentance at the last moment

5. Afterward: Israel spiritualised — the Nations summoned to Judgement.

2. Judgement advancing to a crisis

6. Advance to the Valley of Decision

1. The land desolate and mourning

7. The Holy Mountain and Eternal Peace.

In the first of the seven brief visions, after the fashion of a modern oratorio, successive choruses of Old Men, Revellers, Priests, Husbandmen, uniting at last in a chorus of the whole People, present the land in utter desolation. The second vision opens with the trump of doom, and moves through a crescendo of the advancing foe to the climax of the Voice of Jehovah. The third vision comes with a surprise: the Voice of Jehovah is a voice calling to repentance; and the choruses of the first vision unite in a prayer for forgiveness, led by their Priests. The fourth and central vision — keystone of the arch of movement — brings the change from judgment to mercy: as Jehovah speaks, the earth resumes its fertility and fairness. The fifth vision presents Israel in its sanctification; now new tokens of judgment foreshadow Jehovah preparing to fight for his own people against the nations. Throughout the sixth vision is the advance to the final contest in the Valley of the Lord's Decision, culminating, like the second vision, in earthquake and darkness. The darkness rolls away for the seventh vision, and, in contrast with the opening picture, stands out the Holy Mountain of God's people in its eternal peace.

The Book of Amos

Two critical questions meet us as we approach the Book of Amos, one affecting the content of the book, the other the style of the writer. They need the detailed discussion that belongs to notes: here I only state results.

As I understand it, the book is made up of two parts: one, a single prophetic utterance of four lines, the other, the most elaborately constructed piece of writing in all prophetic literature. The first stands thus:

> The words of Amos, who was among the herdmen of Tekoa, which he saw concerning Israel in the days of Uzziah king of Judah, and in the days of Jeroboam the son of Joash king of Israel, two years before the Earthquake. And he said:
>
> The LORD shall roar from Zion,
> And utter his voice from Jerusalem:
> And the habitations of the shepherds shall mourn,
> And the top of Carmel shall wither.

This is an extreme example of prophecy as prediction. Amos does not belong to the regular order of prophets, but has been a man in a humble rank of life. He has made a prediction of an earthquake — the famous "Earthquake in the days of Uzziah" (Zechariah xiv. 5) — two years before it happened. The fulfilment of this prediction has brought the obscure herdman into prominence; and has been accepted as a seal of his prophetic calling. Like the "man of God out of Judah" who confronted the first Jeroboam, Amos goes as a missionary to northern Israel. He encounters persistent opposition:

> They hate him that reproveth in the gate, and they abhor him that speaketh uprightly.

To a large extent this opposition is directed against him as a foreigner:

> Amos, O thou seer, go, flee thee away into the land of Judah, and there eat bread, and prophesy there: but prophesy not again any more at Beth-el: for it is the king's sanctuary, and it is a royal house.

Finally, as in the case of so many prophets, Amos embodies his whole life message in a single work, which makes up the rest of this Book of Amos.

This is the Rhapsody of the Judgement to come. It presents its scheme, not, like the rhapsody of Joel, as a continuous dramatic movement, but in a series of stages making a logical rather than a temporal sequence.* First, by a rhetorical figure of surprise, Israel is included among the doomed nations; then the corruption is denounced as ripe for judgment; finally the judgment is in vision seen to advance by steps. I have already (page 1390) dwelt upon the elaborate structure of this prose poem, and said how the structure reflects the thought; how the general movement of the poem conveys the conception of sin and judgment, while the parenthetic interruptions recall the prophet's struggles with opposition.

As regards its subject-matter, this prophecy seems to be generated by a state of national life amounting to a conflict between morals and religion: Israel appears as indifferent to elementary morality in proud reliance upon its position as Jehovah's peculiar people. The special message of Amos is that this basis of their trust will bring them the heavier judgment. It comes as a startling prophetical novelty, generating a violent antagonism to prophecy in general, and to Amos in particular. The picture incidentally presented is of formal worship (of the calves in Beth-aven) side by side with abandonment to luxury, avarice, oppression. The 'Judgement to come,' as usual in prophecy, appears at the last to be a sifting: none of the true corn shall perish, and at the end will be glorious restoration.

Book of Obadiah

This is the briefest of the prophetic books. A calamity falling upon Israel has been aggravated by the malignant rejoicing of her neighbour foe, Edom. Israel is comforted in the thought of a future in which Edom will suffer judgment in her turn, and the kingdom will be the Lord's.

The form is that of the regular Doom Song: a Divine speech of doom, with lyric celebration of the theme. It may be read in connection with the Doom Songs on Edom in Jeremiah (xlix) and Ezekiel (xxv). Here the lyrics strike a key-note of "tidings from the Lord," an ambassador going among the nations to tell of Jehovah's purposes against Edom. There is lyric exultation, and the rest is the Divine monologue.

Books of Jonah and Nahum

These two books of prophecy should be read together. They both deal with the mighty city of Nineveh. In the order of the story presented, Jonah comes first, displaying Nineveh at its height of power, while Nahum pictures its fall. But in the scale of spiritual development the order is reversed: Nahum stands at the same point as Obadiah — rejoicing over the fall of the Lord's enemies; Jonah, starting with the same thought, carries us forward to the supremacy of mercy over judgment.

The literary form of Nahum hovers between the Doom Song and the Rhapsodic Discourse. The first two of its seven sections are discourse, with the pendulum alternation between the ideas of judgment and mercy. From the third section the doom form prevails. Messengers coming over the mountains proclaim the long expected event: brilliant lyrics picture the fall of Nineveh. Judgment threatens the great city, but finds it prepared with all its military pomp.

> The chariots rage in the streets,
> They justle one against another in the broad ways:
> The appearance of them is like torches,
> They run like the lightnings.

But, mysteriously, this resistance collapses: as they think proudly on their worthies, these stumble; they hasten to the walls, but the river gates have been opened behind them. The sack of a great city is in full play, handmaids are being carried captive, 'tabering on their breasts' as they are dragged along. It all seems incredible:

> Nineveh hath been from of old like a pool of water;
> Yet they flee away:

'Stand, stand' —
But none looketh back.

In the fourth and central section the action pauses in contemplation:

Where is the den of the lions,
And the feeding place of the young lions,
Where the lion and the lioness walked,
The lion's whelp, and none made them afraid?

With the fifth section there is more Divine indignation, and picturing of Nineveh in its pride; noisy bustle on the outside, beneath the surface foul witchcraft and corpses of victims. The sixth section taunts the fallen pride, paints the helplessness of power against doom from on high. With the final section is another contemplative pause:

Thy shepherds slumber, O king of Assyria,
Thy worthies are at rest:
Thy people are scattered upon the mountains,
And there is none to gather them.

The Book of Jonah is the single case of the prophetic story in the Books of the Prophets: Jonah appears as hero, not as author. It contains again the single example of a prophet's disobedience to his call. The truth revealed is twofold, corresponding to the two stages of the story.

The first part of the story rests upon the idea, so difficult to the modern mind, of Deity as a local power.

> Their god is a god of the hills; therefore they were stronger than we: but let us fight against them in the plain, and surely we shall be stronger than they. (I Kings xx. 23.)

So Jonah, shrinking from his mission to the far east, takes ship at Joppa for the farthest west. So the crew of mariners, each from a different country, call each on his own god, when the great wind is hurled into the sea. Jonah, waked from sleep to encounter the full situation, recognises in an instant the whole truth: the true God he worships has a dominion that covers the whole world. His own lips speak his doom: unwillingly the mariners fling him into the sea, and he is miraculously rescued.

At this point of the book comes the poem called in our versions, The Prayer of Jonah. It is a song of deliverance; and the trouble from which the singer has been delivered is, in the plainest language, described as an immersion in the sea.

For thou didst cast me into the depth,
In the heart of the seas;
And the flood was round about me,
All thy waves and thy billows passed over me . . .

The waters compassed me about,
Even to the soul.
The deep was round about me;
The weeds were wrapped about my head.

But to a single line of this song —

Out of the belly of hell cried I — a commentator has appended a most prosaic footnote, explaining how the meaning is the belly of a whale that received and vomited Jonah. Had the page-setting which we now use for all literature been applied early to the Bible, it would have been evident to every eye that this is only a commentator's footnote, in full keeping with the fanciful thoughts which distinguished the early ages of commentary. A similar comment was added to one of the New Testament references to Jonah; and here the confusion of text and note makes the detail about the whale appear as part of the words of Christ, though it is foreign to the lesson which Jesus is drawing from the story of Jonah, and which he repeats three times.* Thus the question is not, as is commonly supposed, whether the incident of the whale is a real or a mythical incident. The question is, whether it is a part of the Bible at all; and our result is that it is the addition of a commentator, and moreover, an addition that is in clear contradiction to the sacred text.

The story resumes, and Jonah goes on his mission to preach repentance: a wave of spiritual terror and contrition passes over the vast city, and the judgment is stayed. Jonah in righteous indignation remonstrates with God. The mercy of Jehovah is no new idea to the prophet: he says that the motive of his disobedience to the former mandate was his fear that God would not stand by his prophet's threatenings. So confident is Jonah in this remonstrance that he proceeds to build a booth outside the walls "till he might see what would become of the city." A Divine object lesson follows. A gourd plant grows up to shelter the watcher from the heat, and is loved by Jonah for its beauty. Suddenly he sees it laid low by a worm. Again the prophet "does well to be angry" at this sight of the fair overcome by the foul. The answer of God must be given in the words of the original:

> Thou hast had pity on the gourd, for the which thou hast not laboured, neither madest it grow; which came up in a night, and perished in a night: and should not I have pity on Nineveh, that great city; wherein are more than sixscore thousand persons that cannot discern between their right hand and their left hand; and also much cattle?

Mercy has hitherto, in the prophetic mind, been the special privilege of God's peculiar people: the new revelation is that the God of universal power is no less the God of univeral salvation.

Book of Micah

This book is made up of an elaborate prophetic discourse followed by two prophecies in dramatic form.

The spirit of the whole has been felicitously described by Professor Findlay as uniting the pessimism of Amos and Hosea with the Messianic optimism of the earlier Zechariah (that is, our Zechariah chapter ix, etc.). We have the age of Isaiah viewed, not from the standpoint of the capital and the political leaders, but from that of the country and humbler classes. Two points of interest associate Micah with the greater prophets. It is Micah's ideal picture of the mountain of the Lord's house at the head of the mountains that is made the text of Isaiah's sublime discourse, in which he develops the thought that through judgment is the path to this glory.† And when Jeremiah's prophecy of the destruction of the Temple had placed his life in danger, and the solemn reiteration of the word had reached the conscience of the mob and their leaders, we read how, in the momentary calm, an aged Israelite recalled to the assembly that Micaiah the Morashtite had threatened worse doom in the golden age of

* See below, note to Matthew xii. 40.

† Or, both prophets may have taken the same passage from the "floating prophecies" of the time.

Hezekiah, while Hezekiah and his people had met the prophecy not with violence, but with the repentance that averted it.

Of the three compositions that make up this book the first attacks social corruption and the delusive promises of the false prophets, insisting upon the purging judgment that must precede the glorious restoration. The last presents the eve of this judgment; the corrupt in their despair, and the faithful — the 'man of wisdom' — to whom the judgment comes as deliverance. Between these stands one of the most exquisite morsels of prophetic literature: a dramatic scene hardly a page long embodying a single thought. A Court of Judgment is before us: God is the plaintiff, Israel, the defendant: even a witness can be found in the Balaam who, coming to curse Israel, was forced to cry blessings on the object of Jehovah's care. In such a court who may preside as judge? It is the Mountains, the "enduring foundations of the earth," who listen to the plea; when the defendant Israel has with trembling refused to put in an appearance, it is the Mountains who pronounce judgment:

> He hath shewed thee . . what is good; and what doth the LORD require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?

Justice, mercy, and a sense of the presence of God — these are the enduring foundations of the spiritual world.

Book of Habakkuk

This book of prophecy is here presented as a single literary composition, which may be entitled, A Rhapsody of the Chaldeans. The historical situation needs no further defining than the recognition on the political horizon of the Chaldeans as a world power trampling down the nations. To the pious Israelite the first suggestion this brings is of a power for judgment on the unpunished sin around him. But the reflecting prophet sees a further mystery: how can a righteous God use an impious conqueror for the punishment of sin less wicked than his own? The divinely given solution of this problem is the same thought which Jeremiah (l. 23) expresses by calling Babylon the 'hammer' of God, an instrument of providence for the destruction of evil, to be itself destroyed when its work is done. This is the whole thought: the rest is poetic setting.

The literary form is a perfect type of the 'rhapsody.' The essential meaning of this (above, page 1392) is dramatic realisation, by means which include but go beyond dramatic form. Thus in the present case we have: (1) a providential mystery developed in dramatic dialogue. (2) For the solution of the mystery dramatic dialogue breaks into the lyric doom form; the fall of the Chaldeans is realised indeed, but realised as a distant future. (3) The climax makes this future present; here we have the full splendour of the ode, realising Jehovah come to Judgment. The day of doom breaks from the mountains of the east; passes over the earth, while sun and moon stand still in their habitation; dies away over the whitening waves of the western sea. At the close the prophet, overawed by the judgment that has come in answer to his own prayer, gradually trembles into holy confidence:

> For though the fig tree shall not blossom,
> Neither shall fruit be in the vines;
> The labour of the olive shall fail,
> And the fields shall yield no meat;
> The flock shall be cut off from the fold,
> And there shall be no herd in the stalls:

Yet I will rejoice in the LORD,
I will joy in the God of my salvation.

Book of Zephaniah

Little is needed in the way of introduction to this work. It is a typical example of the doom form, with its combination of Divine monologue and interrupting lyrics. The passages of Divine monologue, recognisable in this edition by their prose form, can be read by themselves and make a connected whole. The lyric passages break in from time to time to dwell upon the 'Day of the LORD' so presented:

The great Day of the LORD is near:
It is near and hasteth greatly! . . .
That Day is a day of wrath,
A day of trouble and distress,
A day of wasteness and desolation,
A day of darkness and gloominess,
A day of clouds and thick darkness,
A day of the trumpet and alarm.

The prophecy is connected by its title page with the reign of Josiah: the last rally of spiritual fervour before the kingdom of Judah settles down to its doom. From that standpoint Zephaniah speaks with his eye on the future. When, with the standards of secular history, we think of the smallness of such a kingdom as Judah, it is most impressive to realise the wide outlook of prophecy. The opening words of Zephaniah are —

I will utterly consume all things from off the face of the ground, saith the LORD.

The judgment begins at Judah and Jerusalem; it extends to the neighbouring peoples; it stretches to include in its net of destruction Ethiopian and Assyrian. The judgment goes deep as well as spreads wide: it is directed against "the men that are settled on their lees, that say in their heart, The LORD will not do good, neither will he do evil," as well as against the "proudly exulting ones" who are "haughty in the holy mountain." And the salvation to which this judgment is the prelude is for an afflicted and poor people that trust in the name of the Lord; for innocent exiles who are sorrowing for the solemn assembly, to whom the burden on the holy land was a reproach. This salvation is coextensive with the judgment: its climax is to "turn to the peoples a pure language" that they may all serve the Lord with one consent.

Books of Haggai and Zechariah

It is natural to read together these books: their authors are fellow-workers in the great task of rebuilding the Temple after the Return from exile. Their prophecies make a series arranged in the same methodical way, each with an exact date and introduction.

An entirely new era is before us: the Hebrew Nation has changed into the Jewish Church. Politically subject, Israel enters upon a new existence as a religious community, with the Temple service as the centre of its life. It is the mission of Haggai to bring the authority of prophecy to support the new order of things. He stimulates the flagging zeal of the Temple builders, and makes this service the righteousness on which their prosperity is to depend. And he gives formal prophetic recognition to Zerubbabel, the princely leader of the returned exiles, as occupying the position from which the exile had deposed Jehoiachin. What Haggai has done Zechariah carries further. The new prophecy that has arisen Zechariah links to the prophecy of the old era, thus emphasising the continuity of the national existence by the recovered stream of prophetic revelation. While he brings word of encouragement to Zerubbabel, he further, on the authority of a prophetic vision, crowns the High Priest Joshua, making for this new era the priestly and the regal authority equal: he shall be a priest upon his throne: and the counsel of peace shall be between them both. And again, what Haggai had touched in a single word Zechariah reiterates with varied modes of prophetic emphasis: that the old times of fasting and trouble are passed away, and such blessings are in store for Jerusalem as shall make the new dispensation far surpass the old.

But from the literary point of view a single one of these prophecies needs further discussion. The Sevenfold Vision of Zechariah is the most extended example in Scripture of the use of the dream form. We have dream within dream: a scene of dreamland is kept before us throughout, while into this as into a frame are fitted successively a series of special visions. Thus when we read (iv. 1) —

> And the angel that talked with me came again, and waked me, as a man that is wakened out of his sleep —

the context shows that this means, not that the prophet was waked out of sleep into reality, but out of the general dream scene into an inner dream. These special visions are simply emblem prophecies: hieroglyphic forms are seen for a moment, each a token of a fresh mercy of God to Israel. But through the enveloping vision there seems to run a suggestion of the most awe-inspiring of Israel's religious functions — the Ceremonial of the Blessing and the Curse, proclaimed in the old days from Mount Ebal and Mount Gerizim. So here we have "the two mountains" — mentioned abruptly without any explanation — and the spirit of the whole vision is that the Curse which had rested on Israel for threescore and ten years is to give place to a series of Blessings. In the bottom between these two mountains — where of old the people would have stood — myrtle trees make a screen of dream mystery as the vision opens; gradually among these myrtle trees horsemen are discerned, and these "walk to and fro through the earth" as ministers of Jehovah's pleasure. They are heard to make their report that all the earth sitteth still and is at rest. Thereupon another voice appeals to the LORD: How long before his indignation at his people shall yield to mercy? Then follows an exquisite touch of dream mystery. It is not unlike the conclusion to Tennyson's Vision of Sin:

> I heard a voice upon the slope
> Cry to the summit, 'Is there any hope?'
> To which an answer peal'd from that high land,
> But in a tongue no man could understand.

So here, in answer to the angelic appeal for mercy an answer is heard, and the dreamer knows that it is "good words, even comfortable words:" but it needs the interpreting Angel to translate from the unknown tongue into plain words, of Jehovah sore displeased with the nations that are at ease, Jehovah returning to his Jerusalem with mercies.

The special visions begin. In the first are seen shadowy Horns — symbol of proud oppressors, and shadowy figures of Smiths fraying these horns and casting them down. Then the Young Man hastening with his reed to measure Jerusalem is stopped: Jerusalem shall know no bounds. In the third vision we have a parallel to the Council in Heaven of Job: the Adversary is doing his office against the High Priest Joshua, but is rebuked as over zealous, while for Joshua the prisoner's mourning garments are changed into robes of exaltation. The figure of the Golden Candlestick symbolises the completion of the Temple by Zerubbabel. In another wave of vision the two 'Sons of Oil' are seen beside the Candlestick — two "olive branches which by means of the two golden spouts empty the golden oil out of themselves:" the sequel makes this a symbol of the double ministry of prince and priest which is to govern the new era. In the sixth vision the Flying Roll of the Curse purges crime out of the land; in the seventh, the figure of Wickedness between the ephah and the talent of lead suggests the evil lurking in the traffic of weights and measures, and is seen borne away to the farthest quarters of the earth. Then we are back in the enveloping vision, with the whole scene intensified: the two mountains glow like brass, and from the screen of myrtle grove, not horses only, but horses and chariots hurry to all points of the compass with their Divine mandates. The last word of the vision proclaims how one of these embassies has quieted the Lord's spirit in the north country of Babylonian oppression.

The Anonymous Prophecies

I have explained (above, page 1414) the reasons for considering all that follows the eighth chapter of the biblical Zechariah as a series of anonymous prophecies. The arrangement however suggests this thought: If these four separate pieces of literature, without the advantage of being attached to the personality of an historic prophet, have survived through the wear and tear of the ages, may we not look for something specially remarkable about each?

The King of Peace

This has the simple doom form: Divine monologue of judgment and salvation, with exultant lyrics interrupting. While it is without any clear indications of historic connection,* it may be said to be in the general style of the prophecies of Micah and Isaiah. Still more closely does its spirit approach the spirit of the seventy-second psalm; the picture of a King who shall save the children of the needy and break in pieces the oppressor, who shall have dominion from sea to sea, in whose days the righteous shall flourish, with abundance of peace till the moon shall be no more. One single passage of this picture of a King of Peace seems to have fastened itself upon the imagination of Israel, until in New Testament times Jesus himself gives it recognition, and makes it the basis of his solemn entry into Jerusalem.

Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion;
Shout, O daughter of Jerusalem:
Behold, thy King cometh unto thee:
He is just, and having salvation;
Lowly, and riding upon an ass,
Even upon a colt, the foal of an ass.

The Withdrawal of the Divine Shepherd

This is Emblem Prophecy: a triple emblem, the withdrawal of God from his unfaithful people being conveyed under three figures, all taken from the relation between the shepherd and his flock. It is the extreme boldness of these figures that has given to the prophecy its vitality.

The pitiable condition of a people forsaken by its God is conveyed by the striking image of a flock designated for slaughter: the buyers slay them without any sense of guilt; the sellers think of nothing but the price; even the shepherd in charge of them does his business of fattening them without any thought of pity occurring to him.

Again: the Divine Shepherd has covenanted with the other nations to feed his own peculiar flock, and the symbol of that covenant is his shepherd's staff of Graciousness. In vain: so thankless does the task prove to the Shepherd that he breaks this staff and the covenant; so paltry does the result appear to the other nations that they price the Shepherd's services at the wretched "thirty pieces of silver," which are only worth throwing into the refuse pot of the Temple. The Shepherd has another staff, Union: but so hopeless is the brotherhood of Judah and Israel that he breaks this without using.

But there is a climax beyond this. Instead of being left shepherdless, Israel shall have the Foolish Shepherd: who tends not nor heals, but feeds on the flock himself. Vilest of sinners is such a shepherd! Destruction is his doom! The original apostasy of Israel is here touched: not the people alone, but the secular king preferred by Israel to the theocracy, will be included in a common ruin.

Three Prophecies of the Siege

This remarkable piece of anonymous prophecy has for us an interest of historic suggestiveness. It carries us back to what is a landmark, not in the history of Israel alone, but in the religious history of the world — the Siege of Jerusalem. But it is the Siege seen yet in progress, the event not known; we are put in touch with the hopes and fears, the confidence and despair, of that pregnant moment. If so modern a phrase might be permitted, we have here three imaginative interpretations of the Siege of Jerusalem; each has its permanent spiritual truth, but in its immediate significance each gives a questioning of Divine purpose before the final interpretation of Providence has been brought by the event.

In the first section we have the optimist enthusiasm of those who see in the Siege of Jerusalem a second Siege of Sennacherib. They look for the moment of miracle which shall make Jerusalem a cup of reeling, a burdensome stone to the besieging nations, their horses smitten with sudden blindness. The chieftains of Judah in that day will be like a torch of fire among sheaves; while as to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the feeblest of them shall be as David. But what is the condition precedent to this deliverance? In the crisis of Sennacherib Hezekiah had carried his trouble to the Temple, and in solitude humbled himself before his God. But now the prophecy pictures, not king alone, but the whole house of David and the whole people in solitary mourning, each tribe and family apart by themselves, their wives apart by themselves. In response to this spirit of grace and supplication there ensues — what has been adopted into the inmost thought of modern religion — the fountain opened for sin and uncleanness. In that fountain are cleansed away all sin and idolatry, and what is more evil yet — false prophecy: until the false Amos of that age shall passionately claim to be a tiller of the ground and not a prophet; otherwise, his nearest and dearest will be the first to smite him, while he himself will come to look upon the scars of those wounds as the wounds of friends.

The second of the prophecies voices the men of despair. The issue is inevitable: the shepherd must be smitten and the sheep scattered. There will be a remnant saved, yet only as the gold is saved out of the hot fire of purification.

But the third prophecy unites the thoughts of the other two. The city is doomed to fall; all the horrors of the sack are to be endured, and half the people must go into captivity. But for the saved, all God's ancient wonders for Israel shall be intensified. With an exact echo of the cleaving of the Jordan and the Red Sea, the prophecy pictures the Mount of Olives cleaving to make a wondrous way of escape: through the miraculous passage the happy fugitives throng with a rush like the rushing from the great Earthquake. As in the days of Joshua, the succession of light and darkness shall be interrupted: at evening time there shall be light, making a day such as only the Lord knows. Plagues like the plagues of Deuteronomy shall afflict the enemy—nay, shall afflict the most distant nations that refuse to come to the sacred feasts. In the purified land, the spirit of traffic that had corrupted the sacrifices shall be unknown. Holiness to the Lord shall be inscribed on the bells of the horses; the refuse pots of the Temple shall be holy as the bowls before the altar.

Malachi, or, My Messenger

This book is cast in a dialectic form almost peculiar to itself among the canonical Scriptures. We have brief discourses on texts, but texts which appear as interruptions from the audience, or a supposed adversary, and which therefore come not at the beginning but in the course of the argument. We are brought close to the Age of commentary and discussion which filled the interval between the Old and the New Testaments; the habit of "hearing and asking questions" which encounters the boy Jesus on the threshold of the new era.

The historical situation is a further development of what has been seen in the prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah. The exile is too much a thing of the past to leave any traces. The expression of the national life in religious ritual has become so far a matter of course as to be in danger of formality and laxity. In place of this, the source of religious inspiration has come to be the thought of 'the Messenger of the Lord,' and the expectation of his advent as a power for judgment. Faith even in this is through delay losing its power. The prophecy is a call for social and religious purification, and a pledge that this Messenger of the Lord shall surely come.

There is a beautiful final touch which gives a completeness to the whole of prophetic literature. The last brief section of the last of the prophets goes back to the founder of the Law. The prophet of whom Moses spake as like unto himself is identified with this Messenger to come: he shall be a second Elijah to turn the heart of children to fathers and the heart of fathers to children, before the great and terrible Day of the Lord shall come.

BIBLE POETRY

In none of the great literatures of the world is there so close an intermingling of poetry and prose as in the special literature we call the Bible; and this whether we use the words in the popular usage which confuses 'poetry' and 'verse,' or in the more correct sense as discriminating creative literature and critical. The rhythmic system of Hebrew scripture is peculiar from its overlapping of verse and prose. Old Testament history is an alternation of history and story: the stories are, rhythmically, prose, but they none the less correspond to the epic poetry of other peoples. The books of the prophets are miscellanies of prose and verse; and scriptural philosophy has distinctiveness largely from the way in which it poises itself evenly between the functions of poetry and of prose. The only reason then for such a title as Bible Poetry is that three books of Scripture stand apart from the rest of the Old Testament in not falling under its divisions of history, prophecy, and wisdom. The three are the Book of Psalms, the work traditionally known as the Lamentations of Jeremiah, and the single relic of sacred love poetry that has come down to us as Solomon's Song. There is, however, no other point in common between the three except that they are poetry; they can be treated only in separate introductions.

The Psalms

The Book of Psalms is recognised as the perfection of lyric poetry. It well may be. The musical meditation which is the essence of lyrics can find no higher field than the devout spirit which at once raises itself to the service of God, and overflows on the various sides of active and contemplative life. There is another reason. One of the chief interests of Hebrew among the world's great literatures is the uniqueness of its verse system, founded less on verbal rhythm than on parallelism of whole expressions. In other languages, burdened as they are with versification of counted syllables and measured vowel sounds, the harmonious intricacies and elastic windings of lyric poetry have to be attained by a triumph of thought over mechanism: Hebrew poetry carries its lyric rhythm into the very thought itself.

Accordingly in a literary edition of the Psalms the first task must be an investigation of the metrical parallelism which underlies them. What of metre in the ordinary sense is possessed by these poems belongs to the original Hebrew; parallelism is independent of particular languages, and makes itself felt even in a free translation. That such parallelism can be reduced to a regular system, tested by recurrence of the same phenomena in different poems, and by perpetual harmony between thought and external form, I have endeavoured to bring out in this work, both by theory and practical arrangement. The theory I have relegated to the notes (below, page 1517), for the sake of readers who may not care for technicalities. But I would suggest to the most ordinary reader that a little attention given to the metrical system of the psalms would be amply repaid by enhanced appreciation of their rhythmic beauty.

Three distinct lines of development have united to lay foundations for the rhythmic system of the psalms. The traditional poetry, preserved in historic books of Scripture, is largely connected with extemporisation; it has contributed to later verse the elastic unit of the varying 'strain.' Another unit is contributed by wisdom literature, in the gnomic 'couplet' on which alike its verse and prose are founded. Not less important than these among the originating sources of poetry is the dance, the intricate evolutions of which reflect themselves in oral literature in corresponding intricacies of verse; from this influence it has come about that even the 'line,' or half parallel, may be a unit in elaborate lyric versification. These three different units, with their aggregations and combinations, make up a copious variety of figures of parallelism, such as give to the poetry of the psalms an elasticity that never checks the flow of thought, and a sensitiveness that can reflect every change of thought in change of expression.

We find in these biblical lyrics 'antistrophic' structure, stanzas running in pairs; as in Greek, each strophe is answered rhythm for rhythm by its antistrophe, but, unlike the Greek, the biblical antistrophe answers thought as well as rhythm. If in a particular rhythmic form we find recited hostile threats —

> How say ye to my soul,
> 'Flee as a bird to your mountain?
> 'For, lo, the wicked bend their bow
> 'They make ready their arrow upon the string,

'That they may shoot in darkness at the upright in heart?'
'If the foundations be destroyed,
'What can the righteous do?'

in the precise duplicate of this rhythmic form we hear the response of faith:

The LORD is in his holy temple,
The LORD, his throne is in heaven:
His eyes behold, his eyelids try the children of men;
The LORD trieth the righteous,
But the wicked and him that loveth violence his soul hateth.
Upon the wicked he shall rain snares:
Fire and brimstone and burning wind shall be the portion of their cup.

A strophe will trace the breaking down of the psalmist's faith, and the antistrophe bring out its sudden recovery; this structure will place side by side an oracle of God and its glad acceptance, the busy schemes of earth's rulers and the Divine scorn that overrides them. Or, more elaborately, the opening thought of a strophe —

O LORD, thou hast searched me — gathers force as it goes; the sense of oppression in the Divine presence reaches at last a climax which is found to be a turning point; throughout the antistrophe the thought is measuring its steps backward, until, when the rhythm is complete, the opening note is reversed —

Search me, O LORD.

Or again, as in English poetry, we find a flow of many 'stanzas,' conveying less marked movement of thought. The simplicity of stanzas does not exclude elaborations. Recurrent refrains bind the stanzas together, or catch variations with the varying spirit of the movement. Couplet themes find development in stanzas that follow them, as when a priest leads his choir. Or a series of stanzas is 'enveloped' by a reflection or benediction at the beginning and end; or, by a variation of the same device, a question poises itself in mid thought —

LORD, who shall sojourn in thy tabernacle?

until a detailed survey of particulars of moral purity enables it to answer itself —

He that doeth these things shall never be moved.

One hymn of triumph marks its movement by augmenting successive stanzas from four to five, six, seven couplets; to contrast with this we have an elegy the antistrophic stanzas of which are steadily diminishing from five to four, three, two couplets, as if the very power to mourn were dying down.

Different types of structure may be combined, and fresh elaborations come in; more especially the characteristically lyric device of 'interruption.' The psalm which is celebrating, in stanzas of five, God's blessing upon the personal life, sinks into stanzas of four while it dwells upon the frailty of that personal life, and then returns to its first rhythm; its companion psalm reviews, in a long succession of stanzas of five, the creator's external universe, and sinks to stanzas of four to tell the dependence of each living thing upon the spirit of God, returning to the stanzas of five for a final exaltation of the Divine majesty. Or again, personal trouble in one rhythm interrupts itself in the middle with a contrast of national hopes in a different measure; upon stanzas of despair there breaks in antistrophic interruption of denunciation before a return to the stanza form is found to have brought a calmer frame of mind.

These are some of the elaborations which have grown up by long tradition of lyric versification. A late age has added one more in acrostic structure. Alphabetic elaborations are found in meditative psalms, in liturgies, even in poems of a dramatic cast. And the famous hundred and nineteenth psalm, with its eightfold acrostic initials, and synonym for 'law' in every verse, is a monument of how mechanism may be the handmaid of devotion.

But metric forms are only the vestibule of sacred poetry, the reader's main interest will be in the matter which these psalms contain. Lyric verse is the confidant of the soul in all its moods; from pompous ritual and national pæan down to the cry of a solitary soul in the dark, there is nothing that cannot find a record in the Book of Psalms. The first psalm strikes a keynote in its blessing on the meditative life, and a considerable section of the whole is made by the outpourings of the life of contemplation. Psalm 36, against a background of evil so corrupt that iniquity has become its own law, contemplates an Infinite Good, whose dimensions are the height of the heavens, the depths of the seas, the strength of the mountains: in Him is the fountain of all life. Two are emphatically nature psalms: one beholds in man (8) the viceroy of God, the other (29) presents a thunderstorm, with the Voice of Jehovah for its refrain, his glory for its prelude, and his peace for its final note. Nature and human life are drawn together by the nineteenth psalm with its contemplation of the starry heavens above and the law of Jehovah within, and the companion hymns (103, 104) which celebrate the God of the personal life and the God of external nature as one. Psalm 15 describes the consecrated life: the following poem tells of its joy and gladness. 'God of my life' might well be a title for such psalms as 61 and 63; the conception is broadened into a recognition of the God of the national life in the two psalms founded on Moses' Song, one of which (90) expands the thought —

The Eternal God is thy dwelling place —

the other (91) the succeeding thought —

Underneath are the everlasting arms.

Longings for the house of God, with thoughts of the pilgrimages to the sacred feasts, are the inspiration of psalm 84; in another poem (42–3) we have the same longing in one who is either actually an exile, or by some cause exiled from the temple worship. But what in this last is only sketched, is displayed in all fulness and variety in the fifteen 'Songs of Ascents' which constitute a psalter within the psalter. Composed, apparently, by putting together hymns of the festal pilgrimages and hymns inspired by the exile and return from Babylon, this collection widens suggestively our whole conception of pilgrimage, and presents it in its every stage. We have cries of Israel out of the depth of its affliction, the cry of the individual exile from the bitter environment of foreign speech, or as he is lost in the crowd of slaves waiting with obsequious eyes upon an oriental master; we catch the moment when the turn of the captivity comes to the exiles as a dream, when with mingled tears and gladness they see the first caravans set out and hope for this seed-time to grow to a harvest of joy for themselves; there is the complete deliverance, with the snare broken and themselves escaped; we find a traveller's hymn with 'the LORD thy keeper' for its burden; songs of family joys beguile the road; the first sight of Mount Zion and the mountains round about Jerusalem suggests thoughts of the firm foundations of Jehovah's righteousness; salutations to the Holy City are sung while the feet stand within its gates; there is celebration of the unity of brethren thus gathered from a distance in common worship, the dews of Hermon descended on the hill of Zion; the collection includes the old Dedication Hymn of David's temporary tabernacle and Solomon's finished temple; for conclusion we have the exchange of blessings as the congregation retire and leave the Night Watch to lift up their hands in worship through the dark hours. Israel's deepest trouble has been blended with its high festal joys to constitute the 'pilgrimage' of this 'Pilgrims' Hymn Book.'

The second psalm opens another type of poems, with its Song of the Lord's Anointed. The reader who is accustomed to find Messianic prophecies in every psalm must remember that these belong to secondary interpretations, to symbolic meanings which must be determined by canons of theological exegesis: literature is concerned with the primary meaning of the poems, and here Messianic psalms make but one section out of many. The idea of king is found to vary in the poetry of the psalter. Apart from such psalms as 61 and 63, in which the 'king' appears only as any other devout worshipper, we find two main senses of the word. In the War Anthems (20–1) we have antiphonal passages of king and people; though the term is general, we may presume that this is the king of Israel, and the same will apply to the king of the Royal Marriage Hymn (45). In Psalms 132 and 89 we have specific reference to the covenant with David and his seed: here the king is clearly the king of Israel, exalted a conqueror over his adversaries, yet still the ruler only of the chosen nation. In two psalms we have the full Messianic conception: the Lord's Anointed is exalted (2) over the whole earth, in spite of the vain opposition of earthly rulers; again (110) Jehovah bids his chosen sit at his right hand until his foes have become his footstool, while he is exalted king over the nations, priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek. Perhaps a link between the narrower and the wide conception of king may be seen in the thought (72) of a dynasty of righteousness:

> Give the king thy judgements, O God,
> And thy righteousness unto the king's son.

This dynasty is to bring refreshment and mercy to the oppressed, abundance to the whole earth; the kings of Tarshish and Sheba shall offer gifts, and all nations shall bow down in submission. Parallel with the two conceptions of the Lord's king are the two conceptions of Zion. The Zion of the Sennacherib psalms is indeed beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth, the lair out of which springs Judah's lion, yet it is no more than the metropolis of Judah; in psalm 87 all nations are pictured as enrolling themselves in the citizenship of the Zion loved of Jehovah; nay, all founts of excellence are found in her. We may almost say that there is a similar expansion in the conception of God. The Song of the Exodus (114) celebrates a deity of whom it is said that Judah is his sanctuary and Israel his dominion; and this, in contradistinction to the older territorial conception of gods, comes as a new thought at which all nature is moved. A great portion of the psalter, on the other hand, is made up of hymns the main point of which is to celebrate how 'Jehovah reigneth' over the whole earth, and all nations must bow before him.

This last has introduced us to yet another division of the psalter: that which connects itself with sacred ritual. Sometimes it is national ritual. I have already referred to the War Anthems, antiphonal between king and people; one of these (20–1) is made up of a prayer before battle, and a song of rejoicing after victory; another pair of companion psalms (60, 108) uses twice over the same material as part of a hymn of defeat and a hymn of victory. There is again a Royal Marriage Hymn, celebrating a union of some king of Israel, apparently with a Tyrian princess: it is natural to find a strophe devoted to the bridegroom, and its antistrophe to the bride. Every people has its National Anthem: for Israel the Book of Psalms provides four National Hymns, suggestive of four stages in the history of Israel. The National Hymn of the Wilderness (136) has the primitive structure of single recitative lines alternating with the choral shout — its recital is of the simple wonders of the wilderness, and its final triumph is over Sihon king of the Amorites and Og the king of Bashan. The National Hymn of the Promised Land is in simple couplets, and its history extends just so far as the taking the possessions of the nations; unbroken joy reigns throughout, and the prominent topics are Egypt and Canaan, and Joseph the historic link between the two. Of a very different order is the Hymn of the Kingdom of Judah. Psalm 78 is one of the most elaborate of sacred lyrics; after a long introduction announcing the 'parable' of God's ways with his people, the keynote is struck in the defection of the northern tribes, presented under the image of warriors in all their armour deserting on the field of battle: from this point there is the characteristic Hebrew rhythm of the pendulum swing, and successive strophes alternate between God's wondrous dealings with his people and Israel's passive unfaithfulness, until the final awakening of Divine power is a rejection of Joseph, and a fresh call of Judah to be the chosen people. The matter of this poem seems to be worked up afresh for a National Hymn of the Captivity (106); there is the same pendulum alternation, with a bias towards rebellion and disaster, until the significance becomes clear in a prayer for deliverance from captivity.

For his mercy endureth for ever:

Other psalms, it is obvious, belong to Divine worship. Besides Occasional Anthems there are the general Festal Hymns: these seem to have always for their theme the celebration of Jehovah as the creator and ruler of all the earth, as well as the special protector of his own people. Usually their structure is a simple alternation between ejaculations of praise and the matter on which this praise is founded. Psalm 93 is a variation from this, the theme of Jehovah's immovable throne being interrupted by a pictorial illustration:

The floods have lifted up, O LORD,
The floods have lifted up their voice;
The floods lift up their waves:

Above the voices of many waters,
The mighty breakers of the sea,
The LORD on high is mighty.

The Festal Hymn extends itself into the Festal Anthem by the linking together of successive psalms: such is the conclusion of the psalter where, through five poems of the biblical numbering, is sustained an antiphony of two choruses, one calling on all things to join in praise, one bringing matter for rejoicing, until both unite in the line —

Let every thing that hath breath praise the LORD.

With the Festal Hymn we may rank the Votive Hymn: in biblical poetry a vow is always performed as a personal merged in a general thanksgiving. And this is extended into a Votive Anthem in the 'Egyptian Hallel' (113–8), portions of which constituted the special hymns of the great feasts. So far we have had hymns of praise only. But other moods of the soul find expression in the ritual of the psalter — supplication, confession of faith, penitence, devout aspiration. As a climax to this type of composition, we find in several cases varying moods of worship united in the same poem without links of connection: we thus have a complete liturgy within the limits of a single psalm.

National and ecclesiastical ritual meet in psalm 68. This is one of the masterpieces of the world's lyrics; even in the diluted English version it is difficult to read this mighty marching song without the feet longing to tramp and the hands to wave. This poem may be regarded as the Hebrew Te Deum. Originally no doubt composed for some specific occasion, its terms are nevertheless so general that it might serve for any triumphant celebration. It is a Processional Hymn, and it breathes the spirit of triumphal procession into its survey of past, present, and future. Its opening is to recall the primitive processional pomp of the ark in its wilderness journeys:

> Let God arise, let his enemies be scattered;
> Let them also that hate him flee before him.

The past is the procession of Jehovah through the wilderness, with Sinai trembling at his presence, while his delivered people grow into prosperous families, and the gracious rain of manna plentifully provides for their weary journeyings. The conquest is a triumphal march from Bashan to Zion: Jehovah gives the word of advance, and in the next line women's voices are crying the tidings of victory. If there be stages in this conquest, snatches of victory songs are the only tokens, and the whole past becomes one stride of advance —

> Sinai is in the sanctuary.

There is now a partial change of rhythm; God appears as a God of the present moment, daily bearing his people's burdens; and the procession of the day is pictured — singers, dancers, the tribes in their order of march. The future is seen as a procession of the nations, under their symbolic forms hastening to the temple of the God who has scattered the people that delight in war. And the final note echoes the conception of Moses' Song by which the God of Israel is seen riding in triumphal procession in the heavens on high, with the excellency of the skies for his attendant pomp.

If the contents of a literary work may be analysed according to their mass, then the leading topic of the Book of Psalms is trouble and its relief. Here a difficult question of interpretation arises. In these psalms of trouble who suffers, and who is it that speaks? Some, influenced by the traditional title of the book, are content to answer, David. Other interpreters show a special tendency to see in every possible case the nation of Israel as the speaker in the monologues of sacred poetry. Others again watch for the most minute circumstances from which they can infer the historic surroundings of the particular psalms. Of course, there are cases in which any one of these treatments may be justified. I see no difficulty in believing that we have among the psalms some of the actual compositions of David, however modified and enlarged by the oral tradition of singers and Levites through which they have come down. Some psalms are obviously national: more especially the elegies that mourn over Jerusalem in ruins, or bewail fallen Israel under the image of its national emblem the Vine (80). Again, there are psalms the whole style and contents of which proclaim them to be 'Occasional Poems.' I have gone further than most editors in recognising, not only the Sennacherib psalms, but also those connected with the inauguration of Jerusalem by David; I believe we know all that happened on that great historic occasion — what was sung six paces from the house of Obed-Edom, what at the foot of the hill and again in front of the gates, in the tabernacle when the ark rested, and at the close of the proceedings in the palace of King David. But these elegies and occasional poems make distinct species: for the psalms of trouble taken as a whole I must — at the risk, I fear, of alienating some of my readers — express the opinion that it is a mistaken expenditure of exegetical energy to investigate authorship and historic surroundings. I reckon it amongst the impediments to the study of literature that it is overshadowed by the more popular studies of history and biography, with the result that the personality of an author and circumstances of actual life are forever being allowed to interpose between a creative poem and the mind of the reader. To illustrate from a different side of literature: these individual interpretations of the psalms make one think of the bitter complaints made by dramatists of real life from Ben Jonson downward, to the effect that people persist in seeing clever personal allusions in what they intended as general sketches of life and character. So in regard to the psalms: there are not sufficient materials for determining their authorship — witness the varying results of the editors; more than this, if we could discover with certainty the external circumstances which produced them, the information would come as so much limitation to their force and beauty. The psalms are not versified diaries of the saints: every line proclaims them the work of poets — not the less saints for being poets — who have followed the natural instinct of poetry to generalise and idealise everything it touches. To take one amongst many indications. It is the rule, and not an exception, in these psalms to find crowded together expressions of pining, wasting away and bodily pain, and again expressions which tell of actual foes and threatening armies. No doubt it is a possibility that this combination of internal and external trouble might distinguish a single individual situation, but when this is found to characterise psalm after psalm, every one must read it as evidence of the generalised pictures they present. What the psalms give us is neither items of personal experience nor chapters of contemporary history, but an ideal conception of suffering and its relief in the economy of Divine mercy. And devotion, not less than poetry, is the gainer by this poetic interpretation of biblical poetry. If I could know with positive certainty that the third psalm was wrung out of David by the agony of the flight from Absalom, it would present itself to my mind as less beautiful than it does at present, when the simple significance of its words brings home to us a weary sense of oppression, tempered only by the thought of a protecting God who will hear and answer, changed with the awakening from sleep to a freshness and relief that brings new vigou to encounter untold dangers — in a word, the daily drama of weariness and God-given refreshment that every succession of night and morning may bring to the devout soul. Into such a poem the reader may, if he pleases, read the story of David; he may equally read into it his own personal experience, and that of every similar case. For, though the world is slow to believe it, idealism is the deepest realism: it is the poetry unlimited by personal facts that has points of contact with the imagination and experience of each individual reader.

In some psalms of this order it is the deliverance that is made the prominent topic. Such is the magnificent ode that constitutes the eighteenth psalm, presented to us in the historical books as David's Song of Victory: not, it is to be observed, the celebration of any particular victory, but of the victorious mercies of a whole lifetime. It opens with a burst of exuberant joy; then describes in general terms a desperate crisis; then overflows with imagery of all nature shaken to its foundations, as God hastens to the relief of the sufferer. The deliverance itself widens to the cause that has triumphed in the mercy shown to its representative.

> With the merciful thou wilt show thyself merciful:
> With the perfect man thou wilt show thyself perfect.

There is further broadening to confidence for the future of the speaker and the cause of right: and another burst of exuberant praise brings the ode to a close. The Ode of the Redeemed (107) presents in succession four different types of trouble, accompanying each with its double refrain, the cry of trouble and the shout of triumph:

then changing to the pendulum rhythm, the ode celebrates alternately the providence that brings down and that raises up, until the final note is reached in the wisdom that recognises the law of right living. As a contrast to these poems may be noted those in which the relief found is only fresh trust in God. An example is the magnificent seventy-seventh psalm. Here the speaker failing to find any cessation of his trouble sets himself to recall memories of God's doings in the past. The memory that presents itself is that of Israel at the Red Sea, blocked in between the waters and the pursuing foe: clouds and tempests darken the scene, and when they have lifted, the closed path of salvation is seen leading through the very sea itself, and over this miraculous way the persecuted people may pass with the security of the shepherd and his sheep. And there are some psalms of trouble in which no relief at all is found. The psalter contains one elegy (88) of a stricken life: cut off at birth from lover and friend, with no future but the dark land of forgetfulness, no variation of misery except the daily spreading forth of the hands to a God who hideth his face.

There is one distinct section of the psalter in which trouble seems to seek relief by unburdening itself in outpourings of denunciation and cursing. These psalms have been a trouble to many devout readers. For my own part, I do not feel the difficulty. Hate, as Spenser's allegory reminds us, is the twin of love: no piety can be robust that is incapable of hating. The precious lesson learned by the modern religious spirit is the power of separating sin and the sinner; of hating evil as Christ would hate it, and yet yearning to recover the fellow creature who has been entangled in it. To the mind of the ancient psalmist this was an impossible distinction: his enemies were the enemies of God and all goodness. Psalms of this description may still remain as a part of our books of devotion, but their expressions must be translated from the concrete into the abstract: when they can be read as embodiments of the evil that is in the world the fierceness of their language will be a moral tonic. I therefore see no need to understand such poems as necessarily spoken by the personified nation. It is, however, to be noted that most of them show a union of different moods that assimilates them to the liturgies, and I have differentiated them as litanies of oppression rather than as monologues of experience.

But the most characteristic among the psalms of trouble and relief are those which seek a dramatic mode of expression. Dramatic form implies, not only association with the personality of an imaginary speaker, but also a change in the surroundings amidst which he speaks; it is not enough that he should tell how he was afflicted and the affliction ceased, but the present distress must draw out his utterance, and the sudden change of circumstances must convert his woe into rejoicing. A large and interesting group of psalms fall under this general description: each presents the transition of a dramatic plot within the limits of a lyric poem. Some of these dramatic psalms are very simple. The sixth opens with such words of woe that it has been reckoned amongst the penitential psalms; the distress is maintained through two stanzas, but with the third stanza —

> Depart from me, all ye workers of iniquity;
> For the LORD hath heard the voice of my weeping —

we catch the sudden deliverance, in the joy of which the speaker separates himself forever from the enemies of God. For an example of the elaborateness to which the lyric dramatisation of trouble can be carried, the reader should study the famous twenty-second psalm. The first of its long-drawn-out sections is impressive with its contrast of the holy God, enthroned on the praises of the fathers, and the helpless sufferer, a worm and no man, laughed to scorn as forsaken of his God, yet with no resource but this God on whom he has been cast from his mother's womb. With the second section the crisis intensifies: images of internal and external trouble become entangled. He is poured out like water; his heart is melted in the midst of his bowels; his strength is dried up like a potsherd; his tongue cleaveth to his jaws; all his bones are out of joint. Foes bellow round him like bulls of Bashan; like wild dogs they are flying at his hands and feet. Vividness increases: he is stripped naked and can count his bones; the foes are staring with greedy expectancy upon his helpless frame; his garments are being divided by lot, the agony point is reached in a cry for dear life:

> Deliver my soul from the sword;
> My darling from the power of the dog;
> Save me from the lion's mouth —
> YEA, FROM THE HORNS OF THE WILD-OXEN THOU HAST ANSWERED ME!

In the very middle of a sentence has come this salvation in extremity; and the third section extends itself to its due length with overflow of grateful joy, in which all are to unite, high and low, strong and feeble, the very dying themselves and the generation that is to come.

The topic of trouble and relief merges in that which is the dominant thought of all Old Testament literature — the judgment, the everlasting conflict daily going on between good and evil, in which evil is doomed. It is the counterpart of our modern providence; but to the Hebrew prophets the working of the universe was not so much a scheme of things, with beauty of design, as an irresistible Power at work for the confusion of evil doing. The great difficulty of life to ancient thinkers — the prosperity of the wicked — is reviewed in one psalm (37) in a tone of meditative faith; another (49) presents as a 'parable' of life judgment in the form of the grave, sweeping away the wicked in the midst of their security, and leaving the faithful to triumph over their fall. Other psalms are appeals for judgment — or they are expressions of confidence in the coming vindication of the righteous and the disclosure of a God that judgeth in the world. In other cases psalms of judgment rise into the region of vision. Such is the brief rhapsody (14) which presents a corruption so utter as to draw the astonishment of Deity itself: the amazement of heaven becomes felt on earth in a panic that seizes the ranks of the ungodly. One psalm with great boldness presents God judging in the congregation of gods: high potences like the 'sons of God' in Job, mystic rulers of the universe, are convicted of laxity which has left the evil of earth unchecked; nay more, they are degraded from their spiritual rank:

> I said, ye are gods,
> And all of you sons of the Most High;
> Nevertheless ye shall die like men,
> And fall like one of the princes.

Supreme among the visions of judgment is the fiftieth psalm. Its prelude presents God flashing forth out of the perfect beauty of Zion in a call to judgment: fire and tempest fringe round the judge, heaven and earth make the circle of spectators, while in the presence are marshalled the covenanted saints on the one side and opposite them the wicked. In elaborate addresses, antistrophically the counterparts each of the other, the Divine judge lifts his faithful people's thoughts to a higher conception of sacrifice, charges the wicked to lay a foundation of right living before they take his covenant in their mouth. Not even the Book of Psalms can rise higher than the conclusion of this vision:

> Whoso offereth the sacrifice of thanksgiving glorifieth me;
> And to him that ordereth his conversation aright will I show the salvation of God.

These are the broader divisions of subject-matter that may be traced in the Hebrew psalter. For further discussion of these sacred poems this is not the place. The change from Judaism to Christianity is immense, but it is a change that has had no influence on the Book of Psalms: the modern Christian turns to it as naturally as the ancient Hebrew. It is safe to predict that, however much mankind may alter the articles of its belief, the Hebrew psalms will not cease to furnish matter for liturgy and stimulus to private devotion. It is less important, but not less true, to add that the student of literature will never be able to pass over the Book of Psalms if he is to investigate in the most promising of all fields the foundation principles of lyric poetry.

Lamentations

This is an Acrostic Dirge, rhapsodic in character, over the Fall of Jerusalem. Though cast in literary forms foreign to the modern reader, the poem will be found, when these are grasped, to be of great beauty and pathos.

The effect of such a work rests in part upon the Hebrew and oriental custom of professional mourning, which appears (for example) in such passages of the Bible as Matthew ix. 23, Jeremiah ix. 17. In modern life it seems natural for us to have our most solemn devotion led by a professional choir, often with intricate elaborations of counterpoint and fugue; so to the Hebrews it seemed natural to look to professional musicians for the expression of their sorrow or sense of bereavement. The difference is only one of national custom.

With this professional mourning an elegiac or dirge rhythm became recognised, though most of the poems entitled by modern editors 'elegies' in the biblical collection are not examples of the rhythm so called. This striking dirge rhythm may be represented by the characteristic refrain of David's Lament over Jonathan:

How are the mighty <> fallen!

Instead of the equal parallelism which is the staple of biblical poetry in general, the dirge rhythm implies a union of two members, the second of which is shorter or in some way weaker than the first. The effect is something like the crescendo with diminuendo of our music (<>): there is enough to suggest parallelism, with a perpetual falling short, a succession of efforts that plaintively die away. In the text of this edition this effect is suggested by printing the two unequal members in one poetic line, with a gap between them. It will be understood that these gaps are not meant to correspond with the break in the original; nor will the second part in all cases be weaker than the first. In a lengthy poem there is no need for such fixity of form; enough will be done to indicate the prevailing rhythm, and delivery must make the rest conform to the pattern.

These (double) dirge lines are united in triplets or couplets, with a change in two places to ordinary parallelism; all such changes are significant. They are as a further effect bound together by acrostic bonds. The lamentation is necessarily, from its subject, a late poem; and in later literature, when written compositions have long prevailed over oral poetry, alphabetical structure becomes a new artificial intricacy, replacing or assisting the rhythmic intricacies originally impressed upon poetry by the evolutions of the dance. Of the five 'Lamentations' the first has triplets, each commencing with initial letters in the ordinary order of the Hebrew alphabet; the second has the same, with a slight variation in order of letters; the third and central poem gives acrostic initials to each line of the triplet; the fourth has only couplets of dirge rhythm, with acrostic initials only for each couplet; number five drops acrostic structure and dirge rhythm both. Except for the variation in order of initial letters (in Lamentations II, III, IV) these acrostic effects will be found to tally with changes in the general movement.

I have described this Dirge as 'rhapsodic': it shares the characteristic of the poems for which in this work and elsewhere I have proposed the name 'rhapsodies' — the power of passing rapidly from one to another of the elementary literary forms (epic, lyric, dramatic), the effect of the whole being dramatic realisation. The lyric character of the poem makes this the easier. The natural function of lyric is meditation: but it has the power, without ceasing to be meditation, of approaching at any point the epic function of description, or of becoming presentative, the meditation associating itself with the personality of some speaker. A great part of the effect of this poem depends upon following these variations between abstract meditation, description, and dramatic monologue. The lyric effect is paramount throughout: not only the metre, but also the movement which rises musically from the beginning to the middle, and from the centre sinks gradually, until in its latest section it wholly changes its character. Alike the rhythm of each line, and the progression of thought through the whole poem, has the swell and the dying fall of the Wail.

To realise all these effects working together. The Dirge opens, in acrostic triplets of dirge rhythm, with meditative description. A silent picture of desolation is elaborated: a late populous city sitting solitary; the ways of Zion mourning; the gates desolate; priests sighing, virgins afflicted, princes wandering like pastureless beasts: all majesty departed from the daughter of Zion. A close parallel is the opening of Jeremiah's Rhapsody of the Drought (xiv. 1):

> Judah mourneth, and the gates thereof languish; they sit in black upon the ground; and the cry of Jerusalem is gone up.
> And their nobles send their little ones to the waters: they come to the pits, and find no water; they return with their vessels empty: they are ashamed and confounded, and cover their heads.
>
> Because of the ground which is chapt, for that no rain hath been in the land, the plowmen are ashamed, they cover their heads.
> Yea, the hind also in the field calveth, and forsaketh her young, because there is no grass. And the wild asses stand on the bare heights, they pant for air like jackals; their eyes fail, because there is no herbage.

At letter G the movement begins to rise, description passing smoothly into pure meditation: the picture becomes animate with thoughts of Jerusalem's former splendour and Jerusalem's sin, which enhance the impression of misery. As the movement steadily rises, meditation is getting nearer and nearer to speech: at first broken sentences interrupt, at last (letter M) JERUSALEM breaks into a long wail with the words—

> Is it nothing to you all ye that pass by?

This lasts to the end of the first poem.

With Lamentation II the PROPHET seems to come into the Dirge: at first in silent meditation — the description of Lamentation I, only viewed from a personal standpoint but at letter L the change of pronouns presents the PROPHET as breaking into speech, and addressing his lamentations to the prostrate Jerusalem. At letter P he is enumerating the taunts of the foe: to express these the rhythm changes for a while to couplets of ordinary parallelism; until the MOURNING PEOPLE break into speech, and the triplets of dirge rhythm are resumed, the wail of the people reaching a climax in the characteristic phrase of Jeremiah, "Terrors on every side."

The whole movement reaches its central phase in Lamentation III, and the acrostic bonds multiply threefold. There is a rise in the movement as the PROPHET speaks of himself, innocent, yet sharing the common misery. We are reminded of the prophet's pleading and suffering in the Rhapsody of the Drought. At letter H the movement has reached its central height, and this is strongly marked by a note of hope in repentance: in the stanzas of this much quoted passage the highest plane of emotion and thought is maintained.

It is of the LORD's mercies that we are not consumed, because his compassions fail not.
They are new every morning; great is thy faithfulness.
The LORD is my portion, saith my soul; therefore will I hope in him.

The LORD is good unto them that wait for him, to the soul that seeketh him.
It is good that a man should hope and quietly wait for the salvation of the LORD.
It is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth.

For the Lord will not cast off for ever.
For though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies.
For he doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men.

Then the movement begins to sink again: through the Prophet's speech from P to Z hope is more and more overcome by the weight of misery.

With Lamentation IV the Dirge makes a sudden drop: triplets give place to couplets, and the Prophet disappears; silent picturing of hopeless misery succeeds until at letter R the MOURNING PEOPLE give it voice. In the last two stanzas there is a turn in the thought: the lowest depth has been reached by Israel, it will now be the turn of the scoffing rival to suffer, and the cup shall pass through unto the daughter of Edom. This proves a transition stage, so that with the fifth Lamentation the poem wholly changes its character: the rhythm has become that of ordinary parallelism, acrostic structure vanishes, and the Dirge has changed to an Appeal for Judgment on the persecutors of God's people.

The Song of Songs

The consideration of this poem introduces a literary type to which the term 'Idyl' is applied. The word is not easy to define. It first appears in literary history in connection with the late school of Greek poetry represented to modern readers chiefly by Theocritus, and the kind of composition which thus arose when the poetry of Europe, having exhausted its primary impulses, found a new starting point in external nature from the open air shepherd life of Sicily. The Sicilian songs were the source of the long pastoral tradition which has run through Roman and modern literatures; and in association with such arcadian scenes the term 'idyllic' seems especially appropriate. If we go to etymology for light on the word 'idyl,' we are met by a difficulty. It is a diminutive of the Greek word eidos, and eidos is a 'form' or 'kind' of literature.* But what is the force of the diminutive? That it is partly intended to convey the fragmentary and miscellaneous character of the poems is suggested by the application to them of another term — 'eclogues,' Pliny * using the words 'idyls' and 'eclogues' as synonymous. Now the word 'eclogues' is the exact Greek equivalent of the English word 'selections,' and is the term used by the Greek for what we should call 'elegant extracts.' But the diminutive term seems also to suggest the homely matter of idyl poetry, the simplicity of theme that contrasts with the grandeur supposed to be proper for the forms of epic, lyric, and dramatic. The use of a diminutive term, and its double suggestiveness, may fairly be paralleled by a modern poet's application of the word 'trifles' to his compositions. It is true that different ages have different ideas as to what is grand and what is trifling. Usage however seems to indicate that idyl poetry treats, not war, nor heroic actions, nor even love as an enthralling passion, but the domestic details of shepherd life, love as a social incident, popular superstitions such as witchcraft. To say then that where the word 'idyl' is used an antithesis is intended between homely and heroic — this is the nearest approach we can make to a definition; and the adjective 'idyllic' will suggest perfection on its side of simplicity. Two modern usages of the term are interesting. Tennyson has made a contribution to Arthurian epic. But as he designed independent episodes rather than a continuous poem, and as he was to mingle the heroic achievements of Arthur and his knights with the treatment of love and domestic relations, he had a double claim to entitle his poem Idyls of the King. Again, Wagner has given us in his Siegfried a romantic epic of ponderous grandeur. But when he takes the themes of this opera and intermingles them with a traditional cradle song to make a serenade for his wife in honour of their infant child the exquisite morsel is appropriately named The Siegfried Idyl.

* The commonly received explanation of idyls as 'little pictures' seems to me to have nothing in its favour. It is not clear that eidos could mean picture; still less clear that 'little pictures' would be sufficiently descriptive of the poems to constitute a name for them.

An interesting etymology is offered by Mr. G. W. Machail in an article on Theocritus. "The name idyl, which seems to have been coined for this specific purpose, is a diminutive from a word which, originally signifying visible shape or semblance, took in later Greek, like its Latin equivalent species, the senses of (1) physical beauty, (2) abstract form, and (3) by a curious late reversion from the abstract to the concrete, any rare or costly kind of merchandise, the sense preserved in the English word spice. The book of idyls might be thought of then as a collection of select masterpieces of workmanship on a small scale: a casket of finely wrought jewels one might say . . . or of spices remarkable for their rarity and richness."

One point of general importance appears from the above discussion. The term 'idyl' is descriptive of the matter of a poem: as to form it suggests nothing beyond fragmentariness or brevity. As a fact, the idyls of Theocritus must be classified under various headings. Most of them are amœbæan dialogue; in the Feast of Adonis the dialogue amounts to a complete dramatic scene, the visit being fully presented from its commencement to its conclusion. The poem on The Sorceress is a lyric song with a refrain; Virgil's imitation of it makes a dramatic lyric, since the incantation is carried forward to its success in the return of the lover. The Hylas of Theocritus is an epic narrative. Other of his idyls are combinations of more than one literary form: number twenty-two is an epic of Castor and Pollux, breaking into dramatic dialogue in the middle; number eighteen is a bridal song, led up to by the poet's narrative introduction. It appears then that a collection of idyls will embrace poems of varied literary forms, and that a single one of such poems may pass in its course from one form to another. Among the stories of Bible History are to be found such narrative idyls as the Wooing of Rebekah, Samson and the Woman of Timnah (above, pages 22, 236); the Story of Esther (page 378) hovers between history and idyl; while the Story of Ruth and the apocryphal Story of Tobit (pages 245, 369) are supreme types of the narrative idyl. And the poem now under consideration is sufficiently elaborate in its structure to exhibit dramatic, epic, and lyric in combination.†

The Song of Songs, commonly known as Solomon's Song, is here presented as a lyric idyl. It is of unusual importance to determine the exact technical form of this work, for upon its correct classification will depend, not only lesser details, but the interpretation of the very story which the poem is to convey. And for arriving at the true classification we have to fall back upon general considerations, since there is nothing else in Hebrew literature with which comparison can be made.

The poem is on the face of it dramatic: there is both dialogue, and a story underlying the dialogue. From this fact the majority of commentators have jumped to the conclusion that Solomon's Song is a drama: ignoring the possibilities of interpretation that lie in the wide range of the lyric idyl. It must be remembered that lyric poetry is the most elastic medium of literature: a lyric poem may pass to and fro between epic description and dialogue presentation and purely lyric meditation, without at any point ceasing to be lyric. A careful analyst will have noticed this in poetry, and to the most popular mind it is familiar how the chorus of an oratorio may now give forth description, and now take up the personality of parties in the story in order to express their triumph or despair. It is clear then that those who assume the idea of complete drama, and those on the other hand who keep their minds open to the wider possibilities of the lyric idyl, will have very different instruments of interpretation which they can bring to bear upon a given poem. In particular, there are two points of difference between drama and lyric idyl which will be fundamental to interpretation.

In a drama every portion must be spoken by a definite personage of the story (or a group of personages), and in a definite scene. In lyric poetry, even where this is cast in dialogue, the poet may himself break in upon the dialogue with his reflections; or absolute description, not connected with any personal speaker, may come in at any point. The refrains so common in all lyric poetry are usually parenthetic, and so disconnected from the dialogue or narrative at the points at which they occur. In Deborah's Song the description —

> Then the people of the LORD went down to the gates — is interrupted by the performers momentarily apostrophising one another —

> Men — Awake, awake, Deborah, > Awake, awake, utter a song: —
>
> Women — Arise, Barak,
> And lead thy captivity captive, etc.

In Theocritus we have seen how epic and dramatic may mingle in the same poem. And in the Indian poem so exquisitely translated by Sir Edwin Arnold under the title The Indian Song of Songs, besides snatches of narrative, the poet Jayadev is continually breaking in by name to make religious application of points reached in the dialogue of the personages in the story. In analysing the Hebrew poem then we must be prepared to find passages not forming part of the dialogue, but which are the ministrel's refrains breaking up his poem into parts, or pieces of epic description introducing a change of scene.

There is another difference between dramatic and lyric, still more important for its bearing upon interpretation. From the very nature of drama it follows that the details of incident underlying the words of the speeches must follow the order of time. Drama instead of narrating actually presents a story: and hence dramatic action can never go back. The corresponding lyric forms merely meditate upon the incidents, however they may use dramatic dialogue to make the meditation vivid: they can therefore refer to the different parts of the story in any order, passing from the later to the earlier, without any restriction as to order of time. The Song of Moses and Miriam commences with the complete triumph of Jehovah over the hosts of Egypt: half the song is over before the incident that is earliest in time appears — the enemy's boastful pursuit. Those then who assume that Solomon's Song must be a drama burden themselves with the restriction of making the sequence of details in the poem tally with sequence of time.

It is not surprising that a work of literature should give up different senses to those who bring to bear upon it such different instruments of interpretation. Those who hold that Solomon's Song is a drama find the plot of that drama to consist in a struggle between King Solomon and a humble shepherd wooer for the love of the fair Shulammite woman, Solomon in the end giving way, and the heroine and her humble wooer becoming united. To me this result seems to be wrung out of the words of the poem with a good deal of straining. On the other hand, if we allow the work the wider range of lyric idyls, there needs no straining of interpretation to arrive at a story which is certainly not less interesting than the other. For by this interpretation we are able to identify the humble lover with Solomon himself. The story becomes this. King Solomon with a courtly retinue, visiting the royal vineyards upon Mount Lebanon, comes by surprise upon the fair Shulammite. She flies from them. Solomon visits her in the disguise of a shepherd, and so wins her love. He then comes in all his royal state, and calls upon her to leave Lebanon and become his queen. They are in the act of being wedded in the royal palace when the poem opens.

This, which is the story as a whole, is brought out for us in seven idyls, each independent, all founded on the one story, but making their reference to different parts of it as these occur to the minds of the speakers, without the limitation to order of succession that would be implied in dramatic presentation. The first song depicts the Wedding Day: the bride — with her bridesmaids, the 'daughters of Jerusalem' — is approaching the palace, Solomon leading her. Then there is the ceremony of lifting the bride across the threshold. The new queen, elevated to a throne from a country life, apologises gracefully for her homeliness to the company of city-bred bridesmaids. Then there follow confidences between husband and wife; later, the procession is passing from the banqueting hall to the bridal chamber. The wedding day has been presented in its successive moments; and now the minstrel's refrain bids all leave the lovers to their repose.

The second idyl may be said to go back in time, for it takes the form of the Bride's Reminiscences of the Courtship. She describes a visit to her of her lover in the fair spring time, and how in the midst of his sweet words the harsh voices of her brothers broke in upon them, with the cry that the foxes were in the vineyard. Again, after the intervention of a refrain, the bride tells a simple dream of losing her lover and finding him again. Some snatch of refrain here, as always, separates one idyl from another.

From the wedding scene with which we opened we have, in the third idyl, gone back in time to the Day of Betrothal, which is here presented in great particularity. Already the heroine has been won by the lover in his disguise, but now Solomon is to visit the Shulammite in state. The epic description of which I have spoken — or, if the reader prefers, such an impersonal 'chorus' as in oratorio is used to carry on narrative — paints the journey of the king in the sumptuous chariot, with guards because of terrors in the night journey through the wilderness. The dialogue that follows commences with Solomon's ravishment at the charms of his love; he invites her to leave the rugged Lebanon, the actual proposal of marriage being veiled under a symbol of maidenhood — a garden shut up. With the use of the same symbolism the Shulammite speaks her assent; and the poet breaks in with his blessing:

> Eat, O friends,
> Drink, yea, drink abundantly of love.

The next idyl presents again a dream, this time A Troubled Dream of the Bride. Her lover comes in the night season; and while she pauses a moment to adjust her dress, and dip her fingers in the myrrh, she loses him, and wanders forth to find him, being beaten and insulted by the watch. With the fanciful incongruity that is so delightful in dream movement she finds herself, without surprise, accosting the chorus of bridesmaids, and talking of her lover: in the rapturous description of his charms the trouble of the dream passes off like a cloud, and the end is the happy confidence which leads up to the triumphant refrain.

The fifth of these songs is wholly spoken by the royal bridegroom. It is a passionate Meditation on the charms of his Bride. Incidentally it introduces, in an important passage to which I shall recur, the occasion of his first meeting the fair Shulammite.

The two concluding idyls might be called, in modern phrase, the close of the honeymoon. The first of them is spoken by the bride to her husband. Amid all the splendour of the royal palace she finds herself longing for her country home on Lebanon, and appeals to her husband that they may visit it together and renew their love there. The last of the songs carries out this purpose. A morsel of description, so phrased as to read like a brief echo of the longer description in the former song, introduces the pair arriving together from their wilderness journey. The talk that follows in the home scene is just what would be natural. They recognise the very spot where the king and his court came by surprise upon the startled maiden. They speak sweet words of love, and of its foe jealousy. The bride recalls riddling speeches of maidenhood and marriage spoken to her when she was too much of a child to understand them; all is intelligible now. Finally, in a quaint figure, she renews her devotion to her husband: king Solomon has been the 'landlord' of her home, he shall also be the landlord of her heart. But royal personages cannot be left long to such solitary delights; hence the voices of the escort are soon heard: these are a signal for one more embrace, and the poem ends.

Besides this general clue as to the mode in which the different parts of the story are brought before us it is well that, before commencing the text, the reader should have his attention drawn to a few passages which are more or less peculiar in their form. I have already indicated that in places the dialogue gives way to description, or to the poet's apostrophes or refrains. These passages are in the present edition distinguished by italic type. But there are two sections of the poem which stand in need of more explanation.

The first of these occurs in the fifth song. The portions of the song preceding and following this passage are wholly occupied with the king's rapturous meditation on his bride. As part of this meditation he has said:

> There are threescore queens,
> And fourscore concubines,
> And virgins without number:
> My dove, my undefiled, is but one;
> She is the only one of her mother;
> She is the pure one of her that bare her.
> The daughters saw her, and called her blessed;
> Yea, the queens and concubines, and they praised her.

Then follow lines which may well express the words of praise from the royal party when they came by surprise upon the beautiful Shulammite:

> Who is she that looketh forth as the morning,
> Fair as the moon, pure as the sun,
> Terrible as an army with banners?

The six lines that succeed express the feelings — the unspoken feelings — of the Shulammite as the gaze of the royal party is fastened upon her:

> I went down into the garden of nuts,
> To see the green plants of the valley,
> To see whether the vine budded,

And the pomegranates were in flower:
Or ever I was aware, my soul set me
Among the chariots of my princely people.

Next comes a couplet, which may or may not have been spoken, conveying the longing of the courtiers to gaze longer upon the beauty who was fleeing from them.

Return, return, O Shulammite, Return, return, that we may look upon thee.

Another couplet, which again may or may not have been spoken, presents the maiden as uncomfortable under this courtly gaze:

Why will ye look upon the Shulammite,
As upon the dance of Mahanaim?

Then the king's meditation continues:

How beautiful are thy feet in sandals, etc.

We have here, not an actual dialogue between two parties, but the form of dialogue thrown over the succession of feelings of the respective parties as they face one another; and the whole is not part of a dramatic scene occurring at the moment, but a reminiscence. The effect may be styled a dramatised reminiscence.*

The same suggestion of dramatised reminiscence covers another passage.

SHE

Tell me, O thou whom my soul loveth,
Where thou feedest thy flock,
Where thou makest it to rest at noon:
For why should I be as one that wandereth
Beside the flocks of thy companions?

HE

If thou know not, O thou fairest among women,
Go thy way forth by the footsteps of the flock,
And feed thy kids beside the shepherds' tents.

It is from this exchange of speeches more than from anything else that we catch what I have presented above as one of the elements of the story, how that Solomon, after the Shulammite had fled from the approach of the royal party, courted her in the disguise of a shepherd. She naturally wondered who this shepherd could be, so different from all she had known; he, equally naturally, had sought to put off her questionings with vague answers which meant nothing. All this is perfectly natural in a love idyl; the sole difficulty is the place at which this passage occurs. It is found in the first song of the wedding day; what immediately precedes is the address to the bridesmaids, what follows is evidently the procession from the banqueting hall to the bedchamber. It will be admitted that nothing could be more natural than that the first whispered confidence between the royal pair, who have that moment been wedded in a palace, should be a reminiscence of the courtship made under such different surroundings. No one would have felt any difficulty about the passage if the first speech had been introduced with the words — "Do you remember how I asked —," and the second with the words — "And do you remember how I answered —." But it is surely requiring the reader to assume very little when we claim that the reminiscence is not introduced in that formal and prosaic manner, but is dramatically couched in the very words spoken on the former occasion. And it confirms this interpretation of the passage that a similar dramatised reminiscence has been shown to occur in another of the songs, where the context makes the form unmistakable.

* It is worth noting that the metrical form of this dramatised reminiscence breaks the metrical uniformity of the idyl as a whole. See below, page 1529.

In reference to the matter of Solomon's Song, it must be pronounced a poem of pure conjugal love. However difficult it may be to us to reconcile the ideas of polygamy and purity, the harmony between these is distinctly a part of the poem.

> There are threescore queens,
> And fourscore concubines,
> And virgins without number:
> My dove, my undefiled is but one;
> She is the only one of her mother;
> She is the pure one of her that bare her.

In various passages of the songs many readers are shocked at the passionate warmth of language, and lack of all reserve, which allows a poet to catalogue the bodily charms of his mistress, and dwell upon each with intensity of expression. It may be admitted that the poet of the Idyls belongs to a more warmly amorous race than his English readers. But such passages as I have in mind rest for their effect, not so much upon points of racial difference, as upon a special characteristic of poetic style of wide application in oriental poetry. I refer to the fact that, whereas modern poetry depends for intensity of effect chiefly upon imagery, oriental poetry combines with imagery the very different device of symbolism.

Both imagery and symbolism rest upon comparison: some external idea is imported to be compared with a detail in the positive description. But imagery appeals to the imagination, and uses ideas which make pictures; symbolism does not appeal to the pictorial sense at all, but rather to some analytic faculty, or conventional association of ideas. Thus with the symbols regularly used in Solomon's Song for all that has to do with the sexual relations — the symbol of the vineyard, of the garden shut up and the fountain sealed, the antithesis of the wall for chastity and the door for facility of disposition, the symbolic sport of the roe amongst the lilies or upon the 'mountains of separation': in all these cases there is no realism, but its opposite, conventional substitutes for vivid expressions. Such symbols are as widely removed from realistic images as a telegraph code is removed from onomatopœia.

The principle is not less true in application to the symbols of particular passages: these rest, not on pictorial effect, but on the ingenuity of the comparison, or on reference to standards of value. "His head is as the most fine gold": how little of picture there is in this is seen in the next line which speaks of bushy locks black as a raven. An English poem could not compare the heroine's nose to "the tower of Lebanon which looketh toward Damascus": modern realism would seize upon the hugeness of a tower, and turn the effect to the farcical; the less literal imagination of the east is at leisure to catch the suggestion of a stateliness giving centre and direction to a landscape in the way the nose serves as centre and index to the countenance. Similar comment may be made upon the comparison of the eyes to "pools in Heshbon by the gate of Bath-rabbim," of cheeks to beds of spices, hands to rings of gold set with beryl, body to ivory work overlaid with sapphires. In all these cases nothing is painted; there is simply a reference to supreme types of excellence. It is readers ignoring such usage who have found fault with the heaven of Milton's poem as being material, with its pearly gates and pavement of gold. These are of course simply supreme symbols hallowed by associations of holy writ; they seem material only to those who read with a defective sense of the symbolic.

Sometimes again such symbols will be used as will suggest a double relation between the things compared: this of itself would be fatal to pictorial effect.

> I am black — but comely . . .
> As the tents of Kedar — as the curtains of Solomon.

When Virgil has to deal with sunburnt beauty he uses vivid expressions:

> He's dark; what then? the hyacinth is black,
> The violet also.

The Hebrew poet has no purpose to call up visions of beauty; but the comparisons he chooses, besides the superficial resemblance, will hint how the bride has been brought from the very outskirts of society to the glory of the palace itself. The following passage would be unnatural in modern poetry.

> I have compared thee, O my love, to a steed in Pharaoh's chariots.
> Thy cheeks are comely with plaits of hair,
> Thy neck with strings of jewels.
> We will make thee plaits of gold
> With studs of silver.

To our literalism it would seem derogatory to see in the bride's braided hair and necklace suggestions of horses' harness; what recommends the comparison to the symbolist is the added suggestion of a wild steed promoted to the chariots of Pharaoh. So in another passage, hair suggests mountain goats only because of the double effect of ordered rows and sloping brows; teeth because of their combined purity and evenness are compared to — > — a flock of ewes that are newly shorn,

> Which are come up from the washing;
> Whereof every one hath twins,
> And none is bereaved among them.

Lips, for the same double suggestiveness, are likened to a thread of scarlet (uniting curve and colour); the temples call up the comparison of the pomegranate only when they are seen through the veil. Analytic interest prevails in all these passages, and not an appeal to the passions.

Yet another variation of symbolism acts by grouping excellences: the comparison must be made with the group as a whole.

> How much better is thy love than wine!
> And the smell of thine ointments than all manner of spices!
> Thy lips, O my bride, drop as the honeycomb;
> Honey and milk are under thy tongue;
> And the smell of thy garments is like the smell of Lebanon.

The mind must not isolate any single sensuous detail, but gather from the whole the complete suggestiveness of the feast, with its wealth of flavour and perfume; this companionship of two has become to the royal lover all that the full revelry of the banquet can give of delight. The effect is of the same order as the wealth of synonyms which the poets of Wisdom literature pour out, in calling Wisdom by the indiscriminate names Understanding, Counsel, Discretion, Subtilty, and many more.

I have gone into some detail on this subject in order to emphasise the general principle how different a poetic atmosphere is created by the poetry in which imagery and that in which symbolism prevails. Imagery rests upon pictorial effects, and stimulates the imagination; symbolism appeals to the analytic sense, while to the imagination it acts rather as a sedative than a stimulus. So far from the poetry of Solomon's Song violating reserve, it may be said that symbolism is itself a form of reserve. And thus poetry saturated with symbolism can handle topics which more realistic writing must leave alone: making, in the sonnet of Ecclesiastes, a picture of beauty out of the infirmities of old age, and in the present poem allowing the raptures of lovers' privacy to be heard by other ears without offence.

On one other point a word may be said. In this presentation of idyllic love, some readers may ask, what has become of the spiritual interpretation? To dwell upon the religious meaning of the sacred literature is beyond the scope of this work. But I desire to point out that nothing here advanced conflicts with any theological use of the poem. It has been presented as celebrating the love of bride and bridegroom. Now this human relationship has been consecrated in the Old Testament to the relationship between Jehovah and his people, in the New Testament to the relationship between Christ and his Church. Here then is material enough for the theologian. The only way in which such discussion as has been offered above interferes with religious interpretation is when an attempt is made to read spiritual meaning into single verses taken apart from their context. Solomon's Song has been the happy hunting ground of those who seek to discover mystic senses in isolated phrases, and a literary distortion has been the result which is perhaps without a parallel elsewhere. May an example be permitted? No one doubts the piety of Quarles. But he had a soul that could never rise above the single text; and one of the texts he has chosen to illustrate is the following.

> By night on my bed I sought him whom my soul loveth;
> I sought him, but I found him not.

Instead of reading on to find these words the beginning of a beautiful dream, Quarles is prepared to find in this fragment a spiritual sense. His hieroglyph represents a female figure, allegorical of the human soul, with a flat candlestick in her hand turning down the bedclothes, and surprised to find no one inside: on the other side of the bed, hidden from her but visible to the reader, is the figure of the Christ, in the attitude of one who has tumbled out of bed. With spiritual interpretation such as this the literary study of the Bible is in uncompromising antagonism. But it is surely not heresy to lay down the principle: First that which is natural, and afterward that which is spiritual. First the natural sense of a passage, resting upon grammatical connection and the relation of parts to the whole of a literary work, is to be determined, as in any secular book: then only is it legitimate to inquire as to deeper meanings and theological exegesis. And to some readers it may seem that nothing more spiritual need be desired than the celebration of pure conjugal love.

BIBLE PHILOSOPHY or WISDOM

In the wide range of books described by the collective title 'The Bible' a department that stands out separate from all the rest is Wisdom Literature. Side by side with prophets defending the theocracy and singers taking their inspiration from Temple service, with historians compiling annals of kings and scribes expounding the law, there was a class of Wise Men, who had habits of thought and forms of literature peculiar to themselves. Prophecy has much in common with the lyric psalms; prophecy again overlaps with history, and the line between historic and epic narrative is difficult to draw. But every reader feels how the proverbs of practical life differ from prophetic denunciations of sin, and how widely apart are the lyrics of worship and lyric celebrations of wisdom. Yet this is a distinctness in which there is no clashing: the wise have reached the same conclusions as the prophets and psalmists, only they have reached them by a different route. It is true that the name of Israel is found in only one of the books of wisdom, and only two give any recognition to the chosen people; there is not a hint in these books of Messianic hopes, and in only one place is there a reference to Temple service; there is little said even of a personal God. The wise have, not inappropriately, been called humanists; but it would be a great mistake to describe their works as secular. The whole is pervaded by a spirit of devoutness; and if there is little discussion of God it is plainly because the idea of God is so entirely taken for granted.

This Old Testament wisdom is the counterpart of what in other literatures is 'philosophy.' But deep seated differences are covered by these different designations. For one thing, the separation of reflection from conduct, natural elsewhere, has never been made by the Hebrew sages; their word 'wisdom' suggests how they observe or speculate upon the sum of things always with a view to righteousness. Again: the stage of literary evolution which differentiates the spheres of poetry and prose is a gradual process: this process has not been completed in the time of the Old Testament, and the wise express their philosophy with the freest range of imaginative setting and metrical intricacy. And there is another difference. Modern philosophy has a wide scope making it an endless progression, of which each stage is to be superseded by a further stage. The more limited scope implied in the term 'wisdom' admits indeed a progression of thought, but a progression which is closed. The most important treatment of the books of wisdom is to read them in an order which presents a philosophy going through a complete round of thought development, and attaining a unity as impressive as the unity of a dramatic plot.

The principle underlying Wisdom literature and giving it its unity may be described by the single word Observation. The prophet rests his message on an immediate Divine revelation: the wise men only claim to have observed life. Modern Science is not more faithful to its root idea of examining details and grouping results than is the wisdom of the Bible to its principle of analytic observation. This same idea of observation gives us a key for determining the relation of the books of wisdom to one another. The earlier works, Proverbs and Ecclesiasticus, give us only Isolated Observations of life; these are reflected in brief proverbs, or in literary forms but little removed from proverbs, and each is entirely distinct and complete in itself. The further notion of the connectedness of all things is not ignored in these earlier books, but is looked upon as no subject for reflective analysis; the wise men approach the universe as a whole with feelings only of adoration, and the philosopher becomes a poet singing of this whole as 'Wisdom.' Ecclesiastes marks the point where, for the first time, reflective analysis has been turned upon the sum of things: the sudden responsibility becomes too great, and philosophy breaks down in despair. The word 'wisdom' now becomes confined for the most part to lesser achievements, or to the observing faculty; the universal is no longer a unity that can be adored, but a broken 'All things,' the attempt to understand which is 'vanity.' There is an advance from this position in the latest of the books of wisdom, the apocryphal Wisdom of Solomon. Here philosophy recovers its tone of rapture; the recovery is made, not by returning to the restricted area of observation, but by still further enlarging it. The Preacher had considered only this life; his successor recognizes a life beyond the grave, and in immortality finds a solution of present mysteries. Whereas the Preacher had confined himself to the present, the new wisdom adds the past of history, and presents Wisdom as Providence. And a single passage — where however the topic is only raised, and not followed into detail — shows that this close of Wisdom literature extends its observation even from human life to external nature. Thus these four — Proverbs, Ecclesiasticus, Ecclesiastes and Wisdom of Solomon — make a distinct progression of thought. And somewhere in this line of thought — it is needless to discuss exactly where — comes the remaining work of Wisdom literature, the Book of Job. Here again it is the universe as a whole which is under consideration, or at least, its leading problem, the Mystery of Evil. And here not one but several attitudes of mind in reference to this central problem are represented, and embodied in different dramatic characters, while their discussion of the mystery undergoes the development that belongs to dramatic plot.

It is this development and unity of Old Testament wisdom which is the main subject of the present introductions. This is quite a separate matter from the questions of authorship and chronology of the individual books. The Modern Reader's Bible does not profess to deal with the questions of historic criticism which are so rife at the present time. From their own point of view such discussions are of high consequence: to one whose specialty is the history of Semitic peoples it is important to know whether Ecclesiastes was produced at an early or a late stage of Hebrew development. But from the standpoint of world literature the paramount interest is the mutual relations of the books of wisdom, to be determined by the internal evidence of the books themselves. To literature considered only as literature it is the opinion of the present editor that the importance of dates and historic setting has been immensely over-estimated, while considerations of authorship have more often proved a disturbance than a help. It is the more transient productions of literature that stand in need of such adventitious interest; the world's masterpieces, while of course they are capable of additional illumination from every source, yet if left to themselves appeal to every people and every age. And such considerations apply with special force to the books of wisdom; works in the historic discussion of which scholarship of equal eminence can be cited as pronouncing with equal positiveness on opposite sides of irreconcilable alternatives; while merely to state accurately the position of authorities makes a bulk of discussion sufficient to crowd out the thing discussed.

The Proverbs

The Proverbs is a Miscellany of Wisdom in five books. Four of these are various collections of the isolated proverbs and sayings; the first book contains Poems on Wisdom in general. It may be well for the reader to know beforehand what is the matter and form of the literature he is to encounter.

To speak first of the proverbs themselves. Their fundamental topic is the world controversy between good and evil, wisdom and folly; both the antagonism itself and the judgment that is to decide between them. This judgment is not that which the prophets sometimes paint — a great Day of the Lord in which the whole earth is doomed, but a continual judgment, going on at all periods and in every individual life, by which the evil are constrained to bow before the good. Even the righteous are to be recompensed in the earth: how much more the wicked and the sinner. As certainly as the Lord hath made everything for its own end, so certainly the wicked have been made for the day of evil. Doubts on the subject of this unerring judgment, such as dominate Job and Ecclesiastes, and disturb even the faith of Asaph, appear only in the faintest manner in this work, in the form of a few precepts against the envying of sinners. So pronounced is the victory of good in early proverbs that they have been called utilitarian. Certainly their language can be read in a utilitarian sense, but I doubt if this expresses their spirit; they are philosophical, not protreptical, and their purpose is not to bribe with offers of advantage, but to exclaim against the folly of thinking that there could be any path towards advantage except through right doing.

With this thought of the struggle between good and evil for the foundation of their creed, it is natural that the wise should give prominence to the topic of reproofs and chastening: the wise reproof upon the obedient ear like an earring of gold, the chastening a child with a rod to save him from Sheol, the faithful wounds of a friend contrasting with the profuse kisses of an enemy. Similarly, righteousness and success being inseparable, another prominent topic becomes the virtues that make for success and the vices that hinder it. Such vices the proverbs display as the slack hand, or the lack of enterprise that thinks of the clean crib instead of the increase which the strength of oxen will bring, or the talk of the lips leading to penury, or the borrowing that brings with it slavery to the lender. But the chief scorn of the wise men is reserved for the sluggard: who roasteth not the food he took in hunting, who burieth his hand in the dish and will not so much as bring it to his mouth; his way is a perpetual hedge of thorns while other men are walking in a high way; as a son he is found sleeping in harvest time, as a messenger he is vinegar to the teeth and smoke to the eyes of those who have sent him; at every call to action there seems a lion in the streets; with the mechanical motion of a swinging door he turns about on his bed, craving a little more slumber, until his drowsiness brings him to rags, or poverty springs upon him like an armed robber. And all the while he is wiser in his own conceit than seven men that can render a reason.

The proverbs treat conduct in general, denouncing chiefly such evils as belong to a simple state of society: the dishonesty of the false balance and divers weights, revenge and hasty strife, gluttony and intemperance in wine. There is a hint of conflict between religion and morality in the precept against vowing rashly and afterwards making inquiry. The New Testament command to love an enemy is taken from the Book of Proverbs, though the Sermon on the Mount associates it with a higher motive. It is not surprising that in the sayings of the wise a special prominence should be given to the wisdom of the lips. He kisseth the lips, they say, that giveth a right answer; a word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in baskets of silver; not only does a soft answer turn away wrath, but a soft tongue breaketh the bone; the plans of the heart may belong to the individual man, but the answer of the tongue is from the Lord.

Perhaps the proverbs are most characteristic when they turn upon the varying aspects of social life. Cameo pictures of social types abound. There is the prating fool, winking with his eye; the practical joker, as dangerous as a madman casting firebrands about; the talebearer, and the man who 'harps upon a matter,' separating chief friends; the whisperer whose words are like dainty morsels going down into the innermost parts of the belly; the backbiting tongue, drawing gloomy looks all around as surely as the north wind brings rain; the false boaster, compared to wind and clouds without rain; the haste to be rich; the liberal man that scattereth and yet increaseth, while others are withholding only to come to want; the speculator holding back his corn amid the curses of the people; the man of wandering life, like a restless bird; the unsocial man that separateth himself, foregoing wisdom for the sake of his own private desire; the cheerfulness that is a continual feast. The times of the wise men seem to have been acquainted with genteel poverty:

> Better is he that is lightly esteemed, and hath a servant,
> Than he that honoureth himself, and lacketh bread.

Nor were they too primitive to exhibit hollow social observances:

> Eat thou not the bread of him that hath an evil eye,
> Neither desire thou his dainties:

For as one that reckoneth within himself, so is he:
Eat and drink, saith he to thee;
But his heart is not with thee.
The morsel which thou hast eaten shalt thou vomit up,
And lose thy sweet words.

Some of these social sayings rest upon the curious observation of what Ben Jonson would have called humours: the humour of the buyer, saying, It is naught, and when he is gone away, boasting; the humour of the mendicant, whose fellows give him a wide berth —

—his friends go far from him!
He pursueth them with words, but they are gone.

Of the same sort is the delightful picture of the parvenu at the great man's table, distracted between the dainties and awe at the presence: he is advised to keep a knife to his hungry throat. Most unexpected of all is the proverb of the inopportune man that "blesseth his friend with a loud voice, rising early in the morning:" but his blessing counts for a curse!

It is not only social types that thus appear in the sayings of the wise: social questions have their place. Proverbs are devoted to the relations of servant and master, wife and husband, parents and children. And there is the perpetual question of rich and poor. The saying that the appetite of the labouring man laboureth for him might have served Aristophanes as text for the discourse of Poverty in his Plutus. The wise view the rich and poor mingling in the incidents of life, and proclaim that the same Lord is maker of all. They point out that there are some compensations even for poverty:

The ransom of a man's life is his riches:
But the poor heareth no threatening.

Robbery of the poor they denounce as a reproach to the common Maker of all; and their invectives against the various forms of oppression go back to the 'removing of landmarks' which may be regarded as the first step in the evolution of pauperism.

Individual experience also finds proverbs to reflect it: feebleness fainting in the day of adversity; satiety loathing the honeycomb; the sick disappointment of the hope deferred; the heart bowed with care, and gladdened by a single good word; the tinge of sorrow that is in laughter itself; the transitoriness of riches that make to themselves wings; misplaced confidence, jarring like a broken tooth or a foot out of joint; songs grating upon a heavy heart, and good news from a far country as refreshing as water to the thirsty. The proverb lore of experience may be considered to find its climax in Agur's aspiration after a life of golden mediocrity — neither poverty nor riches, but just food convenient for him.

What the proverbs omit is not less striking than the matter they contain. Two of the leading interests of our modern life can scarcely be said to have any place in early Wisdom literature — politics and religion. There are sayings which mention the king; but the king appears only vaguely as the embodiment of authority, and 'bad kings' as authority perverted. The king's wrath is as the roaring of the lion, his favour is as dew upon the grass; his glory is in the multitude of his people; his office is the winnowing out of sinners. A nearer approach to political ideas is in the single proverb which warns against men given to change. In the same way the Lord appears in this literature as the still higher authority and ultimate sanction; one saying makes a link between the human and divine authority by speaking of the king's heart as in the hands of the Lord, turned like watercourses wheresoever he wills. The proverbs love to dwell on the omniscience of Deity: his eyes are in every place keeping watch over evil and good. Where other powers fail, the ultimate authority still has place: such seems to be the thought of the saying which recognises the Lord as the disposer of the lot that is cast into the lap. There is however one varying note in Proverbs on this supreme topic. The simple sonnet of Agur on the Unsearchableness of God is the first hint of that weary scepticism that stands fully revealed in Ecclesiastes.

I have been speaking of the topics of proverbs; it may be asked, what are the methods by which these topics are treated? Without attempting minute analysis I may remark that three characteristics of gnomic method stand out. Antithesis is the very life blood of the proverb: antithesis, in the form of adversative or other contrast, belongs to the vast majority of them.

> Understanding is a well-spring of life unto him that hath it:
> But the correction of fools is their folly.
>
> Children's children are the crown of old men;
> And the glory of children are their fathers.

Next in importance to antithesis, comparison is a mode of emphasis in proverbial sayings.

> A rebuke entereth deeper into one that hath understanding > Than an hundred stripes into a fool.
>
> Wrath is cruel,
> And anger is outrageous:
> But who is able to stand before jealousy?

Such comparison reaches its fullest form in the enumerations of the Number Sonnets.

> For three things the earth doth tremble,
> And for four, which it cannot bear:
> For a servant when he is king;
> And a fool when he is filled with meat;
> For an odious woman when she is married;
> And an handmaid that is heir to her mistress.

A third mode of treatment found in the proverbs is the kind of comparison called imagery. Very striking images are employed by the wise men, especially in the fourth book of Proverbs. Such is the simile of the will o' the wisp:

> The getting of treasures by a lying tongue
> Is a vapour driven to and fro;
> They that seek them seek death.

Three striking similes are massed together in a single saying, where the contentious woman is compared to continual dropping in a very rainy day; restraining her is like holding the wind, using force is like fighting slippery oil.

The reader of Proverbs must be on his guard against a first impression of commonplaceness. Proverbs have a prerogative to be commonplace; their mission is to voice the most widely diffused experience. And there is no literary function higher than that of giving point to what is ordinary, and rescuing a truth from the obscurity of obviousness. No impression is left on the mind by the dry statement that the behaviour of a pair of lovers is irreducible to principle. But Agur can strike a spark when he makes this topic into a number sonnet:

> There be three things which are too wonderful for me,
> Yea, four which I know not:

The way of an eagle in the air;
The way of a serpent upon a rock;
The way of a ship in the midst of the sea;
And the way of a man with a maid.

It must be remembered, moreover, that proverbs suffer more than any other kind of literature by being read in collections. Most readers have grown weary even of excellent lyric poems when they have tried to read through a disconnected series. But Wisdom literature contains the briefest of all literary compositions, and three hundred and seventy-five of these, wholly unconnected, are massed together in a single book of The Proverbs. Many of the sayings will justify themselves at once; for others the reader must be content to wait. It may well happen that proverbs which seemed the coldest in the mere reading may glow with wisdom if the reader himself happens to pass into the experience they describe. No special information is given by the familiar saying that the heart knoweth its own bitterness. But those who have had to suffer some pang of disaster have realised how this and other proverbs attain the very perfection of adequacy.

We seem to pass into a different region of literature when we turn from the collections of proverbs to the introductory book of Poems on Wisdom as a whole. The word wisdom is associated with other names — Knowledge, Discretion, Understanding, Discernment: the individual words are not to be pressed, either in the original language or in any other, but the idea is a profusion of synonyms intended to take in all excellence. When to these synonyms is added 'Instruction' and 'Law,' the man of wisdom and the scribe join hands. To such Wisdom are opposed special errors — sluggishness, the sowing of discord — or in general terms, scorners and men of violence, as blind to their inevitable doom as the silly bird in whose very eyes the fowler may safely spread his net. Or the foes of Wisdom are the simple; or again the 'perverse' and 'froward' — terms suggesting those who do not yield to temptation, but go to meet it: in Southey's phrase, they tempt Hell to tempt them.

The Wisdom celebrated is a thing of character; but of character viewed as a whole. It is an air or presence, that hangs about a man like a chaplet of grace on his head or chains about his neck. Sought at first with strain and effort — with searching as for hid treasures, with watching daily at gates and waiting at the posts of doors, with the pain of Divine chastening — Wisdom becomes at last a heart possession, restraining the mouth, directing the eyes, establishing the feet, watching over the sleeper, talking with him when he wakes: by multiplied expressions like these the poets of Wisdom strive to express the overflowing of vigorous consciousness, as when an epic hero is made to converse with his 'dear heart.' Character passes into action, and Wisdom appears as a 'way' and a 'path': a path of light growing from dawn into full day, in contrast with another path that leads down into darkness and stumbling. And in this connection of thought a single poem identifies Wisdom with a mocking retribution, such as a Greek poet would call 'Nemesis,' which the Hebrew poet, by an interlocking of metaphors, describes as a man's 'eating of the fruit of his way.' Viewed from the past, Wisdom is the 'principal thing' which has come down by tradition from instructing father to son that becomes instructor in his turn; viewed from yet another standpoint, Wisdom is the grand bargain of life, whose merchandise is better than merchandise of silver, and her gain than gold and rubies.

But Wisdom can rise higher still in the scale of personality. The same impulse which leads a sailor lad to speak of his ship as 'she,' or a poet to deify his inspiration as a Muse, leads the wise men to clothe their theme with a feminine personality. Wisdom is a sister, Understanding a kinswoman; the final poem of the book paints Wisdom as the universal hostess, with her house of seven pillars and her maidens bidding to a rich feast. But the great monologue which is the crown of the Wisdom poems contains another personification, as bold as it is brilliant. The poet throws out his light by dark shading, and prepares the way by presenting another personality — the 'Strange Woman,' who haunts the whole of Wisdom literature. Her tempting enticements are elaborated in all their details, and the simple victim is pictured as following her, heedless as the ox going to the slaughter, helpless as the fettered prisoner carried to the correction of fools. There is a momentary lifting of a veil to give a glimpse of the house as the way down to the abyss, and the victims as a mighty host in the chambers of death: and then, with a startling turn of the imagery, the poet presents Wisdom as the temptress to good.

Doth not Wisdom cry?

From the high places and every point of vantage are heard her pleadings with the simple. She enumerates her charms: and at once the poem begins a chain of ascending climaxes. First, all the desirable things of mankind appear as part of Wisdom: subtilty and discretion, justice and strong rule, righteousness and true wealth. Then a further climax traverses the whole gulf between subjective and objective, and Wisdom is identified with Beauty, — not with any partial or transient beauty, but with the whole creative design of the universe, in which Wisdom assisted as a master workman. Even a higher climax still is found when Wisdom appears as the delight in all existence, such as crowns moments of rare consciousness when the individual realises his oneness with the whole. The cosmogonist of Genesis, writing prose, represents God viewing his finished creation: "and, behold, it was very good." It is a poetic intensification of the same thought which here makes the beauty of creative design pass over into a joy of Deity for ever, and Wisdom is seen as his daily delight:

Sporting always before him;
Sporting in his habitable globe.

A few words will be sufficient to describe the literary forms which are to be met with in the Books of Proverbs. The most elementary is the Unit Proverb: a couplet — rarely a triplet — of verse, which is in the strictest sense an 'aphorism': bounded by its own horizon, without any connection with anything else. There are in Proverbs a few Proverb Clusters, where several independent sayings are gathered about a common theme. Next in order comes the Epigram. Classical epigrams do not, like those of modern literature, imply wit; the suggestion of the term is of smoothness and polish in connection with a poem at once brief and complete in its thought. In application to Wisdom literature I use the term Epigram in a very definite sense: as a unit proverb organically expanded. That is to say, in every epigram two lines (not necessarily consecutive) make a unit proverb, which is the germ of the whole.

Weary not thyself to be rich;
Cease from thine own wisdom.
Wilt thou set thine eyes upon that which is not?
For riches certainly make themselves wings,
Like an eagle that flieth toward heaven.

It is clear that the two lines which stand out on the left make a proverb complete in itself, and also that the remaining lines are expansions of the idea of this proverb. This plan of printing epigrams is uniformly followed in this work.

In the opening book, and occasionally in the other books, we have Wisdom Sonnets. The neglect of Comparative Literature, and the tendency to study the literature of each nation by itself, has led to a narrowed conception of the Sonnet, from the circumstance that English sonnets and their Italian models consist of fourteen lines each. But there is no virtue in the number fourteen; and the true differentia of the Sonnet is the moulding of thought to special form. It is an accident that the Italian and English languages employ a single pattern; there is no departure from the sonnet spirit if a multiplicity of patterns be adopted, provided there is felt the cutting of the thought according to the form. In the Number Sonnets, more than one example of which has been already cited (pages 1455–6), the opening lines announce a scheme, "There are three . . . yea, four . . . ," to which the rest conforms. More important in Wisdom literature are the Free Sonnets, in which the moulding is to nothing more restricted than 'high parallelism,' that is, not the parallelism binding successive lines into a stanza, but the bond which may correlate the most distant portions of a poem in a single scheme. The reader interested in technicalities will find a complete account of the structure of biblical poetry at the commencement of the notes (page 1517). But without going into technicalities the sensitive reader can appreciate in these sonnets, when properly printed, their harmonies of form: sequences of parallelism repeating themselves or inverted, crossing or swinging like a pendulum, augmenting or varied in the freest manner yet without the rhythmic step being lost. The versification of Wisdom literature is to the versification of the Psalms what the music of Handel and Bach is to the music of Beethoven; and perhaps no name but that of Bach will adequately suggest the delight in formal bonds elastic enough to admit the deepest thought which makes the technical beauty of the biblical Sonnet.

Ecclesiasticus

The portion of Wisdom literature next to be considered is the apocryphal Ecclesiasticus, or, The Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach. The series of books popularly known as the Old Testament Apocrypha have been by an eminent scholar aptly styled Zwischenschriften or Intermediate Writings. To none of them does the term Intermediate apply with so much fulness as to that which is the subject of the present introduction. Like the rest of the Apocrypha, Ecclesiasticus stands between the Old and New Testaments. Like the whole of the Books of Wisdom, it is intermediate between sacred and secular literature. In common with two other of these wisdom books it mediates between purely Jewish thought and the spirit of the external world by which this was gradually leavened; and in the case of Ecclesiasticus what there is of external influence is, on the explicit authority of the Preface, to be put down to that Alexandrian literary circle which was the great link between Oriental and Western, between Ancient and Modern. In a yet more important sense the word has application: so far as Biblical Philosophy can be presented as a thing of development, Ecclesiasticus holds in that development a middle place. The Book of Proverbs is a series of isolated observations of life, universal wisdom being not analysed but adored. On the contrary Ecclesiastes and Wisdom, from however varied standpoints, agree in turning reflection on to the universe as a whole. Unlike these, the Book of Ecclesiasticus makes no attempt to investigate universal problems; its matter, apart from the hymns to Wisdom, is, like that of Proverbs, addressed to practical life; its Greek title makes it a Manual of Virtue or Panaretos, and a modern historian has described it as the sanctification of common sense. But, unlike Proverbs, its observations are not isolated, but digested into wider though still fragmentary surveys. The inquisitive spirit no longer satisfies; systematisation has not yet begun; between comes the arrangement of material under headings — like the 'topics' of the Aristotelian system — which is distinctly a middle stage in philosophic advance.

Here however a misunderstanding is to be avoided. To discuss the relation of this book to others as regards the development of the thought reflected in them is, as has been already remarked, by no means the same thing as settling the chronological order in which the books were composed. The personal references in Ecclesiasticus are so distinct as to enable scholars, with practical unanimity, to fix the date of its composition as about 200 B.C. The decision of a date for Ecclesiastes is a locus classicus for disagreeing doctors; opinion on this topic has ranged over a thousand years, from the age of Solomon to the age of Herod the Great. But if the earliest date possible be taken for Ecclesiastes, this will not prevent its representing a later stage of philosophic thought than the other. The earlier stages of literary thought and form do not disappear when later stages take their rise; the two go on together side by side, each calling forth fresh representatives, just as the invaders of a country and the original inhabitants may settle down in it together. If Ecclesiastes be early and Ecclesiasticus late, this merely implies that the son of Sirach did not adopt the philosophic position of his predecessor, but remained in touch with the still earlier thought from which the Preacher had made his divergence.

The enlarged thought needs new forms for its expression; poetic forms had sufficed for Proverbs, Ecclesiasticus supplements these with a literature of prose. I desire to be the more explicit in my explanation at this point, because I have departed very widely from previous editions in the form which the book presents to the eye.* Hebrew verse depends, not upon mechanical matters such as rhymes or the numbering of syllables, but upon the parallelism of clauses. But this parallelism of clauses is, in universal literature, a feature of rhetoric. If then a language bases its verse system upon something which also belongs to prose, it is inevitable that in that language we should find an overlapping of verse and prose. The extreme of poetry and the extreme of prose will be as far apart in Hebrew as in other languages. But there will come a point at which the parallelism of rhetoric and the parallelism of verse will approach very near to one another; to discriminate them will involve examining not only the collocation of clauses, but also the general drift and spirit of the whole. This discrimination I have endeavoured to make. The reader who is astonished to find long successions of prose in a book he has been accustomed to see wholly in the form of verse must not suppose I am throwing over the authority of previous editors. All that other editions have implied by the breaking up into lines is the parallelism of clauses, which is an unquestionable fact. But I have gone a step further, and endeavoured to distinguish the rhetoric parallelism from the poetic parallelism, clothing each with the outer form in which it is familiar to the modern reader.

It must occur to any student that the usual arrangement of Ecclesiasticus puts a severe strain upon our sense of form. I instance such a passage as the following, cited as it appears in the Revised Version.

> And Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, is the third in glory,
> In that he was zealous in the fear of the Lord,
> And stood fast in the good forwardness of his soul when the people turned away,
> And he made reconciliation for Israel.
> Therefore was there a covenant of peace established for him,
> That he should be leader of the saints and of his people;
> That he and his seed
> Should have the dignity of the priesthood for ever.
> Also he made a covenant with David the son of Jesse, of the tribe of Judah;
> The inheritance of the king is his alone from son to son;
> So the inheritance of Aaron is also unto his seed.

This is not parallelism at all, but straightforward prose cut up into lengths. In the next passage there is parallelism, but such as will appear in any writer of rhetoric prose.

*The general principles of the use of prose and verse in this edition are fully discussed below, page 1530.

With a holy garment, with gold and blue and purple, the work of the embroiderer,
With an oracle of judgement, even with the Urim and Thummim;
With twisted scarlet, the work of the craftsman;
With precious stones graven like a signet, in a setting of gold, the work of the jeweller,
For a memorial engraved in writing, after the number of the tribes of Israel;
With a crown of gold upon the mitre, having graven on it, as on a signet, HOLINESS.

I am persuaded that neither of these passages would have been supposed verse except through a preconceived idea that Ecclesiasticus must be understood to be all verse or all prose. On the other hand, the parallelism of contiguous clauses (as distinguished from the high parallelism that links together clauses widely separated) belongs to rhetoric style in all languages. No one doubts that our Microcosmography is prose; yet (notwithstanding the greater diffuseness of English as compared with Hebrew) great part of it might be printed in lines that would have as good a claim to parallelism as many parts of Ecclesiasticus. Thus, of the Alderman:

You must look on him as one of the town gates,
And consider him not as a body, but a corporation.
His eminency above others hath made him a man of worship,
For he had never been preferred but that he was worth thousands.
He oversees the commonwealth as his shop,
And it is an argument of his policy that he has thriven by his craft. . . .
He is the highest stair of his profession,
And an example to his trade what in time they may come to.
He makes very much of his authority,
But more of his satin doublet,
Which, though of good years, bears its age very well,
And looks fresh every Sunday;
But his scarlet gown is a monument,
And lasts from generation to generation.

My argument is, I repeat, that, in view of the overlapping of verse and prose, the classification of Hebrew compositions must depend upon wider literary considerations than the mere coördination of clauses. Such wider examination will no doubt involve difference of opinion; but the general principle will be clear that Wisdom literature, resting on a basis of the gnomic couplet which is a meeting point of prose and verse, develops in a twofold direction, and as the writings of the wise men succeed one another there is a tendency for rhetoric to preponderate over verse.*

Two new forms then are introduced by the son of Sirach into Wisdom literature — the Maxim and the Essay. I use the term Maxim in a definite sense: to describe a saying which consists of a proverb couplet (or occasionally the abridgement of a couplet) followed by a comment in prose. Sometimes this comment is of the nature of an elucidation (xx. 14):

The gift of a fool shall not profit thee;
For his eyes are many instead of one.
He will give little and upbraid much, and he will open his mouth like a crier; to-day he will lend, and to-morrow he will ask it again: such an one is a hateful man.

Here an enigmatic expression, the 'many eyes' of a fool, is interpreted of inconstancy.

*The whole subject of the overlapping in Biblical literature of verse and prose is discussed in Chapter IV. of my Literary Study of the Bible (D. C. Heath & Co., Boston; Isbister & Co., London).

In other cases the comment may apply a general statement to particular cases; as in the following (xix. 1):

> He that despiseth small things
> Shall fall by little and little.
> Wine and women will make men of understanding to fall away: and he that cleaveth to harlots will be the more reckless. Moths and worms shall have him to heritage; and a reckless soul shall be taken away.

Or the comment to a maxim may, in the most varied way, be an enlargement of the text. It will be seen that the Maxim is the prose counterpart to the verse Epigram: both consist of a unit proverb enlarged by comment.* It is natural to find these two forms abounding in works that emanate from the Scribes, and from what may fairly be called the Age of Commentary.

As the Maxim is the counterpart of the Epigram, so is the Essay of the Sonnet. The two involve, in their respective spheres of Prose and Poetry, an aggregation of thoughts with no necessary bond beyond the common theme. To the ode or epic, to the sermon or speech, a title is a superfluity: to a sonnet or essay its title represents the very soul of the composition, binding its scattered thoughts into a unity. The Sonnet gives to such a cluster of thoughts the attraction of poetic elaboration; the Essay, on the contrary, has the free flow of rhetoric style. It is a common feature of all literatures that they begin with verse, and afterwards develop a prose style. But it belongs to Hebrew, with its common ground between verse and prose, that this development of prose should be a gradual progression. The writings of the son of Sirach exactly cover the ground of this progression. Stanley's picturesque description of his style — the closed hand of the Hebrew proverb changing into the open palm of Greek rhetoric — may or may not be accurate as regards the degree of Greek influence, but it admirably describes the transitional style. I have traced elsewhere † the evolution of the Wisdom Essay out of the gnomic sentence, with the Proverb Cluster as a transitional stage, while compositions that must be called essays still present very different degrees of gnomic stiffness. It may here be added, that the essays of Ecclesiasticus shew a yet further development: as between what may be called the Inorganic Essay — the mere cluster of thoughts familiar to us in Feltham's Resolves or the Microcosmography — and the commencement of an organic style, in which the more ordered thought should have the external representation of paragraphs. One more literary form has to be mentioned. The Essay, like the Sonnet, partakes in the double function of Wisdom literature — to celebrate wisdom as well as to present wise thoughts. Hence we find in this work Rhetoric Encomia, which may fairly be described as prose hymns.

Literary forms such as these contain the matter of Ecclesiasticus, which is thus, like Proverbs, a Miscellany of Wisdom. But it has another difference of form from its predecessor. Proverbs was an anthology of anthologies: no less than five distinct collections put together by an unknown editor. The book under discussion is the work of a single editor, who names himself, and keeps his personality constantly before his readers. Indeed, this outbreaking of the personality of the author from time to time has the effect of dividing the whole into distinct divisions or books: a thing which seems to have been overlooked by editors of Ecclesiasticus in their discussions of the divisions of the work.‡ At the end of chapter twenty-three — that is, after an amount of matter almost as long as the whole Book of Proverbs — the author speaks to announce that Wisdom shall praise herself. There follows the poetic monologue which is parallel to the great monologue in Proverbs. Then the author again speaks to connect this Wisdom with the Covenant of Jehovah, and to call her exhaustlessness a great sea. From that sea he himself came out as a stream from a river, as a conduit into a garden.

‡ Edersheim (in Wace's Commentary) says that Ecclesiasticus has five parts, like the Law and the Psalter; but his five divisions are founded upon analysis of matter, without reference to the prefatory interruptions. Fritzche's sevenfold division and groupings partly agree with the arrangement in this work.

> I said, I will water my garden, and will water abundantly my garden bed; and, lo, my stream became a river, and my river became a sea. I will yet bring instruction to light as the morning, and will make these things to shine forth afar off.

There is surely nothing in these words of the self-exaltation which some editors have seen; they contain a modest and felicitous figure by which it is expressed that the author's materials have grown upon him, and that a second book must be added to the first. Again, at xxxiii. 16 we get another brief prefatory interruption.

> And I awaked up last, as one that gleaneth after the grape-gatherers: by the blessing of the Lord I got before them, and filled my winepress as one that gathereth grapes.

The image is an apposite one for what is to be an addition to an addition. Another similar passage occurs at xxxix. 12.

> Yet more will I utter which I have thought upon; and I am filled as the moon at the full.

The full moon is an appropriate comparison for what is in reality the final book of the miscellany; for the fifth division contains only two lengthy compositions, both of the nature of rhetoric encomia, and each is announced separately by a few words from the author. When it is remembered how seldom the personal pronoun is used in this work, it becomes evident that these passages are prefaces dividing the whole work into books.

With these prefatory notices to particular books may be compared another interesting passage, which is numbered as chapter fifty-one of the ordinary editions. This comes after the work has been brought by its author to the most formal conclusion possible, in what is, in fact, a regular mediæval colophon; anything following this must be either the addition of some editor, or that 'Author's Preface' which is naturally the last thing written in any book that is not a Tristram Shandy or a Hudibras. The chapter has a title: A Prayer of Jesus the Son of Sirach. This, like so many others of the traditional titles in our bibles, is the suggestion only of the opening words, and has little relevance to the section as a whole. It contains in reality three paragraphs. The first is a recital in prayer of the mercies of a lifetime. Then follows an autobiographical paragraph: how the writer has searched for wisdom all his life and the Lord has granted it. The third paragraph is an invitation to the unlearned to draw near and lodge in the house of instruction. The whole spirit of this invitation is in keeping with the prefatory passages noted above; and one single expression — "Behold with your eyes how that I laboured but a little and found for myself much rest" — is unintelligible except in what is introductory to a collection of writings. I have then thought it legitimate to transfer this to the place of an Author's Preface.

Our result then is that the Book of Ecclesiasticus is a Miscellany of Wisdom literature, divided by an Author's Preface and subsequent prefatory notices into five books. The number five may just be noted in passing. The Book of Proverbs is without question disposed in five books. We now see that Ecclesiasticus has the same number of divisions. Internal evidence has led me (as will appear in a subsequent introduction) to recognize five essays in Ecclesiastes and five discourses in Wisdom. Again, the Book of Psalms, the collection and arrangement of which is the work of the wise men, is plainly divided by doxologies into five books. It looks as if the number five had a special significance in Wisdom literature, as the number seven has elsewhere.

The matter of Ecclesiasticus, it has already been said, includes the celebration and presentation of wisdom. The sonnets in adoration of God and Wisdom make a much smaller proportion of the whole work of the son of Sirach than was the case with Proverbs. In general poetic character they are much the same as the sonnets of that book. Especially noticeable is the musical poise they sustain, by their elaborate parallelism and use of the refrain, and by their crescendo through the enumeration of particulars to a climax. To the great monologue of Wisdom in Proverbs I have already pointed out a parallel merged in the preface to the second book of Ecclesiasticus. Wisdom is described as the breath of the Most High, covering the earth as a mist, throned in the pillared cloud, moving in loneliness over the circling heavens and the bottomless abyss, over the tossing seas, and the limitless peoples of the world, until the Creator bids her take up her tabernacle in Jacob. In glorification of this Wisdom follows a tour-de-force of imagery from the world of vegetation: the stateliest trees express her exaltation, sweetest odours are compared to the words she breathes, her permeating presence is pictured by stretching branches and graceful flowers. All are invited to an exhaustless feast: to eat and yet be hungry. At this point may be seen a suggestive difference between the spirit of Ecclesiasticus and that of Proverbs. At the climax of the poem the author breaks in to say (in prose) that the Wisdom so celebrated is 'The Law.' The word 'law' does not occur once in Ecclesiastes, nor (in the technical sense) in Job or Wisdom; in Proverbs it is used only as one of a crowd of synonyms for wisdom: in the present work it occurs more than twenty times. All this is in accord with what is seen of the personality of the author; as Professor Cheyne has well put it, the man of wisdom has here turned Scribe. But it is to the golden age of the Scribes that he belongs, before their unchastened reverence for the letter has degenerated into mechanical literalism. The book is entirely free from the casuistry and loss of spiritual perspective that we associate with so much of the rabbinical utterances which grew into the Talmud.

I pass from the poetry recommending wisdom to the poetic and prose forms which contain the wisdom recommended. As in Proverbs, the controversy of Wisdom with its enemies is present throughout. The Sluggard, who is the chief butt of the earlier wise men, seems here to have disappeared, and it is the Fool who bears the brunt of the whole attack. He naïvely complains that he has no friends, those even that eat his bread scorning to thank him. His discourse has no more consistency than the changing moon; his laughter is the wantonness of sin; his oaths make the hair stand on end. His thoughts go round and round like a cart wheel; his heart is in his mouth, whereas a wise man's mouth is his heart. To teach the Fool is as impossible as to glue together a broken potsherd, or to discourse to one who slumbers and will presently awake and ask what it is all about. Sand, salt, lead, a mass of iron, are all figures to express the oppressiveness of the Fool's company. Seven days are the days of mourning for the dead: but for a Fool all the days of his life.

In contradistinction to all this wisdom is a thing of long and earnest pursuit. The follower of Wisdom must be as one that tracketh, prying in at her windows, fastening a nail in her walls.

> At the first she will walk with him in crooked ways, and will bring fear and dread upon him, and torment him with her discipline, until she may trust his > soul, and try him by her judgements: then will she return again the straight way unto him, and will gladden him, and reveal to him her secrets.

There is an approach to a formulated conception of wisdom. Moral and intellectual knowledge are not to be separated: praise is not comely for the sinner, and he can never become wise, because he abominates that godliness which is the sole way to wisdom (i. 25). One essay (xix. 20) traces various counterfeit forms of wisdom. The knowledge of evil is not wisdom, and the pleasantries of fools are not wit. Wisdom is not found in the exquisite subtilty that amounts to injustice; nor in violence of judgement and reproof; nor in the prosperity and adversity which are really the opposites of what they seem. One of the longest and most highly finished of all the essays is devoted to a distinction between two kinds of wisdom (xxxviii. 24): the wisdom of the busy and the wisdom of the man of leisure. The agricultural toiler, the skilled graver of signets, the smith sweating at his furnace, the artistic potter — all that thus put their trust in their hands are wise in their work: these maintain the fabric of the world, and in the handywork of their craft is their prayer. But these shall not declare wisdom, and where parables are they shall not be found. To these is opposed the man that hath applied his soul, and meditated in the law of the Most High. He shall pour forth wisdom, and in prayer give thanks: but even he only "if the great Lord will."

The Book of Proverbs was concerned, not only with the contending wisdom and folly, but also with the 'judgement' that was daily deciding between them. Similarly in this work we have warnings against the sowing on the furrows of unrighteousness and the sevenfold reaping that ensues. But as we noticed a partial formulation of the idea of wisdom, so we may note an approach to a theory of providence. The great perplexity of ancient thought was the visible prosperity of the sinner. Ecclesiasticus emphatically asserts (xi. 11) that prosperity and adversity are from the Lord. What appearance there is to the contrary can easily be met by a sudden reversal at the end.

> In the day of good things there is a forgetfulness of evil things; and in the day of evil things a man will not remember things that are good. For it is an easy thing in the sight of the Lord to reward a man in the day of death according to his ways. The affliction of an hour causeth forgetfulness of delight; and in the last end of a man is the revelation of his deeds.

Yet another loophole is offered for escape from the difficulty of appearances: that a man shall be known in his children. Another essay (xvi. 1) proclaims that there is no safety for sinners in their numbers; as little in their insignificance: "There is a tempest which no man shall see; yea, the more part of his works are hid."

Is there any scepticism in Ecclesiasticus, such as even in Proverbs was for a moment revealed by the sonnet of Agur? It must be remembered of course that the present work is not a collection only, but the work of a single author, who has arranged and modified where he did not himself compose. I think Professor Cheyne goes too far in saying that the author of this book is no more troubled by doubts than the writer of the introduction to Proverbs. His personal faith is indeed unwavering; but his wording, compared with the earlier work, suggests the believer who has had to confront objectors. Hence in the essay quoted above the emphasis placed upon final reversals of fortune, and the suggestion of the next generation as a still further chance for the revelation of the ungodly. Of the same sort is a curious analogy which the son of Sirach sets himself to trace (xxxiii. 7): the perplexing inequalities among mankind are referred to the absolute will of God, in the same way that God has created days of honour and days of dishonour, though his sun illumines alike all the days of the year. More important still is the preface to Book IV. It contends that all things have their seasons; all things (including evil) have their uses; all the works of the Lord will be approved in their seasons. The form is rhetoric encomium; but this veils a theory of providence generated by the necessity of meeting difficulties — the very philosophy of times and seasons which, stated as a formal theory, Ecclesiastes sets himself to overthrow.

In the introduction to the Book of Proverbs I pointed out the comparative absence of two leading topics of modern thought — religion and politics. In Ecclesiasticus there is even less of politics: only one essay (ix. 17) can be ranked under this head, an essay in which the scribe, or instructed man, is described as the artificer of the work of good government. But much more space is given in this book to the topic of religion. Not to speak of the hymns of adoration, there are exclamations against hypocrisy in public worship; and the recognition of dues to the priest is enumerated among the duties of a household. A great essay (xxxiv. 18) is devoted to the subject of sacrifice. It breathes the spirit of the fiftieth psalm, that sacrifice unaccompanied by righteousness is impious. It adds the duty of offering with cheerfulness; and concludes with the power of humble prayer. A prayer for afflicted Israel follows; and the collection contains another prayer for purity of lips and heart (xxii. 27). There is doctrine in this work, as well as the religious spirit. I must say that the references found by many commentators to specific points of theology — such as angelology, the Satan, Messianic hopes — are by no means clear to me. And there can be no doubt that the doctrine of the resurrection and future life forms no part of the system of this writer; there is no reference to it which is not, to say the least, ambiguous, and on the other hand the author is constantly relying on sanctions of another kind — the judgment implied in the close of a sinner's life, the yet later judgment on his children, the prize of a good name to last beyond death. But positive doctrine is not wanting. There is an emphatic assertion (xv. 11) of free will: God hath set fire and water before man, and he shall stretch forth his hand unto whichsoever he will; man has been left in the hand of his own counsel. And one essay (xvi. 24) seems to contain a complete creed of the son of Sirach, though a creed that is rhetoric rather than dogmatic in form. One paragraph proclaims God as the creator of the universe; the next as the creator of responsible man; this responsibility implies infirmity and the consequent necessity for repentance; a climax is found in the omnipotence that passes into mercy.

> As a drop of water from the sea, and a pebble from the sand, so are a few years in the days of eternity. For this cause the Lord was longsuffering over them, and poured out his mercy upon them. . . . The mercy of a man is upon his neighbour; but the mercy of the Lord is upon all flesh.

Coming to the topic of conduct we find, as we should expect, a more rounded treatment of particular subjects than was seen in Proverbs. In the essay on Meekness (iii. 17), though the individual sentences have the form of precepts, yet their effect is to frame a complete conception of the virtue out of its opposition to self-exaltation, to intellectual anxiety, to fussiness, and to stubbornness and unrepentance. Pride is elaborately treated (x. 6): it is a disease, the cause of mutations in states and the lives of individuals; not human distinctions but meekness and inner qualities make true honour, and none is greater than he that feareth the Lord. Niggardliness is presented as the envy of self. Temperance is connected with the despising of small things. Temporal ambition seeking office without regard to fitness is put in the same category with the spiritual ambition of self-justification in prayer (vii. 4). The government of the tongue has a large place in the writer's thoughts, and his strongest language is reserved for sins of the flesh. One more topic may be mentioned in this connection, that of Friendship, which covers four different essays. Friendship is exalted as the medicine of life: nothing may be taken in exchange for a friend. But friends need proving; "let those that be at peace with thee be many, but thy counsellors one of a thousand." Irritable behaviour and the revealing of secrets will break up friendship as surely as a stone will fray away the birds.

> Is there not a grief in it, even unto death, when a companion and friend is turned to enmity? O wicked imagination, whence camest thou rolling in to cover the dry land with deceitfulness?

On the whole, however, the book contains, not so much general ethical notions as the particular applications of them which we call behaviour. One essay deals with duties to parents; others with duties to the poor; one with the general duty of a householder, including observances of religion, charity, and social intercourse. There is one budget of advice (xi. 29) on the choice of company; another (viii. 1) prescribes in the widest sense the proper behaviour towards all kinds of men, ending with the importance of reading character: "as well as thou canst, guess at thy neighbours." What will strike a modern reader most in this part of the subject is that the separation has not yet taken place between ethic and economic ideas, between manners and morals. He will find discussion of lying, of meddlesomeness, of the bashfulness that destroys a soul, of the graciousness which is like the dew assuaging the scorching heat: and side by side with these he will read about the expediency of getting round influential people with the gifts that blind the eyes and muzzle the reproving mouth. In the long essay on Feasting (xxxi. 12), the first paragraph prescribes table manners:

> Stretch not thy hand whithersoever it looketh, and thrust not thyself with it into the dish.

The next is occupied with the importance to health of moderation in eating, and especially of activity:

> Hear me, my son, and despise me not, and at the last thou shalt find my word true: in all thy works be quick, and no disease shall come unto thee.

Then comes a paragraph recommending liberal hospitality; then a protest against talking of business matters to one encountered at a feast. Modesty in exercising the office of president follows; then come general principles to regulate conversation at table; a detail of this section proclaims the value of music at a banquet, and insists upon the bad manners of talking while music is going on. Elsewhere elementary purity and honesty stand side by side with the fault of leaning on the elbow, or omitting to salute. There is a strong insistence upon accuracy in keeping accounts; but it is to be found — along with celebration of the Law and precepts for the correction of children — in the essay on Things to be ashamed of (xli. 14). What economic notions there are of course belong to those of primitive society.

> A sinner that falleth into suretiship, and undertaketh contracts for work, shall fall into lawsuits.

The notion of a loan as an advantage to the lender as well as the borrower has not yet appeared; lending and suretiship are treated (xxix. 1) as acts of kindness, but acts of kindness that are risky, and the writer becomes modern enough when he describes the ways of debtors

> Many have reckoned a loan as a windfall, and have given trouble to those that helped them. Till he hath received he will kiss a man's hands; and for his > neighbour's money he will speak submissly; and when payment is due he will prolong the time, and return words of heaviness, and complain of the times. If he prevail, he shall hardly receive the half, and he will count it as a windfall.

Apart from specific directions for conduct, there is a contemplation of life and experience in general. The dignity of work is asserted; death is pronounced better than the dependence of a life looking to the table of another man. Want, it is observed, may be a preventive against sin and an uneasy conscience; on the other hand a mercantile life is a life of constant temptation.

> A nail will stick fast between the joinings of stones; and sin will thrust itself in between buying and selling.

The topic of women is variously treated. The Queen of Sheba seems to have left no successor amongst the wise men, and there is a lordly superiority in the way the son of Sirach considers all women available, though not all equally worth having.

> A woman will receive any man; but one daughter is better than another.

He easily slips into the subject of woman's frailty, and seems to think (xlii. 9) of a father's duty to a daughter as that of constantly watching against her sins. On the other hand, when home is the topic, the strongest writing is used to exalt the good wife. More than this: woman's influence on man is treated as a necessity; a short essay (xxix. 21) is devoted to the blessing of possessing a house of one's own, and another (xxxvi. 21) scorns the unsettled single life as that of a nimble robber, skipping from city to city, lodging nestless wheresoever he findeth himself at nightfall. Health is in Ecclesiasticus treated as something beyond riches; and principles are laid down for regulation of life in health and in sickness. Dreams are pronounced vanity (xxxiv. 1), with a reservation for those that may have been sent from the Lord. A beautiful essay (xl. 1) dwells upon the burden of life, pressing on all men from the day of their coming forth from their mother's womb, until the day for their burial in the mother of all things; even sleep is not free from this oppression.

> A little or nothing is his resting, and afterward in his sleep, as in a day of keeping watch, he is troubled in the vision of his heart, as one that hath escaped from the front of battle. In the very time of his deliverance he awaketh, and marvelleth that the fear is nought.

Finally there is a sonnet on Death (xli. 1), as the dread of the happy, the longed-for goal of the miserable and failing, and the sentence from the Most High over all flesh.

To the topics of earlier literature Ecclesiasticus makes a notable addition in history. But this history, like the general idea of wisdom, is treated in the tone of celebration, not of reflection. "Let us now praise famous men," is the introduction to the longest of the rhetoric encomia; as in English literature the early Baconian 'wisdom' led in time to the Worthies of Fuller, so this second work of Wisdom literature ends with a succession of Hebrew Worthies. The list extends from Enoch to Hezekiah and Josiah, to Zerubbabel and other leaders of the return from exile; when it seems to be concluded it reopens to make mention of Simon son of Onias, and to describe the splendour of Temple service with a vividness which has suggested to some commentators the enthusiasm of an eye-witness. The style is the flowing rhetoric of delighted recollection; and in my notes * I have pointed out passages which suggest to me the possibility of quotations from historic hymns. There is no criticism of persons or events, beyond the accepted commonplace of the unhappy end of Solomon. It was reserved for the final book of Wisdom literature to marshal the history of the chosen people so as to read into it a theory of Divine providence.

The style of our author is sufficiently described when it is recognised as the gradual transition from the stiffness of the gnomic sentence to the flowing rhetoric which delights to accumulate parallel sentences as an end in itself. Imagery and other striking forms of expression abound. The sway of unjust wrath is its downfall; a proud heart has rooted a plant of wickedness in its owner; he who refuses to confess his sins forces the current of the river; self-will dries up the soul like a withering tree; aged feet climbing up a sandy way make an image for a man weighted with an unworthy wife. The gossiping fool 'travails' with his news; again it is said:

> Hast thou heard a word? let it die with thee: be of good courage, it will not burst thee.

The images of the spark, the whip, the hedge, are effectively applied to the tongue (xxviii. 12); the impalpable dream is touched with a profusion of shadowy comparisons.

> Dreams give wings to fools. As one that catcheth at a shadow, and followeth after the wind, so is he that setteth his mind on dreams. The vision of dreams is as this thing against that, the likeness of a face over against a face.

The most figurative writing is to be found in the encomium on the Works of the Lord (xlii. 15). The falling snow is like the lighting of the locust, the hoar frost congeals as points of thorns; the cold north wind devours the mountains, burns up the wild, and consumes the green herb as fire; as it passes, every gathering together of waters puts on as it were a breastplate.

Resemblances in Ecclesiasticus to other literature will strike every reader; they may not be defined enough to afford a basis of argument, but they will awaken a curious interest. One would have felt sure that the suggestion of gratitude as a sense of favours to come was the product of modern cynicism: but the son of Sirach urges this gravely.

> He that requiteth good turns is mindful of that which cometh afterward. (iii. 31)

It is startling to find closing one of these wisdom essays (xi. 28) the familiar Greek warning: Call no man happy before his death. The reference (xii. 11) to the wiping of a bronze mirror reminds of the famous passage in the Agamemnon; the comparison of the pot and the jar belongs to a fable of Æsop; the likening of the generations of men to the leaves (xiv. 18) calls up the similar use of the image in Homer; the advice to make a door and bar for the mouth (xxviii. 24) suggests the Homeric 'pinfold of the mouth.' St. James is unquestionably under great obligations to Ecclesiasticus; his essay on the Responsibility of Speech is almost a mosaic of quotations. There is a suggestion of still more important influence. When we read the proverb (xxi. 10) —

> The way of sinners is made smooth with stones;
> And at the last end thereof is the pit of Hades —

we cannot help thinking of the "broad road that leadeth to destruction." And two other passages of Ecclesiasticus call up two of the parables of Christ.

> There is that waxeth rich by his wariness and pinching, and this is the portion of his reward: when he saith, I have found rest, and now will I eat of my goods — yet he knoweth not what time shall pass, and he shall leave them to others, and die. (xi. 18)

> Forgive thy neighbour the hurt that he hath done thee; and then thy sins shall be pardoned when thou prayest. Man cherisheth anger against man; and doth he seek healing from the Lord? Upon a man like himself he hath no mercy; and doth he make supplication for his own sins? He being himself flesh nourisheth wrath: who shall make atonement for his sins? (xxviii. 2)

The Apocrypha has disappeared from our modern bibles; and to the ordinary reader of the present generation Ecclesiasticus is almost an unknown book. Within a few years only the Revised Version has again made it accessible to him: how far he will be attracted to it I would not undertake to predict. It is a far cry from Bacon to Martin Tupper: yet Ecclesiasticus has affinities with both. In English literature it was Bacon that developed into Tupper: Ecclesiasticus represents a progression which is as if Martin Tupper developed into Bacon. To those who like their literary food spiced with humour it may be said that the son of Sirach makes the nearest approach to humour in a literature which the absence of that quality distinguishes from the other greatest literatures of the world. Formal philosophy has at least an historic interest in the widening survey of life which yet stops short of the questioning of life's difficulties. And the reader sensitive to literary form cannot fail to feel attracted by a work presenting such varieties of form: from the unit proverbs still collected to fill gaps, through the intermediary epigrams and maxims, to sonnets and monologues having the charm of highest poetry, and essays and encomia which, over and above the force of their shrewd and reverent thought, offer the constant attraction of watching a style in the act of developing.

Ecclesiastes and The Wisdom of Solomon

The biblical Ecclesiastes and the apocryphal Wisdom of Solomon should be studied together. While they have their respective places in the development of Wisdom literature, yet from the two works previously introduced they stand separated by a gulf as wide as that between primitive and modern thought. Proverbs and Ecclesiasticus, with all their force and beauty, belong to Hebrew literature; the writings now to be considered form a part of that world literature which is independent of time and nation. In their thought the two works are contrasted to the extent of being antagonistic. But this antagonism is itself a unity; we have here Semitic religious tradition and speculative Greek thought struggling together over the supreme human problems of immortality and Divine providence. No literary styles could be more unlike than those of Ecclesiastes and Wisdom. The one carries to an extreme the indefinite suggestiveness of Hebrew; in the other there is a minuteness of analysis that goes beyond that of classical Greek philosophy. Yet the two agree in casting a spell of fascination over every reader; a spell nowise diminished by the fact that in Ecclesiastes every second sentence is a literary puzzle, nor by the rebellious spirit with which the reader of Wisdom follows the plunges of his author from passages of the noblest eloquence to subtilties of inference or analogy which delight to delay an argument in full course. Such agreement and contrast make reason enough for studying Ecclesiastes and Wisdom together; a more important reason yet is the fact that a leading point in their interpretation is the question whether one of the two is not a veiled answer to the other.

Our consideration of these works is at the outset encountered by a critical obstacle of an unusual kind. I have laid down as a principle of the present work, that I consider it unnecessary to introduce historic questions of authorship and date in an edition that aims only at literary appreciation. But obviously an exception must be made where a mistaken view of authorship has been allowed to come in as a disturbing force and throw a false colour over the interpretation of a classic. This I believe to have been the case in regard to the traditional view that Ecclesiastes was written by King Solomon. In this question all the considerations from which authorship is usually inferred — local and historic colour, position in literary development, minutiæ of language which fix the date of a book as clearly as handwriting betrays the age of a manuscript — all are on one side, and point to a period of writing centuries later than Solomon. On the other side there is only a single argument. But this is an argument which, if it could be maintained, might outweigh all the rest: for it is the plea that the book itself distinctly asserts that Solomon is its author. If this be true, he would be a bold critic who would run counter to such an assertion, and proclaim a work like Ecclesiastes to be a literary fraud. What I desire to show is that, when the whole is carefully studied, the words supposed to proclaim the Solomonic authorship are capable of an entirely different interpretation.

As a preliminary to all interpretation the exact literary form of the work must be settled. Ecclesiastes is not a book with a continuous argument, but is a miscellany of wisdom: made up of a number of reasoned compositions, such as I designate essays, and also strings of disconnected brevities — maxims, epigrams, unit proverbs. In these respects the work agrees with Proverbs and Ecclesiasticus; but it has one important point of difference from them. In Ecclesiastes the essays, though each is an independent composition, unite in a common drift of thought; and they are further bound into a unity by a prologue and epilogue. This again is what we might expect. The entirely isolated observations which make up the matter of Proverbs were, in Ecclesiasticus, found so far drawn together as to be grouped into 'essays.' In Ecclesiastes there is a further advance, and all the essays are drawn together into a sequence. But this is not inconsistent with the fact that here, as in Ecclesiasticus, disconnected sayings are used to fill in gaps between the more important compositions.

This recognition in Ecclesiastes of portions of the whole as outside the general argument must not be dismissed as an example of that vicious criticism which, in analysing a book, forms a theory and then pronounces spurious those passages which do not harmonise with it. Partly of course this determination of the technical form of the work is based on internal evidence, and I must leave the arrangement presented above to speak for itself. But it is further supported by the analogy of the other books of wisdom which display the same features. A more important confirmation still is the passage of the epilogue in which the author describes the contents of his work.

> And further, because the Preacher was wise, he still taught the people knowledge; yea, he pondered, and sought out, and set in order many proverbs.

'Pondered' suggests original composition, and it is unnecessary to remark that a large part of this work bears the impress of a highly individual thinker. 'Sought out' may well mean borrowing from others; there are not a few of the miscellaneous sayings which lack the peculiarities of expression that characterise the book as a whole, and may be supposed to have been borrowed from others. 'Set in order' describes the careful disposition of the parts between a prologue and epilogue which bind them together. The author goes on to state his conception of the limits of philosophic writing.

> The words of the wise are as goads, and as nails well fastened are the words of the collectors of sentences, which are given from one shepherd. And as for more than these, my son, be warned: of making many books there is no end; and much study is a weariness of the flesh.

The purpose of the whole of Ecclesiastes has been to serve as 'goads,' or stimulus, to wise conduct; and the image of 'nails well fastened' fits in with the special purpose of Essay IV — to secure in pithy notes those results of detail which wise thinking has yielded, in the absence of power to solve the mystery of the whole. Thus to invent and collect, and by arrangement to stamp the whole with the individuality of a single mind — a flock gathered by a single 'shepherd' — this represents to our author the furthest limits to which philosophy can safely go. When he proceeds to warn against what is 'more than these,' it is surely not straining his words to see in them protests against books which in continuous argument pretend to solve the whole mystery of things, the impossibility of which is the chief thought of Ecclesiastes.

With the form of the work thus determined as a suite of five essays, separated by miscellaneous sayings, and bound together by a prologue and epilogue, we are prepared to consider the question whether this Ecclesiastes asserts itself as the composition of Solomon. When we turn to the prologue and epilogue, where it is most natural to expect light on the authorship of a work, we find not a single mention of Solomon, nor anything to suggest his personality. Indeed, so markedly is this absent from the epilogue, that those who hold the traditional view are driven to doubting the authenticity of these final sentences. Again, there is no suggestion of Solomon in the miscellaneous sayings, nor in four out of the five essays. On the contrary, there are in these portions of the book several passages which it is difficult to fancy the historic Solomon as writing; and his general tone as he describes life is that of one who endures the oppression of the powerful, or at least sympathises with such suffering, rather than that of one who has held power in his own hands. The connection with Solomon is wholly confined* to what is here called the first essay (from verse 12 of chapter I to the end of chapter II in the biblical arrangement); but this portion of the book is entirely occupied with Solomon. It will be urged that if this section is from the pen of Solomon then the general unity of connection between this and the other sections will extend the Solomonic authorship over the whole work. This is a fair argument; but on the other hand, if it can be shown that the words supposed to assert authorship are susceptible of another interpretation, then this confinement of the personal matter to a single essay will become a consideration of great importance.

This essay opens with the words, "I the Preacher was king over Israel in Jerusalem"; and proceeds to narrate a survey of life and all its good things. It is quite natural for a modern reader, in whose mind the idea of individual authorship is a matter of course, to understand these words as announcing the writer of what he is about to read. But to the student of Comparative Literature the expression will be equally suggestive of another meaning — that this King Solomon is not the author but the hero of what is to follow. A modern philosopher as a matter of course gives out what he is to say in his own name. But it was a frequent custom in the literatures of antiquity to clothe a philosopher's thinking under some dramatic personality. Thus Plato never speaks in his own name, but puts his thoughts into the mouth of Socrates in dialogue with other personages; no one supposing that Socrates said what is thus attributed to him, but the writer conveying to all that he regards himself as of the school of Socrates. The Pythagoreans made it such a point of honour to speak their thoughts in the name of their common master, that they regarded the violent death of one of their number as a judgment on him for the selfishness of speaking in his own name. To how large an extent the same spirit prevailed among the wise men of the Hebrews is powerfully suggested by a passage of the Palestinian Talmud, which says that

* I have not thought it necessary to refer to the sub-title: on which see below, page 1636.

"Scripture, Mishnah, and Talmud, and Agadah, and even that which the diligent scholar was destined to point out before his master, were already spoken to Moses from Sinai." * In the Bible itself we are able to see how much more prominent to its arrangers is the matter of the book than its authorship, in the fact that the titles (outside prophecy) reflect the former; the Books of Job, of Ruth, of Esther, of Joshua, of Judges, of Samuel, of Kings, are works of which these personages are heroes, not authors. But there is a parallel closer at hand. This very companion work to Ecclesiastes, which is written in Greek, and belongs to a date not far removed from the Christian era, nevertheless is found to use the same personality of Solomon; its middle essay — like this first essay of Ecclesiastes — narrating in the first person an incident of the historic Solomon, and on it as a text preaching in his name to other kings; while this personality, which has not appeared until that part of the book, is dropped when its purpose has been served. In precisely the same way, the author of Ecclesiastes in this essay identifies himself for the moment with Solomon, in order to picture an imaginary experiment which could have been fully carried out only by Solomon, as the one personage who united the supreme forms of wealth, of wisdom, and of power.

It seems reasonable, then, alike from literary usage and force of context, to understand in the opening words of this first essay a reference to something other than authorship. We now catch the significance of the circumstance that outside this particular section no trace of Solomon appears throughout the whole book. We must remember again how the whole weight of internal evidence is found by experts to tend in the opposite direction; so much so that one of the most eminent of them has made the remark that if Ecclesiastes be by Solomon there can be no such thing as a history of the Hebrew language. In view of all these considerations it becomes necessary to dismiss altogether the Solomonic authorship of Ecclesiastes as a misunderstanding coming down to us by tradition from an uncritical age.

Who the author of the book was, and what is its age, I do not care to discuss. All that I have been anxious about has been to remove, even for the least critical reader, the great obstacle to the understanding of Ecclesiastes which the mistake as to its authorship has interposed. I believe no great work has ever been so much misunderstood in its whole spirit as this present book of wisdom. Commentators have come to it with the preconceived idea that they were to read the pessimism of a broken-spirited debauchee; and what writing is strong enough to fight against a preconceived idea of interpretation? Those who will resolutely dismiss from their minds associations with the personality of Solomon will, I believe, as they follow the work be able to catch a spirit of a totally different kind.

When we approach Ecclesiastes from the side of the scriptural philosophy contained in the various books of Wisdom, we find that a great change has come over the spirit of Wisdom literature. The wisdom of Proverbs and Ecclesiasticus united two ideas: the wise observation which should guide conduct, and the sense of divine harmony in all things which continually presents itself as a theme for adoration. In Ecclesiastes we find that a violent divorce has taken place between these two conceptions. As regards wise conduct our author is as devout as his predecessors. But 'wisdom' as a name for the grand harmony of all things has disappeared; and in its place has emerged an idea expressed by the characteristic word 'vanity.' The word 'wisdom' is indeed used for the harmony of the whole in a few negative passages that express the failure to find it; but for the most part there is a studious substitution for it of other terms, such as "the work that God hath done from the beginning even to the end." There is further the significant use of the expression "all things" — "all things are vanity," "all things are full of weariness" — to convey what seems a broken unity. And adoration has disappeared; reflection nas been turned upon the harmony of the universe, and the writer finds only a mystery which he despairs of solving.

The prevailing impression of Ecclesiastes is that it is wholly made up of this despair. But if we follow the writer through his sequence of essays, we shall find how he sways between the negative failure to interpret the universe, and certain positive thoughts, which, though subordinate, are yet steadily gaining ground as the thinker proceeds from his commencement to his conclusion.

The Prologue is wholly negative. The totality of things is incomprehensible — a vanity of vanities — and the effort to interpret it is so much lost labour. In the things of nature there is no movement which is not movement in a circle; in human inquiry there is no attainment nor satisfaction. In the succession of events there is no advance, and in the succession of the generations of mankind there is no continuance, or 'remembrance' of one generation by another.

Then we get the First Essay, in which the author takes up the personality of the historic Solomon, as the individual endowed by tradition with the combination of all objects of human envy, in order to describe an imaginary experiment, by which the several kinds of good things are to be successively subjected to review, with the only result that each will be found wanting. First, Solomon is supposed to accumulate all possible objects of pleasure, including those that their enemies would call follies; but all through he is to retain his 'wisdom' or power to analyse. The experiment is supposed successful as an experiment: for his heart does rejoice because of all his labour. But this is his only 'portion' from it; for when he comes to make his survey, all proves 'vanity.'

Next, Solomon is to turn reflection on to wisdom itself, together with its opposite, madness and folly, to see if here any genuine satisfaction is to be found. He sees at once that wisdom excels its opposite as light excels darkness; but this is neutralised by the further consideration that one event of death awaits the two. Next he analyses 'labour' — the production of goods as distinguished from the pleasure which consists in consuming them. But this again appears hateful in the light of death, and the necessity of leaving to another, who may prove to be a fool. There is yet a fourth question before Solomon's experiment will have been exhaustive: may wisdom be found in appreciating the process, as distinguished from the result, whether of pleasure-making or labour? But the thought occurs that this power of appreciating life as it passes is a special gift of God, and does not depend upon the individual himself. The fancied survey has in all its departments ended in illusion.

This first essay then is negative, with one positive thought — that natural happiness, or the appreciation of life as it passes, is a special gift from God.

The Second Essay might be entitled, "The Philosophy of Times and Seasons." A particular theory of life is brought up for examination. It seems very likely that the writer has in mind the preface to the fourth book of Ecclesiasticus; but the terms are not precise enough for us to insist upon this. The point of the theory is that the sphere of wisdom does not lie in the Whole but in the Parts; that all things have an interest of their own — have their 'seasons' — and that here may be found an interpretation of life which may stand testing as 'wisdom.' Having stated this view in the form of a sonnet, the Preacher proceeds to meet it with four objections. First, it is true that the parts have an inherent interest of their own; but equally inherent and God-implanted in man is the questioning of the universal — he hath set the 'world' in their heart — and this is a questioning which makes satisfaction impossible. Further, this appreciation of the interest in the details of passing life is a God-given thing, and God will act upon fixed principles which no effort of the individual will ever alter. A third consideration is that the 'seasons' of things are seen reversed: wickedness is seen in the place of judgment. A momentary thought suggests — Does not this imply an hereafter in which all these things will be set right? The thought is dismissed: the facts may equally suggest that there is no difference between man and the beasts in the final event; death is the end of all alike. As a fourth objection comes the thought of those things which no 'season' can make interesting; and with a gloomy picture of oppression, envy, and failure this second essay comes to an end.

It has been negative in its general spirit, like the first. But the positive thought of that first essay — that true happiness is the gift only of God — has been repeated with emphasis.

The Third Essay is on the Vanity of Desire. Attainment without satisfaction, attainment followed by hurt and final failure, desire prompting effort only to encounter limitations inherent in humanity itself, while the knowledge of what is truly desirable will be given only by a future which the short life will never see: all these topics are briefly touched. But the place of prominence in this essay is devoted to two companion pictures: on the one hand is exhibited God-given wealth with God-given satisfaction in it, and on the other hand the same wealth granted by God and the satisfaction withheld. This last is pronounced the worst of all fates — an untimely birth is better than he. By contrast we may say that the other side of the picture presents the highest human good; and this is nothing else than the natural, God-given happiness which the previous essays have emphasised.

The Fourth Essay starts with the impossibility of reaching the 'wisdom' that is so far off and so exceeding deep; but recognises an employment yet left for the wise — to search out what distinctions of things are possible to be made, as if notes by the way to a wisdom the traveller never expects to reach. The essay is entirely in the form of such disconnected notes. The mournful mysteries and paradoxes of our existence are passed in review by our author, each touched with his marvellous felicity of descriptive suggestion. Only two paragraphs need be noted here. In one he has been describing the spectacle of the oppressor and his innocent victim coming to the same end of death and oblivion, and how such impunity of evil causes the hearts of the sons of men to be fully set in them to do evil. He continues:

> Though a sinner do evil an hundred times, and prolong his days, yet surely I know that it shall be well with them that fear God, which fear before him: but it shall not be well with the wicked, neither shall he prolong his days, which are as a shadow; because he feareth not before God.

In the other case the Preacher breaks away from his gloomy thoughts, to apostrophise in a tone of rapture the man who has found natural happiness.

> Go thy way, eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart; for God hath already accepted thy works.

In this fourth essay then, notwithstanding its general tone of gloom and despair, the writer recognises again the wholesome enjoyment of life, and how it constitutes God's special stamp of approval. And this positive thought is reinforced by another; that, in spite of all appearances to the contrary, it cannot be other than well with the righteous and evil with the wicked.

When we come to the Fifth Essay, the positive tone has triumphed over the negative, and made it subservient.

> Truly the light is sweet, and a pleasant thing it is for the eyes to behold the sun.

Life is a thing of joy. But it is a joy shadowed by 'vanity': the gloomy mystery of life is to emphasise its happiness. The coming days of vanity are a reason for cherishing life while it lasts; the coming days of feebleness a reason for a more early recognition of the Creator.

The Epilogue gathers up the results. The totality of things is incomprehensible. The function of wisdom, on its theoretic side, is limited: wise thoughts may be collected on the details, but to go further and attempt the mystery of the whole is lost labour. And on its practical side, all duty is summed up in one conception — human works within the limits of God's commandments.

The whole thought of Ecclesiastes is now before us. Its negative side is the abandonment of the mystery of the universe as insoluble. Its positive thoughts are two — immovable faith in God and duty, and sympathy with natural happiness. I believe a prejudice has been created against the system of Ecclesiastes — especially with those who have had the idea of Solomon in their minds — by the repeated occurrence of such words as 'eat and drink,' 'mirth,' 'be merry'; and they have felt that its philosophy could be summed up in the saying, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." But this is to be misled by a mere feature of literary style. A marked characteristic of Ecclesiastes is its use of symbolic phrases; the final essay terminates in a tour-de-force of symbolism by which all the infirmities of old age are worked up into a picture of beauty.* Now, just as this writer uses such expressions as 'under the sun' over and over again as a formula for the world of the actual, so the phrase 'eat and drink' is his regular formula to express, not only what is sensuous, but all appreciation of what life brings. This may be traced by a careful reader always, but it becomes indubitable where the expression 'eat and drink' is applied to riches and to labour, and even to honour:

> — a man to whom God giveth riches, wealth, and honour, so that he lacketh nothing for his soul of all that he desireth, yet God giveth him not power to eat thereof, etc.

There is throughout no note of abandonment to the revel, but the thought is always of simple satisfaction with the play of life: and this it is which the Preacher considers the special gift of God to his chosen. I say boldly that there is nothing unwholesome in Ecclesiastes. The tradition of Hebrew and Christian religion has in actual fact laid too much stress on the sterner side of things; it is good that at least one of the sacred canon should be found to remind us that one duty of life is happiness, and that nothing in religion can be higher than praise. We should have expected such doctrine from a system of thought in which had been incorporated some simple theory of providence. But to find a thinker whose analysis of the universe has broken down in perplexity, yet clinging resolutely to the ideas of God and duty, and keeping his sympathies with happiness fresh — it is this which makes the chief charm of Ecclesiastes as an item in the world's great literature.

But it may be asked, Is there nothing ignoble in the pessimism which, with such painful iteration, insists on linking man with the beasts in their subjection to the common enemy death? Pessimism there is, but surely nothing ignoble. For it is impossible to read Ecclesiastes without seeing that the writer is one who longs to believe in a future, which absence of evidence forces him to reject; as he presses his search for intellectual satisfaction it is the hand of death which he finds closing up every avenue of thought along which he has attempted to trace wisdom. The passionate tone with which he dwells upon the topic of mortality is prompted by the sense of honour, which will make a man judge with special severity the evidence of what it is his interest to believe. It is however this despair of anything beyond the grave which makes the main point of conflict between Ecclesiastes and the companion work which has yet to be considered.

* Compare the note On Formulæ: below, page, 1536.

In its literary form The Wisdom of Solomon is peculiar, not to say unique. It is a series of Discourses on texts. The texts are gnomic sentences standing out in their independence from the surrounding matter, in which the clauses are, after the manner of Greek prose, bound together in the closest relation by connecting particles. Such discourses are an expansion of the maxims, which — as I have used the term in this work — consist of prose comments on gnomic texts; and maxims of this kind form an important part of Wisdom literature.

Another feature of the present work is what may be styled Analytic Imagination: not the spontaneous picturing of scenes, of which Hebrew literature has its full share, but a conscious and artificial filling in of details into the outline of another writer. The Plagues of Darkness, of Hail, of the Smiting of the Firstborn, make passages of Wisdom which catch the attention of every reader. Exodus had been content to describe such events in brief though pregnant phrases. The present writer expands those phrases into elaborate and wonderful pictures, with touches that are the product of a reflecting mind turned upon the story of the older writer. It thus appears that this feature of Wisdom is of the nature of a comment on a text: in fact, we have here the intrusion of commentary into creative literature.

The next characteristic of the author of Wisdom is no less peculiar: he is the great master of the Digression. St. Paul, and St. John in his Gospel, make much use of digressions, and some of their noblest passages are to be ranked under that head. But with the present writer the digression seems to be an end in itself. In the long final discourse there appears an elaborate chain of digressions, and digressions from those digressions, and digressions removed a degree further still, like Chinese boxes one within another; when the last degree of removal has been reached, the writer returns regularly on his steps, picking up without fail the broken threads, and thus resuming his argument by steps as formal as those by which he had departed from it. In my notes will be found a Syllabus of the whole work, in which these transitions are accurately marked; and when the law has been caught, the clear thinking of our author is at once apparent. The spirit of digression appears again in what seem awkward parentheses as they stand in the text, but which fall into their natural proportions when they are treated — as I have ventured to treat them — by the modern device of footnotes. For what is a footnote but a digression? And footnotes and digressions alike are, to all intents and purposes, comments upon that portion of the text from which they branch off.

Of a similar kind is one more feature of this author's style. The discourses, though they are independent, are yet, so to speak, 'dove-tailed' together by the way in which the final thought of each leads directly to the next; in the case of the last two the texts are the concluding words of the discourse that precedes. The effect is that each successive composition is of the nature of a digression from the composition standing before it, but a digression which is expanded into an independent piece of writing.

Thus it appears how all the peculiar features of the present writer are variations of one conception, that of a comment on a text. Though I know of no parallel case, yet it is intelligible that such unique literary form should be the product of its age. The language of Wisdom is Greek, but it is a part of the literature of Palestine. Now, in the interval that separates between the Old and New Testament the chief literary activity was directed into the channel of oral comment on the law. The spirit of commentary has in this one work crystallised into literary form; and as its representative Wisdom will hold a permanent place in world literature.

The above are the morphological features of The Wisdom of Solomon. But another point must here be touched upon. The more the work is studied, the more interesting becomes the question whether it is not an answer — but always a veiled answer — to Ecclesiastes. The consideration of this point will force itself upon us as we survey the series of discourses.

The brief Opening Discourse is on Singleness of Heart: how crooked thoughts and murmuring words frighten wisdom away; while "that which holdeth all things together" must hear every secret utterance. At first sight it is difficult to see what is the purpose of this single paragraph, marked out by its form as a separate discourse. Why insist so strongly on the commonplace of the Divine omniscience? and why devote half the paragraph to 'secret murmuring,' which cannot be considered a characteristic vice of the 'judges of the earth' to whom the warning is addressed? But the passage becomes full of point if the author can be understood as glancing at the opening essay of Ecclesiastes. In that essay King Solomon was pictured as indulging his soul in all pleasures and 'follies,' only keeping his wisdom with him in order to try the philosophic worth of such a life. The present discourse pronounces such an experiment a contradiction in terms:

> Wisdom will not enter into a soul that deviseth evil, nor dwell in a body that is held in pledge by sin.

The 'murmuring' on which our author lays such stress may well be directed at the pessimism of the Preacher. The concluding thought, that such false speech 'destroyeth a soul,' forms a link to the next discourse.

In the Second Discourse the antagonism to Ecclesiastes stands more clearly revealed. Its very text speaks of a mistaken life "courting death"; and the first words of comment declare boldly that God made not death, that righteousness is immortal; it is ungodly men who by their words and life have "made a covenant with death." Their words are presented as an invitation to death in a monologue, in which the ungodly seem to be expanding phrases of the Preacher as they declare that their life is a chance, that there is no return from Hades; come then (they say) let us enjoy the good things that are; and from this they proceed to the further thought of persecuting the righteous because their ways are so different from their own. Is this a fair representation of Ecclesiastes? By no means, nor is it meant to be. It is not the Preacher himself that is attacked, but the easy perversion of his views of life which may be made by others. An exalted soul in spite of speculative despair clings to God and duty; but the same theory of life may be wrested by the ungodly to their destruction.

In one of his grand outbursts the author cries that the souls of the righteous are in the hands of God: thus turning against Ecclesiastes one of his own phrases (ix. 1). Their seeming death is but a trial of them; in the 'time of their visitation' there awaits them splendour, a position in the hierarchy of God, and the grace and mercy he reserves for his chosen.

At this point the tendency to digression appears. The author is going to supplement the monologue of the ungodly in this world with another monologue when they are awakened beyond the grave. But first he breaks off to notice the hopes of the ungodly, that is, the substitutes of earlier thought for this hope of immortality. These substitutes are two: life over again in posterity, and length of days in this world. As to the first, the brood of the ungodly is unstable and rests under a curse: better than this is childlessness with virtue. And again, the old age of the wicked is without honour; whereas (another noble passage declares) the life cut short may be the life crowned; made perfect in a short time, and caught away lest the bewitching of naughtiness should bedim innocence.

The author now returns from his digression: catching up the phrase 'grace and mercy to the chosen,' he paints the overthrow of the opponents of the righteous, how they are in the grave dishonoured carcases, and how for them comes a day of reckoning, when they behold their despised victims standing in great boldness and triumph. Another monologue expresses their amazement, and their sense of the vanity of that in which they had confided. Then the author speaks to emphasise the fleeting nature of all unholy hopes. But here an unexpected trend of thought is found. In a brilliant picture the author describes the whole creation uniting in vengeance — but on whom? Not. apparently, on the wicked themselves, who have thus been followed through their life on earth to a judgment beyond the grave, but on the general empire of wickedness upon earth: for the climax is that — > so shall lawlessness make all the land desolate, and their evil doing shall overturn the thrones of princes.

There follows naturally a warning to princes, whose greater responsibility will bring them greater punishment; and this makes the link leading to the third discourse. But meanwhile the question of the final condition of the wicked has been left unsettled.

In the Third Discourse the author has fully assumed the personality of Solomon, and in his name proposes to speak to other kings of wisdom: to speak without grudging, for wisdom desires the multiplication of the wise. Solomon is made to tell how he began with the helpless infancy of other men, and had to pray for the wisdom he sought. From his earliest youth he preferred this wisdom to all other good things.

Here comes one of the grand digressions. He preferred wisdom to all things; but in reality all good things came with her. In giving him this gift God gave him also the knowledge of all human and external nature.

> For himself gave me an unerring knowledge of the things that are: to know the constitution of the world, and the operation of the elements; the beginning and end and middle of times; the alternations of the solstices and the changes of seasons; the circuits of years and the positions of stars; the natures of living creatures and the ragings of wild beasts; the violences of winds and the thoughts of men; the diversities of plants and the virtues of roots. All things that are either secret or manifest I learned; for she that is the artificer of all things taught me, even wisdom.

This is a most important passage. The earliest wisdom was a reflection on human life: the 'works of God' in nature are mentioned only as a theme for praise. Ecclesiastes had touched external nature only to see in it a meaningless round of irresistible recurrence. But the above words imply that reflection and analysis have been brought to bear upon external nature; what to us is physical science has now become a part of wisdom.

But this digression is at once followed by another. We have seen how in the earlier writers 'wisdom' covered two ideas: wise conduct, and the adoration of the harmony that reigns in all things. In Ecclesiastes these two ideas had been divorced: the harmony of things was a mockery, and conduct was all that was left for wisdom. In this work the severed ideas are to be united more closely than ever: the wisdom that animates conduct and the wisdom that reigns through creation are one and the same. In the most famous passage of the book it is proclaimed how wisdom is all-pervasive, the spotless mirror of the working of God and an image of his goodness. Even Ecclesiastes had seen that wisdom excels folly as light excels darkness. For once the two thinkers are at one: being compared with light (says the present speaker) wisdom is found to be before it; for to the light of day succeedeth night, but against wisdom evil doth not prevail. She is indeed an effulgence from the everlasting light.

Returning from the digression, the discourse presents Solomon as repeating how he chose wisdom as his bride; for she would bring him riches, understanding, experience, glory abroad and rest at home. The only mode of obtaining this desire he thought to be prayer. Ecclesiastes had presented an imaginary incident of Solomon, though one in keeping with the traditional conception of this personage. But here the historic incident of the prayer at Gibeon fits the writer's purpose; and along the lines of that incident Solomon is represented as invoking the wisdom that cometh from on high. Closing with the impossibility of knowing God's will without wisdom, the prayer reaches the thought that, when in the past men did right, it was through wisdom that they were saved: and these words are the text of the discourse which follows.

The Fourth Discourse gives us briefly, what the close of Ecclesiasticus had treated at full length, a succession of the Worthies of Israel. But the purpose is very different; the present writer mentions famous men not to praise them, but to trace in their career the full conception of wisdom. The preceding discourse had brought together again the elements of wisdom which had been severed in Ecclesiastes: the subjective wisdom which reigns in individual conduct, and the objective wisdom which binds together the totality of things. The two are now seen side by side in the Fathers. The discourse touches Adam's self-conquest after his first transgression; Cain falling away from wisdom in his anger; Abraham kept firm under sharpest trial; Lot's wife passing wisdom by and perishing; wisdom entering into the soul of Moses and enabling him to withstand kings. It tells also of the external Power that preserved Adam when he was a lonely thing in the midst of the whole creation; that called righteous Abraham out of his land; that found a way of deliverance for righteous Lot; that watched over the wanderings of Jacob and the checkered career of Joseph; that wrought deliverance for the people of God and guided them along a marvellous way through the Red Sea. But the discourse does not divide the two conceptions of wisdom as I am doing here; there is design in the way the writer sways alternately from the one to the other wisdom as he traverses the succession of the Worthies, as if to insist the more closely upon the union he has in the last discourse proclaimed. When the conclusion is reached, the conception of the objective wisdom as providence stands fully revealed; and it is a detail of God's providential care over his people that makes the final words of this discourse, and the text of that which follows:

> By what things their foes were punished,
> By these they in their need were benefited.

The Fifth and last Discourse is wholly given up to tracing this aspect of Divine providence in the deliverance of Israel from Egypt. Seven illustrations of the principle are treated at full length. Water was turned into blood for the enemy; water was brought out of the solid rock for the people of God. On the Egyptians came a plague of loathly vermin; dainty quails were sent to satisfy the appetite of the Israelites. While the enemy were plagued to their death by the noxious bites of the locusts, the people of God suffered serpent bites only for admonition, and then found a wondrous salvation. Rain unquenched by fire destroyed the food of Egypt; a rain of manna fed the chosen in the wilderness, sweetly tempered to every taste. Mystic darkness oppressed the oppressors of Israel; for Israel darkness was illumined by a pillar of fire. It was a night of deliverance and song to the fathers, that night which slew the firstborn of Egypt. To the chosen death came indeed as a trial, but in the righteous Phinehas a champion was found; the ungodly ventured a final folly, and upon them came strange death without mercy.

The long digressions of which I have spoken are occupied with kindred themes: how sinners are punished in that wherein they have offended; how such measured punishment is the mercy of Omnipotence, leading even God's enemies to repentance; how all idolatry is folly, but there are degrees in that folly, of which the Egyptians in their worship of things hateful shewed the worst; the origin of idolatry is discussed, and its spread till it became a corruption of all life. This matter is rightly presented in the form of digression, for it is outside the strict thought of the text. But discourse and digression have kindred themes: the one celebrates providence, the other connects providence and God.

When we survey The Wisdom of Solomon as a whole, two impressions stand out from all others. One is the attitude which seems maintained throughout toward Ecclesiastes. The later work cannot be considered a direct answer to the earlier, because considerable part of the matter in each has nothing to represent it in the other. But the idea that the author of Wisdom has found a starting point in his antagonism to the thoughts of the Preacher seems forced upon us by the continual contrasts between the two works. Ecclesiastes had, without argument, insisted passionately on the limitation of life by the grave. Wisdom, equally without argument, assumes immortality as underlying its whole treatment of life. The Preacher, despairing of aught beyond death, rested his ideals on duty and happiness. The later work presents a picture of the ungodly using the same plea to justify their life of evil, and awaking beyond the grave to understand their folly. Ecclesiastes fancies Solomon undertaking an experiment in evil to see what it yields to wisdom. The other thinker hints how the very act of experiment is fatal to the wisdom sought; and calls up another part of Solomon's life to bring out, in the same imaginative picturing, how by prayer alone is the wisdom to be obtained of God. Ecclesiastes had found the whole sum of things an insoluble mystery, and seeks wisdom elsewhere. His successor first goes to God for wisdom, and with the wisdom so obtained unfolds all things of nature and history as an ordered scheme of providence.

The other main point to note is the enlarged conception of 'wisdom' that has come into this its last representative in scriptural philosophy. In Proverbs wisdom suggested wise conduct, with an ordered universe to adore. Ecclesiasticus adores the wisdom without and reflects on the wisdom within; but he adds the history of God's people, as a theme for that side of wisdom which is praise. In Ecclesiastes we must recognise an advance, for reflection has been extended to that which is without. But in appearance there is only a loss: for the works of nature and the course of events yield to his analysis nothing but vanity; life only is left for wisdom, and this is a life miserably limited by the grave. But in the fourth work the discord of Ecclesiastes has been harmonised by widening the sphere of wisdom. Life is no longer insoluble when life is extended to a future beyond death. History is added to the field which philosophy may analyse, and this writer's analysis sees in it an harmonious scheme of righteousness and the protection of the righteous people. Moreover, external nature is subjected to analysis; but this nature appears no less a theme for adoration. In its latest presentation Wisdom has recovered the harmony between the world within and the world without; and in its enlarged sphere Wisdom is identified with Nature, with Providence, with Immortality.

The Book of Job

To arrange works of art in order of merit, and discuss which are to be considered greater and which less, is outside formal criticism. All the same it is an elementary instinct of appreciation to express a sense of the greatness of a particular work by claiming that it is greatest. If then a jury of persons well instructed in literature were impanelled to pronounce upon the question what is the greatest poem in the world's great literatures, while on such a question unanimity would be impossible, yet I believe a large majority would give their verdict in favour of that which is the subject of the present introduction, the Book of Job.

It deals with the most universal of all topics, the Mystery of Suffering. Even the frivolous are driven by suffering to think about the meaning of life. For the theologian, next to the existence of a good God, the most fundamental question is the presence of pain and evil in a world he has ordered. The significance of these terms is no less fundamental in philosophy. The whole of sociology rests upon the same basis of human suffering. If the theory of pain and evil is outside physical science, yet to fight against these makes great part of its practical application. And of poetry the larger half draws its inspiration from the tragedy of life.

For the treatment of so universal a subject Hebrew has advantages over other languages. It bases its verse system on a parallelism which is also a function of prose; accordingly it constitutes a highly elastic medium, which can shift at will from the measured beauties of verse to the freedom of prose, while the verse itself can reflect any change of feeling in some metrical variation. Again, what seems at first a defect of Hebrew literature in reality increases its range: the lack of a theatre to specialise drama has caused the dramatic impulse to spread through other literary forms, until epic, lyric, discourse, are all drawn together on a common basis of dramatic presentation. Thus of the two distinguishing features of Hebrew, the one draws together the different forms of poetry, and the other tends to unite poetry with prose. Thus in the Book of Job all these literary forms can be combined, and all the modes of thinking of which these forms are the natural vehicles. The bulk of the work is a philosophical discussion of the question of suffering, and different mental attitudes to this question are successively exhibited. But the philosophical discussion is also a dramatic debate: with rise and fall of passion, varieties of personal interest, quick changes in the movement of thought; while a background of nature, ever present, makes a climax in a whirlwind which ushers us into the supernatural. Interest of rhetoric is added for emphasis: the argument is swayed out of its course by sustained outbursts of verbal workmanship, such as are wont to rouse assemblies of men to strong feeling. Again, the situation, which is to be discussed with all these varieties of resource, is brought forward for discussion by a narrated story; a story so evenly poised between the two functions of story — epic and history — that readers are divided on the question whether the Book of Job is a narrative of fact or an imagined parable. All this does not exhaust the elements of this literary masterpiece. The human world which endures and meditates on the suffering is in the Book of Job presented as fringed round with another world, the region of transcendental existence from which prophecy draws its inspiration; and the question which is debated in the human drama has in the prologue been solved in the mysteries of heaven.

Not only have we here the whole range of literary expression applied to a universal topic, but another note of the universal is struck in the selection of the personages in whose experience and meditation the topic is to be presented. It is no mere poet's caprice that has located the story in the land of Uz. No doubt the scene is idealised; but the very name carries us to a conception of patriarchal life, which is a middle point in human development in touch with the whole of human experience. It is a full life that these patriarchs lead; there is no narrowness of external circumstances such as might cramp sympathy and mental vision. The description of Job's wealth displays the pastoral life united with the settled life of agriculture, and house or tent is used indifferently to express a dwelling place. The mention of camels implies traffic and merchandise which would draw out of isolation into world intercourse. Country has combined with city: we have the administration of justice in the gate, — simple justice, with its daysman to lay hands on combatants, its single witness, its simple infamy of the stocks. The picture stops short only of the enterprise and competition that tend to swallow up life in adding to the means of livelihood. The age of the patriarchs seems to make a borderland in social evolution, from which the whole can be studied; and a speech of Job describes with scientific precision the changes from the primitive commune to the turbulence of crowded life. But for themselves these children of the east have adopted a stationary life: absorbed in higher thoughts they are content to sit still and let the world go by, as swift posts between great empires hurry past them, or the caravans of Tema stay a night in their neighbourhood, passing to and from the desert. In their thoughts they are familiar with the whole range of the larger world. They speak of kings and counsellors and judges and priests; of solitary sepulchral piles where the great lie with their buried gold; Egypt, under the name Rahab, is a byword with them. They have marked the lessons of nations in their rise and fall. They know of cities, the abode of the prosperous wicked, who cover their faces with fatness and have collops of fat on their flanks; the place also of prisons, slaves, and taskmasters. They talk familiarly of the gold of Ophir, and the topaz of Ethiopia, and can picture every detail of the miner's venture into the earth. War they know: the casting up of military roads and encampments, the warrior with his thick bosses of bucklers, his iron weapon and bow of brass; they know the chances of war, and have perhaps had their share in redeeming from oppressors, and delivering the fatherless from the casting of lots. They know also the robber bands, whose god is their strong right hand, breaking upon the prosperous out of their lairs in desolate and ruinous cities. Their knowledge extends even to the outcasts of mankind, savages gaunt with want and famine, gnawing the dry ground in the gloom of wasteness and desolation, children of fools, driven out of the land. Of all these extremes they are content only to know: they have themselves attained the golden mean of restful serenity, as far from the glitter of life as from its stains.

So, for all its simplicity, it is a stately life that is lived by these patriarchs in the land of Uz. For the young there are rounds of feasting on ceremonial days; sisters lend their presence to their brothers, for their joy is not sensuous indulgence but festal mirth. The old also have their days of observance, marked by solemnity and ritual offerings. As brothers and sisters are in the world of youth, so in mature life is the relationship of friends. Visits of ceremony are exchanged between these friends, and they behave with formal dignity of manners; it is an elementary instinct of order that leads Job's visitors to move together in their weeping, and rending their garments, and casting dust upon their heads; they sit down on the ground "for seven days and seven nights" before they can break in upon the silent majesty of grief. The speech of these patriarchs is sparing because it is so weighty: pointed words of wisdom, inherited riches of tradition multiplied by long brooding and observation; if there is occasion for more, it takes the shape of a formal curse or ritual oath of innocence. Their moral principles are as fixed as the laws of nature; if one is violated, it is as if a rock were removed out of its place. Their veneration is for antiquity, for tradition uncorrupted from without. The greatest of them feels that he is but of yesterday; no disputant can be expected to resist a cause supported by one "much older than his father"; they or their fathers have received wisdom from "those to whom the land was given, and no stranger passed through it." The greatest sensation of the poem, short of the supernatural climax, is when the aged have to endure, in astonished silence, youth breaking in to plead nervously for a view of truth separated by but a hair's breadth from their own. Thus, amid the various ideals which men have formed for themselves, the ideal of the patriarchs is the stable life: a life in league with the very stones of the field, that can laugh at destruction and dearth; a life of substance increasing in the land, that there may be no lack of relief for the distressed and hospitality to force upon the stranger: for what use is there in wealth but this? While the wicked are snatched away before their time, their own life is to reach its end with the stateliness of a shock of corn carried in in its season. Only with this last hope can they stave off the one thing inevitable, dark horizon bounding the light of their life — the thought of Sheol, into which every man must at last go down to return no more, a land of darkness without order, where in secret isolation he must abide, half consciously wasting from flesh to shade, stranger to all that has succeeded to his place, enduring to himself what pain there may be of flesh, what mourning of spirit.

Life in this land of Uz is a life of poetry; but it is poetry without books. Not a hint is to be found of named poets or quoted works. Job speaks of writing in a book in the same breath with writing on the rock; for inscriptions, or the indictment of an adversary, writing may be appropriate, but it never occurs to the speakers in this story to associate it with poetry. The floating literature of oral speech, in which the foundations of the world's poetry were gradually fashioned, is here seen in full sway. Moreover the people of our story are in close touch with the fountain of poetry — external nature. Violent things of nature have been within their experience: lightning bolts that destroy Job's whole wealth of sheep in a moment, winds from the wilderness laying low a hall of feasting, earthquakes, monsters of sea and land, to that remotest monster on the horizon of the imagination — the swift, whirling serpent that whirls round the earth and at times invades it, or darkens the sun in eclipse till pierced by the might of God himself. And the things of everyday nature make imagery for the poem: the rush, the flag, the spider leaning on his web, the flower cut down, the fallen tree, the landslip, the water wearing the stones. Nay, so saturated are the speakers with nature sympathies that they seem to pass beyond imagery; it is more than a fashion of speech when Job says that his steps are washed with butter and the rock pours him out rivers of oil, that his root is spread out on the waters, that God in his anger lifteth him up to the wind, and causeth him to ride upon it, and dissolveth him in the storm.

Above all, the life of the patriarchs is a life filled with God. Though the language of the poem is Hebrew, and the God worshipped is the God of the Hebrews revealed under his various names, yet we have not here the Hebrew religion as we know it in the rest of the Old Testament. Whatever 'the land of Uz' may be in geography, in essence its people are the worshippers of the invisible God from whom originally Abraham went forth, first of missionaries, charged with the work of founding a people who should uphold the worship of the unseen God against nations of idolators, until in his seed all nations of the earth should be blessed. Meanwhile, the patriarchs have maintained the worship of the invisible God at home. Throughout the whole work there is no mention of idols; the only false religion the most daring impiety can conceive is to offer homage to the fairest works of the Creator in the lights of heaven. Like Melchisedek, who gave his blessing to Abraham while the chosen people was yet unborn, like Balaam testifying from without Jehovah's care over his own, so these patriarchs worship Israel's God outside the ranks of Israel; if Abraham was the Friend of God, Job is before the hosts of heaven pronounced God's Servant on earth. Here then we see the religion of the Bible as a religion without a Law, without a Temple, with no national ritual, with nothing in which the modern mind can recognise a Church. The only revelation these patriarchs know is the vision vouchsafed to the individual worshipper; or rarely, at long intervals, "an angel, an interpreter, one among a thousand" raised up to tell the meaning of some strange experience. Their creed, as rehearsed in heaven, is to fear God and eschew evil. Their sense of God is as deep seated as their very consciousness: when Job's wife, in momentary distraction, bids him renounce God, it comes as an impulse to suicide. Their elementary feelings are fresh, and the religious sense in them is overpowering awe. It makes their whole life one of hallowed restraint: the besetting God numbers their steps, they "make a covenant with their eyes," they dread lest they may for a moment walk with vanity; with more than the sensitive conscience of a Greek chorus they will not curse an enemy, lest they may be asking for his life. Divine providence they conceive as an enlargement of their own ideals, redressing the wrongs of the poor, taking the crafty in their counsels; mercy too mingles with judgment, and he who maketh sore bindeth up. Sickness, earthquake, and every human event is fraught with meaning. The Divine presence fills the universe, from the council of the holy ones on high down to the shades shivering beneath the seas; while in the nature that comes between it is the Divine hand alone that stretcheth out the north over empty space, and hangeth the earth upon nothing. And at times there is a more awful sense of his nearness:

> Lo, he goeth by me, and I see him not:
> He passeth on also, but I perceive him not.

For the Tempest is the Presence passing through the startled earth, shrouded in the clouds with which he closeth in the face of his throne and the thick darkness cast under his feet. The craving to enter into that Presence is for Job religious ecstasy.

In such an atmosphere as this the story is to move, which shall first exhibit human suffering that is unique, and then concentrate upon this suffering light from successive points of view.

The Prologue introduces us to the Court of Heaven, and presents the Lord surrounded by his council of holy ones. Two days of the Lord are represented, days of ceremony and ritual observance, — so it would seem from the recurrence of formal phrases. The sons of God pass in review before the throne, and are questioned as to the provinces of the universe which they have in charge. Among them comes 'the Satan.' Most unfortunately, the omission in English versions of the article has led the popular mind astray on this incident. Unquestionably in this passage, and the precisely similar passage in Zechariah, the word is the title of an office, not the name of an individual. The margin of the Revised Version gives 'the Adversary'; the word expresses that he is the adversary of the saints in the same way that an inspector or examiner may be considered as adverse to those he inspects or examines. It is easy to understand how such a title should pass over to form the name of an individual — the Adversary of God, Satan the prince of Evil. In the present case he describes his office as the inspection of earth: "going to and fro in the earth, and walking up and down in it": he uses just the language applied in Zechariah to the ministering Spirits who carry out the divine decrees in our world. He appears on the scene among the sons of God; and there is nothing to distinguish his reception from the reception of the rest. As other sons of God may have one or another of the 'morning stars' in their guardianship, so the Adversary is the Guardian Spirit of the earth.

The Lord instances Job as his perfect servant on earth. The Adversary, according to his function, indicates the impossibility of judging on this point, since Job's life is wrapped in a prosperity that would make the worship of the heart indistinguishable from an interested lip service, to be abandoned as soon as the prosperity were withdrawn. Those who come to this work with associations of the other 'Satan' not entirely dismissed see in the attitude of the Adversary here personal malignity, or a sceptical doubt as to the possibility of disinterested worship. I can see neither. That there is no malignity is evident from the absence of any expression of divine displeasure, an absence the more marked from the fact that in the precisely similar scene in Zechariah a too urgent Adversary is rebuked by God. For the other suggestion, it must be remembered that the question raised by the Lord is nothing short of perfection on earth: in regard to so high a state the smallest doubt must be pressed. No one would see a sinister motive in a scientific experimenter, who revised his plans because his experiment was shown to be one degree short of being exhaustive. If it be objected that the idea of scientific experiment is out of harmony with the situation. I would ask what else is implied in a 'state of probation'? This much may safely be said: so vast is the disproportion between the suffering of the individual and the question of the possibility of earthly perfection, that Job himself, could he have assisted at that session of heaven's court, would have gladly assented to the test of the Adversary.

By permission then of God we have the fire from heaven, the winds of the wilderness, the forayers of the desert, concentrating their powers in a single moment to bring about a colossal ruin. It is encountered by as colossal a patience. In orderly dignity Job goes through the gestures of bereavement, bidding farewell to all the accessories of life, which have left him only his naked manhood. But when he turns to his God, he shows no tearful resignation, but a grateful courtesy, that hastens to make mention of the giver when the gift has been taken away.

> The LORD hath given, and the LORD hath taken away:
> Blessed be the Name of the LORD.

When the Council of Heaven reassembles God triumphs in his servant. The Adversary no less honours him, in proposing yet more implacable trial: he acts in the spirit of some mechanician who tasks himself to devise some terrific strain, in admiration of a substance which has stood an extremity of testing. Nor is the Lord any more doubtful of his servant: and the test is permitted. Job is smitten in his person, with skin disease at once agonising and loathsome. He must creep out, as unclean, from the village, and sit down on the ash-mound with other beggars and outcasts. There as he sits in his misery, his good wife — no less patient than Job in all that had touched herself — breaks down when she gazes on the suffering which she can neither share nor relieve, and speaks wild words, which Job gently rebukes. To him it seems meanness that a man should accept from a wise providence things of good, and draw back when its dispensations are things of evil.

The Prologue has served its purpose of setting up, by supernatural machinery, a spectacle of suffering equally severe and undeserved. The questions generated by such a spectacle it leaves to be debated in the limited sphere of human knowledge. But already this prologue has in the superhuman mysteries it has unveiled suggested a First Solution of the Mystery of Suffering: Suffering a test of saintship, made the more severe as the saintship is stronger to endure.

The materials for our drama are gathering. The sufferer sits on the ash-mound as on a stage, with all surrounding nature for scenery; round about stand a chorus of silent spectators, gazing on the fallen glory of their land; travellers too stop to wonder at the sight, some smiting on their breasts as they go on their way to spread the sad story abroad, some lingering, like Elihu, to gather wisdom. At last the three Friends of Job, in the pomp of woe and exalted station, have arrived; the spectators reverently make way for them to ascend the mound and sit opposite their comrade on the bare ground. The scene is complete: yet all wait for the suffering hero himself to break the painful silence.

He opens his mouth in a 'Curse.' Once more an infelicity of translation (corrected in the Revised Version) has led the English reader astray. The word is quite different from the expression for 'renouncing God,' used before. In what Job proceeds to speak there is not the smallest approach to the sin which the Adversary thought possible for Job, and Job thought possible for his children. He does not renounce God, but appeals to him; he does not complain of what has been taken, but only asks for the stripped and suffering life to be brought to a speedy end; even Job's Friends attack, not what he says, but what he has failed to say. What then is his 'Curse'? As the Hecuba of Euripides cries in her total ruin:

> Even here the unhappy have a muse, so Job simply sets his woe to music — the music of an unsurpassable lyric elegy. All variations of darkening that fancy can suggest are invoked to blot out that day which betrayed Job into life. The dreaded Sheol is viewed as a world of stately rest in comparison with the singer's crushed life. And why should longer life be thrust upon a heart that is broken?

This last is the starting point of the whole discussion. Though surely the gentlest of murmurs, it is enough to show that Job has separated himself from that which is to the Friends the truth of truths, and which may be here presented as a Second offered Solution of the Mystery of Suffering: that all Suffering is judgment upon sin. The discussion that follows may be analysed in detail, and it is so analysed in the notes to this book: notes which are arranged according to the metrical sections of the poem, for — as the student of Comparative Literature will be prepared to find — in so highly wrought a dramatic poem a change of the metrical system accompanies every change in the tone or movement of a scene. But it must at the same time be remembered that this is a dramatic debate even more than a philosophic discussion: passion and personality are factors in the movement. The Friends appear before us as persons absolutely committed to a fixed theory of life. Their minds are closed: Job's objections do not disturb their confidence for a moment, while they pour out in voluble eloquence generalities which are in accord with their theory. And resistance to their view of God's action they treat as resistance to God. Against them is pitted a Job who has been the ideal of the views they and he had held, but who has spiritual life enough to cast them aside now that they have proved insufficient; he dares to have an open mind on a fundamental question of divine action; though servant of God he can appeal to him against his own visitation, and impeach God's providence in the name of God's justice. Accordingly, minute connections of argument seem to me less important than to catch the general play of feeling and prominent trains of thought which are found in Job, as he is thus tossed to and fro in waves of passionate utterance, beating against the immovable rock of the Friends' theory.

Eliphaz opens for the Friends with dignity and tenderness. He has the delicate task of hinting that the ideal of human perfection has been shown by his afflictions to be a sinner. But his opening words speak of nothing but Job's kindness with other sufferers, and how he would strengthen them with the consolation Eliphaz now offers to himself. Thus the first word of the Friends' doctrine is made a word of hope: if affliction were an accident, springing without seed out of the ground, then indeed Job might despair; but since it is only they who have sown iniquity that reap its fruit there must lie a way of return to prosperity by forsaking the sin. The basis on which the doctrine of the Friends rests — the infinite distance between God and finite man — is developed by Eliphaz in a story of a Vision, in which a supernatural voice proclaimed to the terrified sleeper that mortal man could not be just before God: that thus from a visitation of God there can be no appeal. Then Eliphaz passes to the happy restoration which follows the divine correction, and finds a conclusion in a musical sonnet picturing the ideal life of the restored Job.

When the other two Friends come in their turn to speak, there is more rebuke in their tone, because they have Job's resistance to meet. But substantially their position is that of Eliphaz, Bildad supporting it from nature and tradition, Zophar by dwelling on the infinity of God. And both are careful to emphasise the happy future that will follow on submission.

As Job meets these successive speeches, there is no calmness in his tone, but he reaches the full height of passion at once. He does not claim to be sinless, but he knows that no sin of his can explain the total ruin which has descended upon him: why cannot God forgive his iniquity and let him die? The basis on which the Friends have rested their doctrine he turns against them: it is just this infinite distance between man and God which makes it impossible to bring his cause before the mighty Judge; there is no daysman to lay hands on his adversary equally with himself; a God before whom the pillars of earth tremble, and kings and counsellors are in his hands as spoils, is an irresponsible omnipotence to whom the perfect man and the sinner are alike nothing.

> Though I be righteous, mine own mouth shall condemn me:
> Though I be perfect, it shall prove me perverse.
> Though I be perfect, I will not regard myself;
> I despise my life,
> It is all one; therefore I say,
> He destroyeth the perfect and the wicked.

Thus Job is led to what is one of his fixed trains of thought: that this affliction is persecution: a persecution by God of God's own handiwork. For God has poured him out like milk and curdled him like cheese; he yet watches against him as if he were a sea-monster, and shows himself a marvellous hunter, harassing a driven leaf. As to the doctrine of judgment on the wicked, the very beasts of the field know it: yet does that alter the fact that the tents of robbers are found prospering, while the just man is made a laughing-stock? Job thus recoils from the false friends who have given him rebuke where consolation was due, brooks found by the thirsty traveller to have run dry in the sands of the desert. They will lie on God's behalf: Job though God is slaying him will wait for him. So, by a strange irony, Job's antagonism against his friends' misconstruction is leading him to appeal from them to the very God he had before pronounced inscrutable, and in his almightiness indifferent as between righteous and wicked. At the climax of this portion of the drama the thoughts of the hero sway to and fro — and the metre, with its 'pendulum figure,' sways with them — between the effort to make this appeal, and the overpowering awe of the Being to whom he is to address his cause. And at this point the feeling of awe gains the mastery; in the final section Job falls back into the picturing of the hopeless life of man, too short and feeble to attain the vindication which is its due: the fallen tree may revive again, but man lieth down and ariseth no more. Here we get the first gleam of that new thought, which is to light up Job's despair from time to time: how happy would Sheol itself be, if only there could come a vindication of his cause beyond it.

> Oh that thou wouldest hide me in Sheol,
> That thou wouldest keep me secret, until thy wrath be past,
> That thou wouldest appoint me a set time and remember me!
> —— If a man die, shall he live again? ——
> All the days of my warfare would I wait till my release should come;
> Thou shouldest call, and I would answer thee:
> Thou wouldest have a desire to the work of thine hands.

But no: the thought is dismissed as unthinkable: man's hope is destroyed with the slow certainty of the crumbling landslip, and in the grave he suffers to himself, ignorant of happiness or woe that is in the world above.

In the second round of speeches there is intensification of feeling on both sides. The speakers interrupt one another; each supports his views, not with argument only, but with tours-de-force of sustained rhetoric, enumerating instances or elaborating pictures. On the side of the Friends there is no advance except in the expression of their views. But Job's thoughts and feelings are still developing. The appeal to God, as to which he had before wavered, is now made: and for the Friends he has only contempt. Again, whereas his complaint before was the difficulty of bringing his case before the Divine tribunal, he now declares in set terms that God subverteth him in his cause. As he enlarges on the misery of his persecution, he is so prostrated as to appeal to the Friends themselves for pity. But, the more hope is excluded in other directions, the more strongly the strange new hope moves him; and from his lowest despair he springs suddenly to the thought of vindication beyond death, before hinted at and dismissed, now an inspiration and a certainty.

> Oh that my words were now written!
> Oh that they were inscribed in a book!
> That with an iron pen and lead
> They were graven in the rock for ever!
>
> For I know that MY VINDICATOR LIVETH,
> And that He shall stand up at the last upon the earth;
> And after my skin hath been thus destroyed,
> Yet without my flesh shall I see God!
>
> Whom I shall see on my side,
> And mine eyes shall behold, and not another.

In the last speech of the cycle another important advance is made by Job. Hitherto he had, almost carelessly, both recognised the doctrine of judgment and flung out facts against it. But now that it has been pressed upon him again and again Job is compelled to look the doctrine fairly in the face. He trembles at the doubts which begin to gather in his mind.

> Even when I remember I am troubled,
> And horror taketh hold on my flesh.

He begins to describe the visible impunity of the wicked, nay, their prosperity through life and honourable burial; the stock objections used to bolster up the appearance of providential equity he tears to pieces. His own case is forgotten for the time; what can the Friends say as to these doubts?

They have nothing to say; nothing at all in their formal speeches, and even if the arguments Job answers are supposed to be interjected by the Friends, yet these are not really arguments, only re-statements of the theory in other terms. But in this final round of speeches their heated tone subsides: the case has become too serious for passion. They seem to speak under a sense of making final pronouncement; and it would appear as if each charged himself with bringing to a climax a different element of the common contention. Eliphaz feels bound to drop the general terms he had used in the hope that Job would be his own accuser; he now enumerates actual transgressions. But he seeks to soften down the effect by dwelling on the theme of submission and restoration, now touched for the last time. Bildad deals with the basis of the doctrine; and the distance between finite and infinite overpowers us as we read of the authority that is arbiter among the sanctities, architect of the universe, artist finding flaws in heaven's own brightness.

> Lo, these are but the outskirts of his ways;
> And how small a whisper do we hear of him!
> But the thunder of his power who can understand?

Zophar reiterates for the last time the doctrine of unfailing judgment on sin, and brings it to a worthy peroration. This fear of God and his judgments Zophar makes the foundation of all wisdom, in the most famous passage of the whole poem. No miner for all his skill can find wisdom among the precious things he brings out of the earth. God alone knows its place; and when he wrought the structure of his creation he linked wisdom with the fear of the Lord, understanding with the retreat from evil.

Job also carries to a climax each train of thought which has appeared in his former speeches. The cruel accusations of Eliphaz intensify his appeal to the heavenly vindicator; though in this narrow life Job looks forward and backward, to the left and to the right, without finding him, yet —

> He knoweth the way that I take;
> When he hath tried me, I shall come forth as gold.

Calmed by this meditation, Job returns to the doubts which closed the last cycle, no longer in a hesitating and tremulous tone, but in deliberate and orderly exposition he shows how "times are not found to be laid up by the Almighty" in the earth. He describes the violence and injustice of the world, and how by these the weaker are driven to a life of distress; how the distress is aggravated by its close contact with wealth; how such social growth crowds life in the cities and begets the crimes of city violence; how finally is formed a purely criminal class, at war with the light itself. As he proceeds we feel that it is no longer a question of anomalies in the doctrine of judgment, but rather whether the impunity of the wicked is not to be enumerated among the recognised ways of God's providence. The sense of persecution is brought out by Job in a pair of companion pictures, what he was and what he is: — what he was, when God's light shined upon him, the poor hailed him as a saviour, and the great hushed their speech at his presence; what he is now, when the very children of outcasts jostle him about, and God himself has turned to be cruel to him. Last of all Job reaches the direct accusations of Eliphaz. He answers them not with argument, but makes his appeal from the accusers to the supreme Judge in the formal oath of innocence: he goes through a catechism of evil deeds and thoughts far more stringent than Eliphaz had suggested, and in the most solemn manner invokes doom if he be guilty. Beyond this the simple judicial conceptions of the age cannot go: personal dignity moreover permits no more, and Job waves his hand in dismissal of the controversy:

> The words of Job are ended.

We enter upon another section of the poem, and a new actor appears upon the scene. Among the spectators about the ash-mound was Elihu, of the family of Ram. He is a foreigner, and his speech abounds in Aramaisms. He is moreover a young man, and the decorum of patriarchal life is to be broken in upon by the wisdom of youth. Elihu feels to the full the bashfulness of a young man interposing in a conversation of elders. But he feels also the fervour of youth, longing to champion orthodoxy; he has moreover juvenile confidence in the clearer grasp of truth which his generation possesses. And yet, for all his dissociating himself from the speeches of the Friends, we who read at this distance of time need effort to catch wherein his case differs from that already presented. Both enlarge upon the immeasurable distance between God and man. Both are full of the judgment upon sinners. All that Elihu seems to do is to emphasise one side of the common contention which had been less emphasised by the Friends. His contribution to the poem may then be presented as a Third offered Solution of the Mystery of Suffering: Suffering is judgment warning the sinner by repentance to escape from heavier judgment.

Elihu ascends the mound, and confronts the seated elders. He takes fifty-two lines to say he is going to speak: a curious zig-zag metre admirably reflects his struggles between nervousness and a growing enthusiasm for his cause. At last he settles to his argument. Such vision as Eliphaz has described is a warning from God; but not less of a divine warning is to be found in the sickness which chastens a sufferer with pain upon his bed and with continual strife in his limbs. All that is needed is that some "interpreter, one among a thousand" should bring home the lesson and lead the way to restoration: and Elihu no doubt has an ambitious thrill of hope that he has been raised up to fulfil that function in the present case. At the end he appeals directly to Job, and will pause for his answer. But Job vouchsafes no answer, and receives the new light with silent indifference.

Then Elihu turns to the three Friends, and hopes to unite them, and all other men of wisdom and understanding, with himself in protest against Job, whom he describes as drinking scorn like water, and adding a rebellious spirit to actual sin. In his second speech he dwells — as the Friends had done before him — on presumptuous sins against God, and on God's unerring providence. He begins to hint of further judgment, and that Job may be "tried unto the end." Both at opening and close he makes pointed appeals to the aged Friends. But he cannot draw any notice from them: they will not recognise a youthful champion.

Doubly slighted, Elihu can yet, from a single glance at the sky, draw an inspiration that strengthens him to confront both his adversaries.

> I will answer thee,
> And thy companions with thee.
> Look unto the heavens, and see.

His new answer proves to be the old topic, handled so fully by the former speakers, of the infinite distance between God and man. He combines it with his own argument as to the blindness of sinful men, who will complain of the suffering and yet refuse to read its lessons. And he continues to hint of worse things to come, if Job should be visited in anger.

Still he is met by silence. There is something almost pathetic in the way this youthful disputant, in his struggles for recognition from his severe elders, is driven to greater extremes of self-assertion:

> Truly my words are not false:
> One that is perfect in knowledge is with thee.

Though he is to fetch his knowledge from afar, yet it proves to be no more than the oft reiterated theme of God's judgments on the mighty in defence of the weak: if these be slighted there is reserved a final destruction. And already Job seems ripe for such destruction: he is "full of the judgement of the wicked."

So far youth has been exhibited on its weaker side: from this point we see it in another light. The brilliant atmosphere around begins to show ominous signs of change, and Elihu catches the thought that the further judgment of which he has been warning Job is that moment impending. With youth's keen responsiveness to nature he eagerly drinks in every detail of the growing change, and through his words we are able to see the gradual rise of the whirlwind. We have spreadings of clouds, small drops of water, such lightning and mutter of thunder as makes the cattle stand expectant of the "storm that cometh up." Then some heavier crash makes Elihu tremble and his heart move out of its place: now beasts go to their dens as the thunder thunders with a voice of majesty, and the lightning reaches the ends of the earth. It is a tempest of all the winds of heaven: Elihu and his companions have to endure the sultry sweep of the south, under which their garments are felt too warm for them, and the icy breath of the north, that mingles snow with the mighty rain. The thick storm cloud overhead balances itself as it descends and wraps all in a darkness that appals even Elihu.

> Teach us what we shall say unto him,
> For we cannot order our speech by reason of darkness.

Shall it be told him that I would speak?
If a man speak, surely he shall be swallowed up.

At last there comes a transition beyond even tempest. The whirlwind, in mystic fashion, spreads the thick clouds round the horizon like a curtain shutting in holy ground. From the cleared sky come flashes of intolerable brightness. Lastly, in that northern quarter from which Hebrew imagination looks for the advance of Divine judgments, is seen a "terrible majesty" of "golden splendour"; and the roar of the whirlwind has become an articulate VOICE.

The Divine Intervention is the finale and climax of the whole drama. But its purport is I believe, commonly misunderstood. It is often supposed to be an indignant denial of Job's right to question the ways of God. That this is not its significance a single consideration is sufficient to show. Such denial of the right to question had been the position of the Friends: Job had resisted, and questioned. Yet in the epilogue God is represented as declaring that the Friends had not said of him the thing that was right, as his servant Job had. Nor can this be met by the suggestion that Job had made submission, whereas the Friends had not, and were therefore under the Divine displeasure because of their misinterpretation of the visitation on Job. The Friends have not been called upon for submission: no part of the Divine Intervention is addressed to them, nor does it bear upon their case. It is impossible to interpret the epilogue except as a pronouncement on the side of Job, however much there may be of rebuke for his wilder utterances. Unless then we are to say that the Divine Intervention pronounces on one side and the Epilogue on the other, it cannot be that the former is a denial of the right to question.

It is a different thing, and nearer the truth, to lay down that the Divine Intervention denies the possibility of Job's reading the meaning of God's visitation. Indeed, this is unquestionably part of the significance of this section. But to say this is to say nothing: such inscrutability of providence is a commonplace of the whole poem: the Friends and Elihu proclaim it, Job himself has recognised it in strong language. It would seem that the emphasis upon this topic is a necessity arising from the very character of the literary task here attempted. The poet has undertaken to dramatise God's ways in heaven and earth, God himself being introduced as one of dramatis personæ; the instinct of reverence makes him seek to counterpoise such bold imagination by making prominent at every point the awful distance between the creature and the Creator.

To arrive at the exact significance of this portion of the Book of Job we must examine further. It must be remembered that we have here, not an outburst of angry rebuke, but an elaborate and unique poem, with a strong tone of thought supported by a wealth of details. When we study these details, we find presented a conception of Deity very different from what might have been anticipated. The God of Judgment confounding the mighty in their pride, which the Friends had conceived, and with which Elihu had threatened Job, is not the God pictured in the details of the Divine Intervention. In a single section of it (page 1086) the Divine function of judge does appear: but the brevity of this section, and its place in the whole, combine to represent it as subordinate. And even here the drift is not what the Friends or Elihu would have desired. The Divine speaker seems to be pointing out Job's helplessness to execute the office of vindicator even among the proud ones of humanity; how much less (it is implied) is he adequate to the more remote ways of providence exhibited in the rest of the speech out of the whirlwind.

The Deity of the Divine Intervention is not the God of Judgment but the Soul of External Nature. Job had at one point of the discussion pictured a God beyond the possibilities of human understanding: no two conceptions can be more unlike than the God so conceived by Job and the God here presented by Himself. One note there is in common: the half scornful ease of fathomless energy. But Job's thought was an Infinite Inaccessibility: here we have an Infinite Sympathy. He is the God of Nature, but here revealed in the joyous spontaneities of nature. Omniscience, omnipotence, omnipresence are of course implied; but what is made prominent is an all-pervasive sympathy, embracing the vastnesses that strain the imagination, but penetrating also to the smallest things and things most remote from human interest. Though the Creator of the world, he is not here a creator by fiat, but an earth-builder, rejoicing in his task to secure its foundations and determine its measures, while the corner-stone is laid with the morning stars singing together and all the sons of God shouting for joy. There is power in his shutting up ocean with bars it may not pass: there is another conception in his watching for it as it issues from the womb, making a garment for it of cloud, and swaddling bands of thick darkness. There is power in the dayspring taking hold of the ends of the earth and shaking the wicked out of their darkness: there is the artist's joy also in viewing the earth under this dawning light change as clay under a seal, while the dulled landscape suddenly stands forth as a patterned garment. What to man are the mysteries of the stars, of the ocean depths, of darkness, of light, of death itself, of the sources of the snow and hail, these make the common round of this Nature Power: who walks through the heavens binding the clusters of the Pleiades, loosing the bands of Orion, leading the signs of the Zodiac in their season, guiding the Bear with her train; he enters the springs of the sea, or walks in the fathomless recesses of the deep; now visits the gates of death, now takes the way to the dwelling of light, arranges by what angle the lightning shall fork, keeps treasuries of hail and snow against the day of battle. We have here, not the flood and tempest overwhelming the nations, but the rain with glorious redundancy rejoicing to rain on the wilderness where no man is, satisfying the waste and lonely land with his gift of the tender springing grass; or he watches the sport of the dust running into a mass, and the clods having their time of embracing, as he pours out for them the bottles of heaven. Man has his ox, that eats out of his crib, and harrows after him the valleys: but here is sympathy with the passionate liberty of the wild ass which scorns the noisy city and the driver's shout, finding a palace of freedom in the salt wilderness and a pasture meadow in the rocky tableland. Here is sympathy with the hawk soaring southwards, with the eagle in her spy-house of inaccessible crags, with the lioness crouching for the spring, with the food-winning anxieties of the raven, with all the family cares of the desert goat — the numbering of the months, the bowing in travail, the moment of casting out her sorrows, the young ones growing in good liking, their going forth at last to return to the parent no more. The stupid ostrich, with not enough of nature's first instinct to guard her eggs against the chance footfall, even she has her time, when she lifteth up herself on high and puts to scorn the horse and his rider. But what of this war horse with the quivering mane, who has his joy in the terrors of mankind, swallowing the ground in the fierceness of his spirit as the trumpet and shouting tell of battle at hand! What of the nature monsters on the dim border of man's knowledge — Behemoth, "which I made with thee," with man's strongest things for but fragments of his frame, the cedar's swing for his tail, bones of brass, limbs of iron bars, with the mountain for his storehouse of food, the waterflood a careless trifle to him; Leviathan himself, with a panoply that all man's ways of war cannot break through, ocean turning white as he passes!

When such a conception of Deity has been taken in — joyous sympathy with the infinities of great and small throughout the universe — then we are able to see how this Divine Intervention makes a distinct section of the whole work. For the hopeless suffering in which there is nothing of guilt what treatment can be better than to lose the individual pain in sympathetic wonder over nature in her inexhaustible variety? But the connection can be more logically indicated. The mystery of suffering is not to be solved within the limits of human knowledge; and an imperfect or tentative solution could not be put into the mouth of Deity. But what the Divine Intervention in this drama does is to lift the discussion into a wider sphere. Job and his friends had fastened their attention upon suffering and evil, and had broken down under the weight of the mystery: but the individual experience now seems a small thing in the range of all nature's ways. Hence we have a Fourth Solution of the Mystery of Suffering: That the whole universe is an unfathomed mystery, and the Evil in it is not more mysterious than the Good and the Great. The problem of the poem may be insoluble; but there is an advance towards a solution when it can be comprehended in a wider category.

But it may be objected, Job makes submission and repents: of what sin, according to this reading of the Divine Intervention, does he repent? Sin might be found, if necessary, in the wild picturings of providence into which his helplessness under false accusations betrayed him. But surely it lowers the tone of the climax to look for positive transgressions. Job, conscious of innocence as regards the contention of the Friends, had passionately desired to come into the very presence of his Judge. His desire is granted: but in the purity of that presence the whiteness of innocence abhors itself in dust and ashes.

The drama terminates, and the narrative story is resumed, to introduce a brief Epilogue. The purport of this Epilogue has been already anticipated. God is represented as declaring that his anger is kindled against the Friends of Job, because they had not said of him the thing that was right, as his servant Job had; they are commanded to offer sacrifice, and Job is to intercede for them. We have here a Fifth Solution of the Mystery of Suffering — the right attitude to this Mystery: That the bold faith of Job, which could appeal to God against the justice of God's own visitation, was more acceptable to Him than the servile adoration of the Friends, who had sought to distort the facts in order to magnify God. As Job intercedes for his Friends, God also turns his own captivity; wealth and prosperity are granted him greater than before, and he dies happy and full of years.

The whole of the Book of Job has now been traversed. It remains to speak of its relation to the rest of Wisdom literature.

That we have here a Hebrew poem outside the system of Hebrew religion seen in the rest of the Old Testament need create no difficulty. The other books of wisdom are associated with an order of wise men who stand apart from the distinctively religious life of Israel, in full harmony with it, but not resting on it for their philosophy. It makes no difference to the framework of Ecclesiasticus that the son of Sirach identifies Wisdom with the Law, or celebrates the succession of the Fathers. Ecclesiastes and Wisdom use Solomon only as an illustration; and though the latter elaborately reads providential meaning into the deliverance of the chosen people, yet it does this without in any way resting on the Law or the Prophets.

It is obvious that the subject matter which is worked up into the speeches of Job is wisdom in its most technical sense. The habits of thought and turn of sentences are the same here and in the other wisdom books; many times the same sentences are common to both, with expansions or condensations. As the original gnomic couplets were found to have developed into the essays of Ecclesiasticus, so here they have developed into dramatic speeches and rhetoric perorations. Moreover, the very special conception of wisdom which the earlier books associated with the harmony of all creation enters into the final section of Job: the germ of the Divine Intervention is found in the great monologue of Proverbs, though in the drama the ordering of the universe is directly attributed to God himself, and not to any mediating 'Wisdom.'

Further, the topic of Job is the main thought of Wisdom literature, brought into question by a particular application of it in actual life. In all books of wisdom the real subject is judgment, the sifting between the evil and the good. The violation of this judgment in the visible prosperity of the sinner is mentioned as a thought not to be entertained in Proverbs, is provided against in the arguments of Ecclesiasticus; it drives the Preacher to his despair, while the Wisdom of Solomon devotes a discourse to the reversal of the seeming prosperity hereafter. In Job the converse of this — the affliction of the righteous — makes the whole situation discussed; and in the actual discussion it is the prosperity of the wicked which is the most prominent topic.

Again, the attitudes of mind successively exhibited to the question at issue in the dramatic debate have their relations to the other books of wisdom. The Friends, in their immovable dogma that all suffering must be judgment upon sin, are precisely at the mental standpoint of the earliest wisdom. The slight variation from this of Elihu is well within the scope of the early books; Proverbs has a sonnet in which is emphasised the meaning of the divine chastenings, and the son of Sirach says how the unrepentant is forcing the current of the river. Moreover Job himself, if we consider only his philosophic attitude to the question at issue, is in the position of Ecclesiastes. The system of his world has broken down; his despair, like that of the Preacher, seems to delight in emphasising the ruin of a universe with its providence gone; like the Preacher he dwells upon the gloominess of the life broken off by the grave; like the Preacher, and much more than he, Job retains his confidence in God and his immovable loyalty to right. It is hardly necessary to add that Job has in addition to this a personality immeasurably deeper and wider than that of Ecclesiastes, and a religious experience into which the Preacher had never had access.

What is the relation between Job and the fourth of the books of wisdom? The Wisdom of Solomon assumes as a postulate of thought the immortality which the earlier wisdom ignored, and Ecclesiastes noticed only to deny. This master thought of possibilities beyond the grave is in Job seen in its first faint beginnings. The other personages of the poem, and Job himself in ordinary states of feeling, know of nothing later than the crumbling away of the individual life in the dark seclusion of Sheol. The extremity of his woe draws out of Job, in moments of passionate inspiration, conceptions of what may be reserved for him beyond the grave. Four times such elevation of faith flashes out. The first time the new thought comes as little more than a figure of speech. Job is recoiling from his Friends and their false pleas on God's behalf; for himself he cries,

> Though he slay me, yet will I wait for him:
> Nevertheless I will maintain my ways before him.

What Job actually says here might have been said by Ecclesiastes: that he will never give in to the untruth urged upon him. But as an exaggerated way of saying this he uses words which imply a waiting beyond death for God. At the close of the same speech the thought comes out, now as a fancy dwelt upon with lingering love — how Sheol would be sweet, were he but waiting in it for a release when his time of justification should arrive: but the fancy is dismissed with emphasis of despair. Later in the discussion he rises out of his deepest distress with a sudden inspiration; and here the vindication after his flesh has been destroyed by death has become a sure hope, which he would grave deep in the rock for ever. Once again his confidence in future vindication appears, and it has now passed to the still higher stage of calm assurance: though the Judge is not to be seen in his searchings through the world, yet —

> He knoweth the way that I take;
> When he hath tried me, I shall come forth as gold.

The hope of immortality which was to crown the latest work of Scriptural philosophy is seen struggling into birth in the Book of Job.

We may say then, taking a general survey, that the philosophical observation of life, which is the basis of all Wisdom literature, enters into the Book of Job in application to a particular situation; that the various stages of development in the philosophic attitude which had made the separate books of wisdom, have, in general though not exact correspondence, their reflections in the poem, embodied in the dramatic personages and the attitudes they take to the mystery of life's sufferings; and these varying attitudes to the question of life are drawn into a unity by the movement of a dramatic plot. The Book of Job is Wisdom literature dramatised.

But it is more than this; it contains an element which is no part of wisdom. The hymns to Wisdom of Proverbs and Ecclesiasticus may be termed devotion, but in Job we have the devout life itself in all its fulness: the personal relation of the individual soul to God, and its correlative, the relation of God to the individual soul; the stages of spiritual struggle and doubt, of triumph and reconciliation. We have yet more. The prologue invades the sphere of Prophecy, which, in discourse or dramatic vision, undertakes to reveal what transcends human knowledge. So here amid the sanctities of heaven is presented a solution of life's mysteries which human minds may guess at, but not know. The Book of Job dramatises the spirit of Wisdom literature; and then encircles this with the wider spirit of Prophecy and the devout life.

THE NEW TESTAMENT

THE series of books which make up the New Testament group themselves into a clear and interesting unity.

The Acts and Sayings of Jesus (Gospels)

The Acts of the Apostles
The Sayings of the Apostles (or Epistles)

The Prophetic Vision of the New Testament

This last, by its revival of the form and matter of ancient prophecy in application to the Christian dispensation, makes a link binding together the Old Testament and the New. The gospels, moreover, are for their age a sacred history like the historic books of the Old Testament; and the epistles, like portions of The Chronicles, may be regarded as documents illustrative of the history. But such a description of them would obviously be inadequate. Indeed, it is extremely difficult to fit the gospels into any literary classification: from the point of view of literature, no less than of theology, they are a class of works that stand by themselves. They are our historic authorities for the most important of all events; yet the purpose of their authors is not to write history. Though they are concerned solely with the life of Jesus, yet they would be imperfectly described as biographies. They treasure up every saying of the Master, as certain books of the Old Testament collect the sayings of the wise; yet but small portions of the gospels have any resemblance to wisdom literature. It would be easier to associate them with the prophetic books of the Old Testament. But the prophets use every variety of literary form to emphasise and recommend the message from above of which they are interpreters; Jesus Christ is himself the authority of the message he brings, and those through whom we learn of him are anxious to record and not to interpret. Moreover, an examination into the literary form of the gospels would be inextricably interwoven with another kind of inquiry: the close resemblances between these books, and their not less interesting differences, necessarily raise the question of their mutual relations, of their authorship, and possible connection with a common original. Such questions as these cannot be discussed here: not only do they belong to the domain of history rather than literature, but they are, of all historical questions, the questions on which there has been the fiercest controversy, and the widest difference and fluctuation of opinion. The aim of the present work goes no further than the placing of the New Testament before the reader in the form which will best enable him to read each book in the light that may be collected from itself.

When however we go below the surface, this simple arrangement of the contents of the New Testament resolves, from the standpoint of the present work, into a twofold grouping. We have not one gospel but four; and these four have their individual characteristics. The Gospel of St. Luke differentiates itself from the rest as pure History: the preface presents its author as studying sources and weaving a connected narrative. To this another book of the New Testament at once attaches itself, The Acts of the Apostles: its opening words make it a continuation of St. Luke. And another class of New Testament writings come into the same group. In the history of The Acts St. Paul is the most active agent: it seems convenient to unite the Pauline Epistles with The Acts, each epistle inserted at the point of the narrative with which it appears to connect itself. If such a course seems a departure from the general plan of the present work, which avoids historic questions, the exception is more in appearance than in reality; the determination of the proper places for these epistles presents no difficulty to those accepting the ordinary views of Paul's person and work, while those who hold revolutionary views on this subject are not likely to use the Modern Reader's Bible.* The Epistles not associated with St. Paul may, without inconvenience, be brought into the same large group, which will thus have the effect of presenting the History of the New Testament Church with a combination of narrative and illustrative documents, in a way analogous to the mode in which history has been presented in the Old Testament. There remain of the books of the New Testament four: the Gospels of St. Matthew, St. Mark and St. John, and St. John's Revelation: these in the present arrangement make the second group, as independent works of literature rather than component portions of an historic series.

Two points of detail may be noted here in reference to the treatment in this work of the books of the New Testament. It is a leading purpose of the Modern Reader's Bible to use all devices of printing and page-setting in order to assist the reader to catch the literary form of what he reads. The gospels have the twofold purpose of presenting alike the Acts and the Sayings of Jesus; I have thought it worth while to discriminate to the eye these two elements of the gospel narrative. But of course every word spoken by Jesus is not a 'Saying' in this sense. It would manifestly be improper to put forward as a 'Saying' of Jesus his words to the Canaanitish woman, "I was not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel": such words make only a stage in an uncompleted incident. It is the independent Sayings that I have distinguished by difference of type. No one will be misled into understanding such Sayings as more sacred or precious than other words of Christ; the words spoken on the cross, and in the institution of the Lord's Supper, are among those not so distinguished. The difference intended to be conveyed is merely that the Sayings printed in heavy type can be studied as independent wholes: other words of Jesus are merged in the incidents of which they form a portion.

Apart from this, the chief work of arrangement has consisted in the division of each book into its proper sections, and the supply of headings. I believe that there are few things which assist intelligent reading more than the mere mechanism of division and subdivision, provided such arrangement is based upon independent study of each of the works so treated; the plan followed in old versions of a uniform division of chapters and verses for all books of Scripture alike carries its condemnation upon the surface. The notes will be few: they attempt neither theological nor historical discussion, but merely offer assistance towards catching the connection and emphasis of the writer's thought. For theological and its kindred historic study a vast apparatus of help of all kinds exists, and is at hand for all who will use it. But annotation means interruption; and I believe that many have a longing to get to the sacred texts at first hand, to fling their minds, without any intervening medium of interpretation, directly upon the original literature, and appreciate it, each reader for himself, in all its freshness. One thing only is required for such a purpose — the arrangement of the materials in a rational order: and this is what the present edition attempts.

NEW TESTAMENT HISTORY

THE first group of New Testament books in the present arrangement unite to give us The History of the Primitive Church as Presented by Itself. In analogy with the Old Testament, we find here also narrative serving as a framework to connect together other literary types. In the Gospel of St. Luke the 'Acts' of Jesus alternate with his 'Words.' Into the Acts of the Apostles their words, that is, the Pauline Epistles, are inserted. The group closes with the other Epistles. Some of these, as those of St. Peter and St. Jude, distinctly associate themselves with the close of the history; throughout these writings there is found a feeling that the end of all things is at hand. The rest, as lacking any close association with the course of events, may as appropriately be taken here as elsewhere.

The Gospel of St. Luke

Little is needed in the way of introduction to this Gospel. St. Luke's narrative is clear and perspicuous; the only question is of the proper divisions that will best bring out the spirit of the whole. I have divided it into six sections. Two at the beginning deal with the early days of Jesus, and his appearance in public in connection with the prophetic work of John the Baptist. It is equally natural to recognise two sections at the close of the book, one presenting Jesus in Jerusalem, the other dealing with his passion and resurrection. It is the central part of the Gospel where the question of logical division becomes more difficult. It is remarkable how all the three synoptic gospels seem to agree in marking a turning point in the active ministry of Jesus on earth. This is the full recognition by the disciples of his position as the Messiah, embodied in the confession of St. Peter. This alone would be sufficient to constitute an epoch. But, in all three gospels, it is at this point, and not before, that Jesus introduces the subject of his sufferings and death at the hands of his enemies. Thus the doctrine of the Messiah and the doctrine of the Cross are united together to make the great dividing line in the gospel narrative. In the work of St. Luke — and here it differs from the more elaborate gospel of St. Matthew — nothing more is needed than the recognition of this crisis. Hence, in the present arrangement, there appear two middle sections for St. Luke's Gospel. The one is the Ministry in Galilee, rising to its climax in the recognition of the Messiah by St. Peter and the disciples. The other is the long sustained narrative of the journey on the Way to Jerusalem, in connection with which so large a portion of the incidents and discourses are presented; while the whole is unified by the anticipation of a kingdom presently to be revealed, which grows stronger as the goal of the sacred city is approached.

The Acts of the Apostles with The Epistles of St. Paul

The Acts of the Apostles has left different impressions on different readers in reference to its unity and arrangement. To me it appears a singularly clear and complete work of history, viewed in the light of the commission given to the Apostles by their Master in the opening section. This commission is to carry their witness of him "to Jerusalem, to all Judea and Samaria, and to the uttermost part of the earth." With two of the three parts of this commission it is easy for history to deal: a simple narrative describes the witnessing to Jerusalem and the Holy Land. But how can the Book of Acts present the third part of the commission, the carrying of the witness to the whole world? Notwithstanding all the centuries that separate us from the book, the proclamation of the gospel to the ends of the earth is still unaccomplished. It is evident that this book of the primitive church can give the history of world evangelisation only in embryo. The story of the accomplishment belongs to future centuries; all that primitive history can essay is successive stages in the developing conception of the work to be done, and the machinery by which it is to be compassed. This is just what the Book of Acts gives us; and from this point of view it takes clear and logical arrangement.

The first section of the Acts of the Apostles presents them as receiving their commission from their Master, and waiting, in prayer and meditation, at Jerusalem for the signal from on high that their work is to begin. The second section opens with the Day of Pentecost and the long expected descent of the Holy Ghost; the religious movement that follows completes the opening of the witness at Jerusalem. Then comes the first crisis in the history of the primitive church: the martyrdom of Stephen has the effect, under Providence, of scattering the apostles, and so extending the witness through Samaria and Galilee.

So far the narrative has described accomplishment of the apostles' commission: in the next section we have an enlargement in the conception of the work to be done. Here, as so often in the Book of Acts, supernatural events, or strange dispensations of Providence, come to mark a new departure. It is the Vision of St. Peter that brings about a tremendous revolution of thought: the new idea that Gentiles equally with Jews are to be the recipients of the new religion. When, after a struggle, the novel idea has been accepted, the first step is taken in the extending of the witness of Jesus unto the uttermost part of the earth. So clearly does the spirit of the book mark this as a dividing point, that the historian relates here the outburst of persecution in which one apostle is slain and St. Peter miraculously delivered, as if to wind up the story of the Church of Jerusalem: henceforward his theme is the extension of Christianity to the Gentiles.

Side by side with this enlargement in the conception of the apostles' work, comes enlargement in the machinery by which it is to be accomplished. Not only has a special leader been raised up in St. Paul as apostle of the Gentiles, and a centre for Gentile Christianity been found in Antioch, but the fifth section of the Book of Acts relates how, under special inspiration of Providence, the Missionary Journey is instituted. It must be by the agency of missions that the whole world shall be evangelised. The sixth section follows naturally to deal with the conflict bound to arise between the fast growing Gentile Christianity and the older conceptions. The first Council of the Christian Church harmonises this conflict; henceforward we are to deal with a conception of the new religion that is unlimited by the Mosaic Law.

We reach the seventh of the sections of this history; and here care must be taken not to misinterpret the trend of thought. It is customary to insist upon the three missionary journeys of St. Paul. I do not question that there were three missionary journeys; but I submit that it is a mistake to make these a landmark in the narrative before us. When once the institution of the missionary journey has been accepted, the details of particular itineraries become of minor importance. It is in another direction that we are to look for the significance of this phase of the history. We are told of perplexing hindrances to the movements of St. Paul and his colleagues, until a supernatural vision solves the problem. St. Paul sees a man of Macedonia who cries, "Come over and help us." The opening of the gospel to Europe is the new departure: as the apostles cross over to Macedonia, the country of the future, the region of infinite progress, receives the new religion from the more stationary orient in which it had had its birth. A new stage has been accomplished towards the christianisation of the whole world.

With this enlargement in the sphere of action is again united an enlargement in the methods of the sacred task. To the missionary journey is now added the missionary epistle, and four Pauline epistles find their place in this section of New Testament history. The significance of this stage is immense. It is not merely that the ministry of the written word is added to the ministry of the spoken word; there is enlargement in the conception of Christianity itself. Hitherto evangelisation has limited itself to the etymological significance of the word: there has been simply a proclamation of the good tidings of Christ. But the work for which the epistle is to be an instrument is the growing doctrine of Christianity, and the realisation of that doctrine in church government as well as in Christian life. The Church of Thessalonica, looking, like the other churches, for the immediate coming of the Master, has been perplexed by the death of some of its members: the Epistles to the Thessalonians solve their perplexities with the largeness of the Christian hope. Another church has been entangled in disputes with upholders of the Mosaic Law: the Epistle to the Galatians insists on Christian freedom. The succession of missionary epistles embody the gradually developing theology in a series of solutions to the multiplying difficulties of the churches.

So wide has now become the enlargement in the apostles' conception of their work and their methods that the question at this point is, where this embryonic history of world evangelisation is to stop. The answer to this question from the standpoint of that age was summed up in the word — Rome. Rome was the centre of civilisation, the symbol of world unity. Hence in the eighth and final section of the Book of Acts a series of strange providences is found to bring the apostle of the Gentiles to Rome. And before he journeys thither he sends forward his Epistle to the Romans: in this the harmonisation of Jewish and Gentile Christianity, of the Old and the New Testament, is expounded to the metropolis of universal civilisation.

But if this is a climax, it need not be a conclusion to the historic series that is before us. A ninth section of the present arrangement contains the Epistles of Paul's First Imprisonment. A tenth section adds the Epistles of the closing years of his life. The combination of historic narrative and epistolary document has carried forward the History of the Primitive Church to the close of the New Testament era.

A word may be said in reference to the treatment of these portions of Scripture in the present work. Its purpose being merely to facilitate reading, I have not attempted much in the way of notes. To the Gospel and Acts I have added a few, chiefly in the way of justification for the divisions adopted. The case is somewhat different when we have to deal with the Epistles of St. Paul. These are amongst the most difficult of all literary compositions. Some writers are obscure through poverty of thought: Paul on the contrary through exuberance. In his writings great ideas, brilliantly worded, come pouring out with a rapidity that leaves appreciative effort lagging behind. Yet this but half describes his exuberance. Paul has a highly relational mind; not content with vivid presentation of a thought, he must at the same time guard it in all its aspects, and indicate its connections with all other thoughts. If the author of Wisdom be considered the great master of the digression, Paul may be called the great master of the preposition: the function of that mechanical part of speech to represent, not thoughts, but thought relations, has a demand made upon it in these epistles that cannot be paralleled in other literature; of's and in's and through's and with's (not to say their Greek equivalents) almost break down under the burden imposed on them. In dealing with a style like this, explanation, however necessary it may be, tends to aggravate the difficulty: the reader's mind, already strained under the amount Paul crowds into a period, resents the additional strain of details amplified and discriminations further discriminated. I have thought that the best assistance in the present case would be, first, to take great pains with the paragraphing of the text, and then to add a Syllabus, constructed (like the syllabus used for the Wisdom literature) on the principle that a definite period * of the syllabus represents a paragraph of the text. Such a syllabus is not a commentary: it merely seeks to trace beforehand (so to speak) channels in the reader's mind into which the complex thoughts of the author may flow as his words are read. The idea of arrangement, which underlies all attempts at clear presentation of the text, is thus carried a stage further than the devices of page setting will allow.

Other New Testament Epistles

To the group of epistles concluding this arrangement of New Testament history little need be said by way of introduction; their contents are more fully treated in the notes.† The Epistle to Hebrews, like St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans is an epistolary treatise; an eloquent exposition of Christian theology, but, as the title implies, addressed to the thinker of the Hebrew order, rather than to the general mind. The Epistles of St. Peter and of St. Jude are epistolary manifestos analogous to the Ephesians of St. Paul; but they are 'Epistles General.' In two out of the three the superscription makes them universal; in the other case St. Peter addresses the Elect of a Dispersion so wide as to be practically universal. They are manifestos of the whole Christian faith, modified in the presentation by the special circumstances which call them forth. In all three these surrounding circumstances are the same; a near sense of the end of all things, and the intrusion of false prophets who are corrupting the church from purity of doctrine and living. The Second and Third Epistles of St. John are pastoral letters, addressed, like St. Paul's Philemon, to individual correspondents.

Quite different in kind are the two remaining members of the group. The Epistle of St. James has nothing of an epistle except the superscription; its contents reveal a miscellany of Christian wisdom, and it is presented in this work, after the fashion of Old Testament wisdom, as a series of maxims, essays, discourses. To what is entitled The First Epistle of St. John even the superscription is lacking; there is the same general form of separate thoughts and sayings, and it is presented in this work as The Wisdom of St. John.

One remark may be made on these epistles of the New Testament considered as works of universal literature. No one can read, for example, St. Peter and St. Jude without feeling that a stream of fervid eloquence runs through each. Yet in their English dress the eloquence of these writings suffers interruption through the way in which successive sentences are dovetailed together with a roughness that often seems awkwardness. Partly no doubt this arises from real divergence in habits of thought between our times and the times of the epistles. But in part I believe the apparent obscurity of these works may be credited to received theories of translation, according to which every Greek particle must have a representation in the wording of the English sentence. In concatenation of sentences the Greek and English languages are strongly contrasted: Greek prose packs its sentences into close connection by the positive bonds of particles; the English, more than most languages, leans to asyndeton. It is too often assumed that Greek in this respect has a logical superiority, which the English translator seeks as far as may be to imitate. But this may reasonably be doubted. In art it is recognised that to suggest is often more potent than to define; and the genius of the English language, that allows sentences to suggest their mutual relations without the interference of a visible symbol of connection, may be more true to the subtleties of thought than the Greek habit of indicating connection by words, which soon become more defined than the relations for which they have to stand. We may yet hope to see translation that would leave such writings as St. Peter and St. Jude to exert the full power of their eloquence, uninterrupted by repeated strains of what is to us unnatural sentence connection.

With these few words of explanation I leave this portion of the Modern Reader's Bible to produce its own effect. The matter included in this New Testament History series has turned the world upside down, laid the foundations of modern religion and civilisation, and struck a unity through all history. In the present simple arrangement it is possible for a reader of ordinary intelligence, at a sitting or two, to traverse this literature from beginning to end, and so to bring his individual mind, unhampered by extraneous comment, into fresh and immediate contact with the most dynamic persons, incidents, and thoughts that history has produced.

OTHER BOOKS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

St. Matthew's Gospel

The Gospel of St. Matthew has two highly distinctive marks of individuality. One of these lies upon the surface. No one can read the book without perceiving that the author writes as a Hebrew to Hebrews; possibly he wrote originally in the Hebrew tongue. The Old Testament is continually before the eyes of Matthew as he composes the book with which the New Testament is to commence. Not only does he see in Jesus the fulfilment of Messianic prophecy, but the very phrases of the prophets come back to him with a new significance in the light of the story he is telling. The birth of Jesus from a virgin mother recalls Isaiah's sign of the virgin and her mystic son Immanuel. The words of yearning which Hosea puts into the mouth of God, When Israel was a child I loved him and called my son out of Egypt, are a reminiscence associated with the flight into Egypt and the return by warning in a dream from God. And Jeremiah's picture of Rachel weeping for her children, an item in his drama of Israel's restoration, is recalled to Matthew by the massacre of the innocents. There is again an idiosyncrasy of Hebrew style which in Matthew's gospel is found to have penetrated into the very scheme of his arrangement: the structure is continually based on the number seven. The collection of Christ's teaching which we call the Sermon on the Mount is arranged by Matthew in seven natural divisions; the seventh of these is a series of seven separate sayings, and the first section is a beatitude expanded into sevenfold illustration. Other evangelists speak of different expeditions of apostles sent out by Jesus, with brief instructions: Matthew gathers all these instructions together into a single sevenfold commission. All the writers make prominent the institution of the parable as a form of teaching: Matthew illustrates this section with exactly seven parables. The denunciations of Pharisaic hypocrisy are by Matthew gathered together at one point, and the discourse is so modelled as to recall the Sevenfold Woe of Isaiah. In the discourse on the end of all things the three evangelists follow so closely the same order of thought that the divisions of the paragraphs in all three correspond; but while Mark and Luke stop with the fifth of these paragraphs, Matthew adds parables and additional foreshowings until the number of divisions has reached seven. It must not be supposed that there is anything strange or artificial in this repetition of the sevenfold structure. I have pointed out elsewhere how widely such arrangement prevails in the Old Testament. Most of the prophetic books lend themselves to a sevenfold arrangement; the great Isaiahan Rhapsody not only has seven main divisions, but the first of them contains a movement seven times repeated: the last discourse of The Wisdom of Solomon supports its theme with seven illustrations, one of which is broken by a sevenfold digression. All that is implied in such a feature of style is an extreme sense of orderly arrangement; and to the Hebrew mind order suggests the number seven.

The other distinguishing feature of St. Matthew is his philosophic grasp of the ministry of Jesus as a great historic movement. All the three evangelists use repeatedly the phrase 'the kingdom of heaven' or 'the kingdom of God,' which must have been a regular expression of Jesus himself. But Matthew is wholly occupied in tracing the development of this 'kingdom of heaven': its development as a conception, from the mere idea of a counterpart to Roman empire, which animated those who first hailed the Baptist's announcement, to the conception of a spiritual kingdom founded on service and self-denial, which Jesus with such difficulty inculcated in the minds of the inner circle of disciples; the development again of a visible kingdom of heaven in human society, in antagonism with the ruling powers which crushed it only to give it its power of finally rising. It is natural that an historian of this type should give special prominence to the discourses of Jesus; further, it is the practice of St. Matthew to gather together from different parts of the life of his Master details of teaching that have a mutual connection, and to mass these together in a single discourse at the point where they will be most effective. It is the same with regard to incident. Modern harmonists who curiously inquire into the exact succession of incidents in the life of Christ find St. Matthew the least historic of the gospels. But this is only because the mind of this writer is intent on the philosophic sequence, and a grouping of incidents that brings out their connection and significance. As we follow his narrative we catch a majestic movement of events that draws the whole life and ministry of Christ into a clear unity.

The Gospel of St. Matthew is here divided into what appear to be its twelve natural sections — I must not call them chapters, since that name has been appropriated by the traditional divisions. Of these the first two are preliminary, relating the Birth of Jesus, and his first appearance in public under the ministry of John the Baptist. Here Matthew confines himself to the barest outline of narration, except in one respect: that in the first section more than anywhere else is found this writer's characteristic use of the Old Testament. There is a striking contrast between the narratives of Matthew and Luke at this point. The latter seems to have carefully collected all that was to be learned of the early life of Jesus, and he relates the incidents with special fulness. St. Matthew, on the other hand, seems guided in his very selection of incidents by the thoughts of prophetic literature which they call up.

The third section opens the ministry of Jesus with the extended discourse which venerable tradition has styled the Sermon on the Mount. Yet this is obviously no sermon in the modern sense. Internal evidence and comparison with the other gospels show that here, as elsewhere, Matthew is drawing together into one view characteristic examples of the teaching of Jesus; in the present case his earlier teaching is exemplified, and it is likely enough that an outward characteristic of the same period might be the discourse from a mountain slope. The teaching is the teaching of Jesus; the arrangement is that of St. Matthew. It is natural that a Hebrew philosopher should make the basis of his arrangement a literary form prominent in the Hebrew philosophy we call Wisdom literature. This is what I have termed the Maxim — a proverb-like text supported by a prose comment; not only are such texts with comments prominent in Ecclesiasticus and Ecclesiastes, but the form persists to the time of the Epistle of St. James. In this form of text and comment the Sermon on the Mount presents seven divisions, elaborating the foundation ideas of the new and heavenly wisdom. The shock of the opening text makes us feel how by the doctrine of Jesus the centre of gravity of human life and character is wholly shifted. It is to the 'poor in spirit' that the exaltation of the new kingdom comes; and this phrase of the text gathers fulness with its sevenfold expansion — the mourners are blessed, and not the gay; the meek, and not the mighty; those who hunger after a righteousness they have not attained, and not the satisfied Pharisee; the merciful, and not the oppressor; the pure and not the worldly; the peacemaker, and not the conqueror; the persecutor is beneath his victim. Again, in contrast with the received ideal of a personal righteousness that would outshine that of others, the second and third maxims, with their images of the salt and the lamp, put forward an exaltation that is exalted only so long as it exerts its purifying and illuminating force upon others. The central article of the discourse brings out that the gospel is no relaxation of the law, but its intensification; the exposition of this thought is the paradox that the new righteousness must exceed the righteousness of Scribes and Pharisees, and its final word is perfection. The fifth article prescribes the heavenward reference of our worship, in contradistinction to the righteousness that would be seen of men, the sixth calls for a heavenward trend of our desires in contradistinction to laying up treasure upon earth. It is in strict accordance with Wisdom literature that the final section should be a series of miscellaneous precepts; and the discourse finds a closing note in the impressive image of the builders on the sand and on the rock.

In the philosophic arrangement of St. Matthew's Gospel the connected teaching of Jesus has been first exhibited, and its consequences remain to be regularly traced. The new doctrine has been, as it were, flung into the still waters of Jewish society; subsequent portions of the narrative watch the widening circles of effect. Or there is a better image to be found in the book itself. John the Baptist, in one of the sayings recorded by Matthew, describes his successor as having a fan in his hand, with which he will throughly purge his floor, gathering the wheat into his garner, and burning the chaff. This image of winnowing the wheat from the chaff seems to underlie the whole story of the developing kingdom of heaven, as St. Matthew tells it: from the first moment there appears an ever-widening rift between those who accept and those who oppose.

In the fourth section of Matthew's narrative, which gives the First Impressions of the teaching of Jesus, the two elements of the coming conflict are seen side by side. There is the Gathering of Disciples: not only are personal calls recorded, but at this point the very Scribes themselves show a disposition to press into the kingdom. There are also Hints of Antagonism, and at this time they are no more than hints: silent doubts as to the claim to forgive sins, respectful questionings as to unpatriotic companying with publicans, or immoral companying with sinners, as to feasting while others fast. The section has an appropriate climax in an incident which leads the multitude to cry out in wonder, and the Pharisees to mutter the thought which hereafter is to be their great blasphemy.

But from this point the winnowing power of Christ's ministry, and the divergent effects of its contact with human society, have so increased that the successive sections of St. Matthew's narrative similarly diverge, and alternately treat of the disciples, with their deepening hold of the kingdom, and the outside world, with its intensifying opposition. We may arrange the remaining sections of the gospel in parallel columns, as they relate to the Church and to the World.

The Church	The World
5. Organisation of Apostles and the Sevenfold Commission	6. Growing Isolation of Jesus and his Ministry
7. The Public Parable and the Private Interpretation	8. The Greater Miracles and the Growing Antagonism
9. Recognition of the Kingdom by the Disciples and Questions arising thereupon	10. Entry into Jerusalem and Breach with the Ruling Classes
11. Discourse to the Disciples; Revelation of the End	12. Passion and Resurrection of Jesus

The fifth section draws into one view the Organisation of Apostles to spread the news of the kingdom, and similarly unifies the instructions given them into a single Sevenfold Commission. From the Apostles the narrative turns, in the sixth section, to the world, and brings out the Growing Isolation of Jesus in his Ministry: he gradually draws apart from the imperfect ministry of his forerunner; from the Pharisaic doctrine of the Sabbath, the great outward mark of the Hebrew nation; other opposition of the Pharisees is pronounced a blasphemy against the Spirit of Holiness; from the wisdom and might of the great cities he turns to the simplicity of babes, to those who labour and are heavy laden; a final touch is found in the separation of Jesus from his very mother and brethren. With the seventh section we have returned to the band of disciples: here is brought out the distinction between the Public Parable, the dark saying addressed with its own winnowing power to the multitude, and the Private Interpretation, which with unwearied patience gives the full light to those who are thus being initiated into the 'mystery' of the kingdom of heaven. The eighth section resumes the external ministry: here are related the Greater Miracles — the wide-reaching effects of such incidents as the feeding of multitudes with a few loaves and fishes; here equally appears the Growing Antagonism, by which Christ's own country casts him off, and Jerusalem sends a deputation to watch him, while Jesus himself staggers the faith of those closest to him by cutting down at one stroke the whole Tradition of the Elders, which had cast a veil of ceremonial frivolities over the face of the Mosaic law. Section nine, commencing with the confession of Peter, records the Full Recognition by the Disciples of the Kingdom; but the strange doctrine of the sufferings of the Messiah, which is thereupon revealed to them, raises in their minds perplexing questions of the Kingdom, and its spirit is more and more fully unfolded. This brings us to the tenth section, the Entry into Jerusalem, and the Final Breach with the Ruling Classes; it closes with the sevenfold denunciation of the Scribes and Pharisees, and the weeping over the doomed city. The public ministry of Jesus has now closed: the eleventh section contains the Discourse to the Disciples which is the Revelation of the End; and the final division of the narrative records the Passion of Jesus and his Resurrection.

Literary criticism shows at its worst when it seeks to make preferences; and it would be wanting in reverence to the sacred character of the gospels to exalt one above the other. Each has its proper function, and makes appeal to a different class of readers. But it may be said that the Gospel of St. Matthew has a special interest for modern thought, and the rational spirit of inquiry which seeks a connected view of even the most sacred incidents; here we have a mind, cast in the mould of Hebrew philosophy, exhibiting its philosophic grasp of an historic world-movement of which the outer form is Hebrew. The historic books of the Old Testament, however much they may leave to critical inquiry for adjustment and reconstruction, make a noble literary whole. They are the story of a theocracy in conflict with the secular: a national sense of divine kingship is gradually dissipated by assimilation to the visible government of surrounding peoples. Thus the Old Testament history is history of failure: the secular government culminates in national exile, and the restored Jewish church becomes spiritual at the price of increased exclusiveness. A truer conclusion to the history of the Old Testament is found in the gospel of St. Matthew: here a kingdom of God that is essentially spiritual is seen developing in conflict with secular powers, which crush out of it all that is not spiritual, eternal, universal. There can be no fitter close for this narrative of St. Matthew than his brief picture of the risen Lord, on the mountain of ascension, giving to the band of disciples the command to make disciples of all the nations, animated by a presence that will be in their midst even to the end of the world.

St. Mark's Gospel

To the Gospel of St. Mark, considered as a literary work, little is needed in the way of introduction. It is sufficiently obvious that this gospel is addressed, not to Hebrews, but to Gentiles; and several times parentheses — in modern phrase, footnotes — give explanations of details which by Hebrew readers would be taken for granted. In this, more than in the other narratives, we find general pictures of the ministry of Jesus. Especially prominent is the constant crowding of the multitudes roused by the works of wonder, which drives Jesus into desert places to seek privacy, while, if he enters a house, the whole city is gathered at the door. St. Mark deals much less fully than the other evangelists with the actual teaching of the Master: the very 'Sermon on the Mount' is wanting. On the other hand, he preserves with more minuteness the outward circumstances amid which the teaching is delivered. All three gospels bring out the exceeding difficulty with which the disciples receive the revelation of the sufferings of the Messiah: it is Mark who tells us how on the very mountain of the transfiguration the disciples 'wist not what to answer' and 'became sore afraid'; how again, 'they understood not the saying, and were afraid to ask him'; how, in the going up to Jerusalem, 'Jesus was going before them, and they were amazed, and they that followed were afraid.' St. Matthew makes a single incident of the barren fig tree: St. Mark relates separately the mystic words addressed to the tree, and how, on the following morning, the marvel of the tree's withering drew another lesson from the Master. St. Matthew, with his tendency to classification, includes with the other tempting questions the scribe's inquiry as to the great commandment of the law: St. Mark has preserved the separateness of this from the rest, and how the scribe did homage to the grandeur of the reply, and Jesus recognised the different spirit of this questioner. The external details introduced by this evangelist often serve as links binding incidents together: Matthew relates Christ's saying about his mother and brethren immediately after the blasphemy of the Pharisees, but it is Mark who opens this latter incident with the description of the crowd around the house where Jesus met the Pharisees, which was keeping his brethren outside. Accordingly, every reader catches in St. Mark a graphic fulness of detail suggesting that ultimately, if not immediately, this narrative has come from an eye-witness. It is here we read of the healing of a deaf man: how — > he took him aside from the multitude privately, and put his fingers into his ears, and he spat, and touched his tongue; and looking up to heaven, he sighed, and saith unto him, Ephphatha, that is, Be opened.

The healing of Bartimæus, again, is full of graphic detail:

> And many rebuked him, that he should hold his peace: but he cried out the more a great deal, Thou son of David, have mercy on me. And Jesus stood > still, and said, Call ye him. And they call the blind man, saying unto him, Be of good cheer: rise, he calleth thee. And he, casting away his garment, sprang up, and came to Jesus.

And the narrative of Mark alone preserves one detail of the arrest — the young man, roused from sleep, with a linen cloth cast hastily on his body, hanging curiously about the procession, until at the first touch of an officer he leaves his garment and flees away naked: a detail of no relevance to the sacred character of the events, but giving a wonderful touch of vivid weirdness to the picture of that moment of panic. The main characteristic of St. Mark then is incidental narration. And this affects the literary form of this gospel. We have here, not the grouping of circumstances by classes or stages, but a sequence of independent narratives: I have not attempted in this case to arrange in organic chapters, but have allowed the whole to stand as a series of separate incidents. The Gospel of St. Mark is not to be described as history, but as memoirs.

St. John's Gospel

The writings ascribed to St. John — Gospel, Epistles, Revelation — may be classed with the Book of Deuteronomy in the fact that they are, for New and Old Testament respectively, the storm centres of modern controversy. Over Johannine literature intricate and multiplied questions of genuineness and authenticity, of canonical authority, of theological exegesis, have at all times arisen, and divided the world of scholarship and religious thought. It will be understood that nothing of this controversy will be represented in the pages that follow. The Modern Reader's Bible excludes questions of authorship and textual history: this consideration of itself disposes of more than half the matter of disputation. Discussions of canonical questions are similarly excluded. From theology in a sense it is impossible to separate ourselves: the literature we call secular is imbued with religious thought, and biblical writings cannot but be full of it. But the province of the present work ends just where the province of the systematic theologian begins: the formulation of the thought contained in the sacred writings, and the comparison of scripture with scripture, belong to others; the Modern Reader's Bible is concerned with individual works, and aims only at presenting each under the most favourable conditions for its receiving the full illumination that the work can shed upon itself.

The Gospel is by its name relegated to a small literary species consisting of four works which neither have been nor can be paralleled. Yet amongst these four it is universally felt that the Gospel of St. John stands apart from the rest. In discriminating this last difference we are on sure ground, for we have the invaluable assistance of the authors' prefaces. No one could read the four verses of preface to St. Luke, and the eighteen verses of prologue to St. John, without understanding that widely diverse works were being introduced. St. Luke promises a carefully sifted narrative of accepted incidents and teachings of Jesus; St. John, in a style that may be called logical mysticism, elaborates a theological position which his gospel is to support. This prologue, once its peculiar form is caught, may be called clear, in spite of the profound matter with which it is dealing. It has a form that is common in wisdom literature of Old and New Testaments: the maxim, or gnomic text with expansion. Three such gnomic propositions stand out as the steps of a progression: to catch their full force they should be separated from the argumentative matter with which they are interwoven.

I

In the beginning was the Word:
And the Word was with God:
And the Word was God.

2

And the Word became Flesh,
And dwelt among us,
Full of grace and truth.

3

No man hath seen God at any time:
The only begotten Son which is in the bosom of the Father,
He hath declared him.

The first of the propositions fastens attention upon the conception of the Word, a revelation in itself no less Divine than that which it reveals. The second describes the new dispensation inaugurated by this Word becoming Flesh. The third unites the other two in the conception, Son, and the thesis of the prologue is complete: Jesus, Son of God, only revealer of the Father. The first two propositions are supported with matter of evidence and expanded statement. On the third proposition which sums them up the whole Gospel that follows is the comment.

An essential for literary presentation is that the work should appear with such structural divisions as are inferred from the particular work itself, and not determined by conventional or external considerations. It is in this connection that the ordinary versions of the Bible appear at their worst, chopping up literature of the most diverse character into uniform divisions, under which no principle can be discovered, unless they may be called dosilogical. On other grounds stout defenders of the older versions are still to be found; but I have not yet met anyone who thinks the chapters and verses of the Bible 'inspired.' Yet I doubt if the full importance of this consideration is commonly realised: the mechanical presentation is fatal to what would seem the most important of all literary exercises — the reading of a whole work at a single sitting. Two different modes of exegesis invite the student: one studies the whole in the light of the details, the other the details in the light of the whole. The first is the method of commentators: they seek to come to close quarters with each successive clause, and concentrate upon it light from all departments of investigation, confident that to master the details is to know the whole. Indeed, such method has usurped to itself the title of 'thorough'; and the student easily accepts the description, conscious of the labour with which he has followed, and the frequent sense of triumph over difficulties, and unaware how many of these difficulties and how much of this labour were created by the method of study he has adopted. The interpreter of the other kind takes his stand at such a distance that the whole work can be surveyed at once; he sweeps over the whole ground again and again, and yet again; at first with imperfect grasp and a sense of much that is passed over unexplained, yet with each repetition finding more and more resolve into the common unity, while from first to last he has been keeping firm hold of that foundation element of true thoroughness which we call perspective. Undoubtedly the best scholarship will keep side by side the exegesis of perspective and the exegesis of detail: but in the present condition of biblical study, in which concentration on 'verses' has almost smothered perception of literary 'works,' there is no question that it is the rapid survey of whole books that needs emphasising. And an editor who would assist this must not shirk the responsibility of dividing up again the writings of Scripture into their true structural parts.

The application of this principle to the present case seems to follow naturally from what has already been said. St. John's work is a gospel: accordingly, like the other gospels, it will be made up of the Acts and Sayings of Jesus. But its prologue has set forth a very special purpose for the narrative: the support of a theological position. In accordance with this we find, as a fact, that the 'Acts' of Jesus become in St. John's narrative 'Signs,' and the 'Sayings' are all of the nature of 'Witness.' From this point of view the work falls into natural divisions: seven incidents constitute the Earlier Signs and Witness of Jesus, seven more his Signs and Witness to the Jews; four divisions comprise the Signs and Witness among his own Disciples, and the three phases of the final Passion and Resurrection history may again be treated as Signs and Witness.

The word 'sign' is of great importance in the history of prophecy. In its widest significance it is applied to the symbolical action which the prophet makes a starting point for his spiritual discourse. But often such prophetic emblems are acts of supernatural power, like the 'signs' which Moses wrought before Pharaoh; these 'signs of the prophet' are not only emblematical texts for his discourse, but also credentials of his Divine commission. As the history of prophecy progresses there is a tendency to exalt the latter conception of the sign as against the former, until the miracles of Elisha seem, in the narrative of The Kings, to be no more than wonders, and Jesus (in the other gospels) complains of an evil and adulterous generation that seeketh a sign. In St. John the usual names for what we call 'miracles' almost entirely disappear, and we read only of signs: it is in the spirit of the prologue that even the miraculous should be valued only for the spiritual revelation underlying it. The act of Jesus which might appear most like a mere wonder — the turning of the water into wine — is at once connected by the evangelist with the thought of the prologue: This beginning of his signs did Jesus . . . and manifested his glory. The miracle of healing at the pool of Bethesda attracts no note as a miracle: it is only the circumstance that the deed was done on the sabbath that makes it the foundation of discourse. Still more suggestive is the incident that follows. Jesus feeds a multitude with a few loaves, and walks upon the sea; the latter action is just as much 'miraculous' as the former: yet Jesus passes over unnoticed the wondering inquiry of the multitude as to the crossing the sea, and fastens attention only on the other miracle in which was latent the spiritual meaning of the bread that came down from heaven. He heals the man born blind with the words, I am the light of the world; he raises Lazarus in token that he is himself the resurrection and the life. The old prophets, amongst their emblem texts, would sometimes use a spoken parable instead of a symbolic action: it is noticeable that the only two parables of Jesus in St. John's Gospel, the parable of the Good Shepherd and of the Vine, are treated precisely like the miraculous signs, and made the starting point of spiritual discourses. The simple act of washing the disciples' feet is in the same way treated as a sign; while the concluding words of the gospel apply this same term to the appearances of Jesus after his resurrection, implying how each is significant of highest verity. In the other gospels the whole life of Jesus appears occupied with wonder working: St. John selects only such wonders as are spiritual signs.

The other leading thread running through this gospel is such presentation of incidents as will render them so much 'witness' to the doctrine of the prologue. It is interesting to note in what high sense the word 'witness' is used. John the Baptist and other disciples recognise the messiahship of Jesus: but the witness of this incident does not, to our author, lie in this testimony — for Jesus receives not witness from men. It lies in the signs from heaven of which the Baptist speaks, and even more in the high claims with which Jesus himself meets those who approach him. The cleansing of the temple is witness because it is "his Father's house" that Jesus thus purifies; again, because of the enigmatic references to the future which here and elsewhere are spoken, and which will be stamped with the evidence of fulfilled prophecy hereafter. In the conversation with Nicodemus the very words of the prologue are spoken by Jesus of himself. The incident of the Samaritan woman is witness, not because of the superhuman knowledge displayed by the Master, nor because of the acceptances of him as 'Saviour of the world,' but through the formal claims of Jesus himself to the name of Messiah; still more, in view of his joyful recognition at the close that the work committed to him by the Father was being accomplished. Rebuked for healing on the sabbath Jesus claims authority equal to that of the sabbath's founder; when his enemies see in him an approach to the supreme presumption of likening himself to Abraham, he replies, Before Abraham was I am. It is clear that the climax of witness, as St. John conceives the idea, is reached where the Master is alone with his disciples after the traitor has withdrawn, and thus unfettered by any element of opposition he pours out fully to them the truth as to the Father, and as to that Spirit to be given hereafter in order to make the witness yet more complete.

But while such support of the prologue by signs and witness is the dominant purpose of every single section, it must not be supposed that the fourth gospel is a theological argument. The purpose which appears most upon the surface is that of narrative. Compared with the other evangelists, if some of these are more particularly graphic in their descriptions, St. John leaves an impression that may be called dramatic. It is not vivid details of incident that distinguish him as an historian, so much as whole characters, situations, phases of movement. The personalities of Nicodemus, of the Samaritan woman, of St. John the Baptist, of the man born blind, of Mary and Martha, stand out clear as we read. The swaying multitude, fluctuating through the Feast of Tabernacles between scepticism and excited homage; the officers unable to arrest for very impressiveness of their prisoner's words, the furious priests and Pharisees, the solitary voice of protest in the council itself; the sudden appearances of the Master to answer unspoken doubts, his mysterious departures in the teeth of attempts to arrest or stone; the joyous spectacle of the water poured out amid trumpet tones and merry dances, in memory of the miraculous stream of the desert, suddenly awed by a more majestic presence turning the lesson of the rite to his own high claims; the brilliant illumination of the temple courts suddenly made a background to one who cries, I am the light of the world: all this movement of incident makes the Feast of Tabernacles as we here read it an act in a drama. Not less dramatic is the sudden sense of treachery among friends which seems to overpower the Master in the Last Supper, until amid a hush of expectation Judas has retired, and the words It was night transport us to the perfect peace of the last farewell. Perhaps most dramatic of all is the appearance before Pilate, as St. John moulds the incident. On the one side we have priests and rulers nervously pressing to get their dangerous enterprise finished in order that they may keep the feast after all; on the other hand, Jesus stands wrapped in a silent severity that will offer no defence in an insincere trial. To these is added the Roman, embodiment only of material power that knows no spiritual world. Pilate seems divided, between gross desire to insult the despised Jewish people, and rude recognition of a majesty he cannot understand in the solitary figure before him. Now he makes attempts to release the prisoner; now he has the man whom he would release as innocent scourged and crowned in order to give point to his scorn, Behold your King! shall I crucify your King? The Jewish rulers become more and more eager, for it is the sixth hour on this day of Preparation; and dangerous references to Cæsar force Pilate to give the accusers their will. But to the last he is true to his scorn, and over the cross of shame he inscribes King of the Jews, and will not be persuaded to alter it. It is in the middle of this incident that the most dramatic point is reached. The judge's question, Art thou the King of the Jews? seems to chime with something in the inner thoughts of the prisoner. At first Pilate's answer when Jesus makes reply shows how little was implied in the former inquiry, and Jesus simply explains to the Roman that his kingdom is not of the world his judge understands. But when the forlorn majesty of the persecuted Master draws the rejoinder, Art thou a king? then the chord that has been stirred in the heart of Jesus vibrates in ringing tones: Pilate has indeed spoken the word; a KING he is, born to this very end, to bear witness to the truth, while all that are of the truth become his subjects. It is but a moment's flash of spiritual witness: Pilate's What is truth?

brings back the commonplace darkness of the world that is outside, and the severe silence is resumed.

It may be added that when the gospel has been brought to a formal conclusion with what is a reiteration of the purpose laid down in the prologue — These [signs] are written that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye may have life in his name — there is added yet another incident by way of epilogue, an incident of quite a different kind to the rest. It is no more than a personal reminiscence. One of the appearances of the risen Jesus to his disciples is related; and the incident ends with the retirement of the Master and Peter. But 'the disciple whom Jesus loved' appears inclined to follow, and when Peter inquires about him the Master answers: If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? The narrative proceeds to the simple explanation that the phrase tarry till I come had given rise to an idea that this disciple was destined not to die: the writer points out that the words of the Master had no such significance. At this point an anonymous commentator has added this reflection: This is the disciple which beareth witness of these things, and wrote these things: and we know that his witness is true. The reflection is one that might occur to any reader: its purport is merely to identify the hero of the incident just related, and consequently 'the disciple whom Jesus loved,' with the author of the whole book to which this is epilogue: such identification, the note proceeds to say, is authority enough for accepting the truth of the book.

St. John's Revelation

The Revelation is to be described as a rhapsody: and the best preparation for its study is to read the Isaiahan rhapsody of Zion Redeemed, or Isaiah's Vision of Judgement; or the rhapsodies of Amos, of Joel, of Habakkuk; or, what is closer still, the Visions of Zechariah. Such rhapsodies exhibit the fusion of all literary forms together, now one form predominating, now another. In the present case there is approximation to the epic in the flow of narrative, broken by little dialogue; there is none the less an approach to dramatic form in the linked succession of visions, which follow like the acts of a drama. It is most important however in interpreting to discard all idea of succession in time as separating these visions. Like the sections of Zion Redeemed each part is complete in itself, and covers the whole field; like the sections of Isaiah's Vision of Judgement the succession of parts may suggest graduation of intensity, and a new vision may be the climax of that which has preceded.

Of what nature is the matter presented to us in this chain of visions? The word 'Revelation' is to describe it. The dwarfed sense of the word 'prophecy' in modern speech leads most readers (and interpreters) to fasten upon a revelation of the secrets of the future. But Old Testament history and prophecy make prominent another kind of revelation — the unveiling of the ideal, as when the pattern of things sacred was unfolded to Moses in the mount. With both these conceptions of 'revelation' the present work is in harmony. But the title has a fuller meaning yet, that is best conveyed by a phrase of the book itself, one which sums up the spirit of the whole in a single clause: The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy. That the whole mystery of Divine dispensations finds its meaning in the sacrificial work of 'the Lamb' that was slain, this is the 'revelation' in which past and future, history and ideal, are harmonised. Hence it is that in this series of symbolic visions the symbolism is that of the old prophets, revived, imbued with new meaning; symbol is linked with symbol, and separate jewels of Old Testament imagination concentrated in diadems of light, to make adornment for this final outpouring of the prophetic spirit. The very structure of the poem seems to adapt itself to this one thought. In a form that exactly corresponds with the structure of Joel's rhapsody, the seven visions of St. John's Revelation seem in their line of succession to trace the figure of an arch, the keystone of this arch, or foundation of the whole structure, being the master thought of the prophecy.

I. The Sealed Book and the Lamb

II. The Powers of Judgement

III. The Seven Trumpets: Judgement Imperfect and the Mystery of Prophecy

VII. The Lamb's Bride, the New Jerusalem

VI. The Word of God and the Thrones of Judgement

V. The Seven Golden bowls: Judgement Consummated and the Mystery of Babylon

IV. SALVATION: THE KINGDOM OF THE WORLD BECOMING THE KINGDOM OF CHRIST

From this central vision the symmetry of the whole succession of visions becomes clear; towards this centre the half solved mysteries of the earlier sections are pointing, from this as a foundation the later visions build up climax upon climax.

The Prologue is a flash of the glory that is to come. There is a theophany, vivid enough to recall the visions of Daniel, and charges to each of the seven churches of Asia. The form of this prologue takes us back to the rhapsody of Amos, where dooms are spoken to the seven nations with the same combination of recurrent formulæ and individual addresses. These opening and closing forms of speech, the one describing afresh each time the Divine speaker, the other enumerating the blessings that are promised, in their terms echo the symbols of the fuller revelation to which they are the prelude.

For the Revelation itself the apostle is, like Ezekiel, caught up in the Spirit into heaven. What Ezekiel saw in its moving radiancy is now unveiled in full splendour of repose: the Throne of Deity, rising out of the crystalline sea; around it lesser gradations of power — elders grouped round the Ancient of Days; life in its ordered forms and variety admitted within the circle: the whole is one ceaseless round of adoration, stretching from past to future eternities. The vision modifies itself to the seer's eye as a Book is seen in the hands of him who sits upon the throne, sealed with seven seals. With the intensity of dream emotion the seer weeps that none is able to unloose the seals of mystery, and a comforting voice announces that the 'Lion of the tribe of Judah' hath overcome to open the book. While the vision has thus grown into one strain of expectation there appears, no lion's form, but 'a Lamb standing as though it had been slain': and at once the imagery of the Isaiahan rhapsody, with the Baptist's application of it, comes rushing to our thoughts. The moment the Book has been taken from the hands of Deity the symphony of universal adoration becomes transferred to the Lamb; and with it there mingles suggestively a symbol not before seen, 'golden bowls full of incense, which are the prayers of the saints.' These final triumph tones leave us looking to the next vision for the unsealing of the whole mystery of God.

In this Second Vision the seven seals one by one are opened; and yet we are only carried forward on a further stage of expectation, pointing to what is still to come. With the opening of four seals, under symbolism that mingles the mystic horses of Zechariah with Jeremiah's fourfold types of doom, there appear Powers of Judgment, granted authority to act, yet not at present seen in action. With the fifth seal, the souls under the altar cry (as in Zechariah) for judgment, and are comforted with words of patience. The opening of the sixth seal masses together all the heralding woes of prophetic judgment into one single horror, and the Day of Wrath is actually breaking. Then judgment is restrained: as in Ezekiel's vision of the figure with a writer's inkhorn, so here forces of destruction are held back until the servants of God can be sealed on their foreheads. In orderly enumeration, as of the old ritual, we have the sealing of twelve times twelve thousand from the tribes of Israel: then, beyond all power of computation, breaks upon us the vision of the multitude out of every nation and kindred and tribe, arrayed in white robes and with palms of victory, while the harmonious phrases and exquisite imagery of the Isaiahan rhapsody link these with Jehovah's exiles guarded on their homeward march to Zion. Now only may come the opening of the seventh seal. At once heaven resolves into a great silence of expectation: the angels of the next vision stand ready with their golden trumpets, but there is no movement, save the incense prayers of the saints, ever going up before God.

With the trumpets of the Third Vision judgment begins to move on its course Hitherto judgment has been seen in the ordinary course of things — war, captivity, famine, death: we now pass into the region of miracle. The symbolism recalls the plagues of Egypt, mingled with conceptions from Isaiah and Jeremiah. With four soundings judgment is descending from above: yet it is but the 'third part' of earth, sea, rivers, sun and stars, that is smitten. A solitary cry of woe reminds that three soundings are still to come. At the fifth sounding judgment breaks out from beneath, and Joel's mystic locust hosts enhance their powers of torment: yet they are bidden to torment and not to kill. But this is only one of the later woes: two are yet to come. The sixth trumpet sounds, and powers of judgment are loosed at Euphrates (mystic centre of the earth), and pass down the four winds: but these also are to slay only the third part of men. Judgment thus imperfect seems to be reaching its climax when the 'strong angel,' crowned with heaven's radiance, stands on earth and sea, and cries with a 'great voice,' while not trumpets but the seven thunders utter their voices in unison. But, mysteriously, judgment is to be sealed up, and what the seven thunders have uttered is not to be known, though already the angel has proclaimed that at the sounding of the seventh trumpet 'is finished the mystery of God, according to the good tidings which he declared to his servants the prophets.' Something of this gospel of all prophecy is vouchsafed to us who follow the vision, as the seer receives (after the fashion of Ezekiel) the little book that is sweet in the mouth and bitter in the belly, and is bidden to prophesy. What follows brings together Zechariah's symbols of the supreme powers of the old dispensation, suggestions of prophetic marvels like those of Elijah, martyrdom in the streets of that "Jerusalem which killeth the prophets," a coming to life such as recalls Ezekiel's vision of dry bones, ascent to heaven in triumph like Elijah's. It is borne upon us how this third vision, with its restraints of judgment, is wrapped up with the imperfect glory of the law and prophets, and the worthies who without those who were to come could not be made perfect. At this point sounds the seventh trumpet, and all heaven shouts the master thought of the whole Revelation: 'THE KINGDOM OF THE WORLD IS BECOME THE KINGDOM OF OUR LORD, AND OF HIS CHRIST.' The central Vision is ushered in, and the Mystery of Prophecy is to be unsealed in Christ.

So in this Fourth Vision the whole mystery of God is for the first time to be presented in its fulness. Isaiah's 'sign' of the virgin with child, and the Serpent of Genesis, unite their symbolism in magnified form to body forth the foundation and origin of this world contest. Again, Michael and his angels wage war in heaven against the Dragon and his angels; when the latter are cast to earth the whole contest is presented as when St. Paul saw it as a contest not against flesh and blood, but against the principalities, against the powers, against the world-rulers of this darkness, against the spiritual hosts of wickedness in the heavenly places. The contest is next seen a conflict of temptation on earth where the Dragon wars with the woman and her seed. Concentration of worldly power against the truth is symbolised in such monstrous form as Daniel's visionary Beast rising out of the sea to war with the saints. Yet another phase of the world-wide conflict is darkly shadowed by another monstrous form, partaking alike in emblems of the Lamb and of the Beast: some spiritualisation of the world influence more deadly than brute force — a beast-like 'prophet' of the Beast. Only at the sixth phase of this vision does there appear what has been present from first to last, the Followers of the Lamb arrayed for war, with the names of the Lamb and of the Father on their foreheads. We are held in suspense by a threefold voice of expectancy, and then the climax comes. The cloud appears, and one like unto a son of man sitting upon it. Joel's symbols of the sickle cast to earth, and the terrible harvest that follows, portray the contest: but Joel's imagery is insufficient, and further touches from Isaiah give suggestions of treading the wine-press, of rivers of blood reaching to the bridles of the horses. The glassy sea flushes with the hue of victory, and the triumphant hosts unite in the 'Song of Moses and of the Lamb' — the first Salvation of God's chosen people at the Red Sea grown into the final Salvation for all worshipping nations.

If succession in time, and not symmetry of thought, were the binding link of the rhapsody, this ought to be the close. As it is, the Fifth Vision appears as the parallel of the third: the prophetic symbol of the Bowl, or 'Cup of the Lord's Fury,' replaces the prophetic symbol of the Trump of Doom. But in place of imperfection we see judgment consummated, now that the foundation mystery has been unveiled. Again we have the symbolism of the plagues of Egypt, varied and intensified; again we have judgment successively above, beneath, at the central Euphrates. With the pouring out of the seventh bowl are heard the words, It is finished: the whole mystery of God, which each Vision in its own way is unfolding, here is proclaimed as the mystery of BABYLON. Under that name detail after detail shows to be presented the actual Babylon of history, chief aim of Old Testament Doom Songs; equally under this name is seen portrayed mercantile Tyre, and every other city or empire which in its day has been a centre of the contest between the powers of the world and God.

As the fifth with the third, so the Sixth Vision is parallel with the second: there judgment was but potential, here it is seen enthroned. Other phases of the Divine dispensations have appeared, but the supreme thought is yet to be presented: that this world triumph is achieved by the Word of God alone, all other powers being but the instruments he uses. In this vision therefore we see but one white horse; he that rides upon it is named Faithful and True, Word of God, King of kings and Lord of lords: yet another name is known by none but himself. In rapid sequence the powers displayed in the former visions are conquered and bound: we have the First Resurrection, and millennial triumph of the faithful with their Christ. Then Satan is again loosed for a space, and a place is found for Ezekiel's far distant vision of the War of Gog and Magog. At length we have the great white throne, and the final judgment; Death and Hell are cast into the lake of fire: this is the second death.

The opening vision displayed the essential calm of Deity, before any disturbing ripple of mystery that craves solution had yet appeared before us. In the Seventh Vision there is a return to this repose, in a new heaven and earth, and all things made new: that peace which in Old Testament rhapsodies lies on the other side of judgment. The New Jerusalem of Ezekiel, with its perfect symmetries, makes symbolic framework for the commonwealth of God's redeemed servants; more attractive symbols still, drawn from the Isaiahan rhapsody, present the glories of precious stones and the Bride adorned for her husband. There is a return to Ezekiel in the river of the water of life, with its fruit trees and leaves for the healing of the nations.

The last touch of symbolism in the whole book brings back the earliest symbol of Genesis: the Tree of Life is restored, and the Saints shall reign for ever and ever.

By many interpreters the question is pressed, What has all this meant? What is the exact significance of the Seven Seals? What the historic reference in the pouring out from the Seven Golden Bowls? To me such questionings seem to miss the spirit of the whole book. These symbols, in the movement of the vision, have advanced only to efface themselves, and point backward or forward to the central key of all mystery. This order of thought we have had in the Old Testament. When Elijah is standing in rapt expectancy at the Cave of Horeb, it is told how a great and strong wind rent the mountains and brake in pieces the rocks, but the Lord was not in the wind; and after the wind an earthquake, but the Lord was not in the earthquake; and after the earthquake a fire, but the Lord was not in the fire: then came the still small voice, and with the voice the revelation. In the present climax it is no still small voice, but the shout of all heaven's voices that proclaim the revelation of the kingdom of the world as the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ. And when we descend from the lofty height of vision to the plain of ordinary life through the Seven Last Words, the fourth and central word repeats the same master thought:

> I am the Alpha and the Omega, the first and the last, the beginning and the end.

I have only sketched the movement of thought which is felt through this vision of unfolding visions. I cannot speak here of the many harmonies and contrasts, and intricate suggestions of symbolism, which play around the leading ideas.* I have endeavoured to give help towards these in my notes; no exhaustive treatment, but one that attempts some measure of fulness. For one whose task has been to edit successively for literary purposes all the books of the Bible it is natural to close the introduction to the present work with this reflection: that this final outpouring of prophecy is one that gathers symbolism from all over the field of biblical literature in order to illuminate the thought which is conceived as making that literature a single unity.

* In reference to a book in which the ordinary reader needs so much assistance I may suggest as helps (the late) Professor Milligan's Revelation (in the Expositor's Bible), and Canon T. L. Scott's Visions of the Apocalypse (the Donnellan Lectures for 1891–92: London: Skeffington and Son).—While the purpose of these works is necessarily theological, I mention them because they appear to me specially strong in literary analysis. The latter author has also published in pamphlet form a Paragraph Version of the Apocalypse (Dublin: Hodges, Figgis and Co.).

GENERAL NOTES

Metrical System of Biblical Verse

Literary Significance of Metre

IN this note I explain the metrical system of biblical verse followed in the Modern Reader's Bible. Assistance in this matter is given in the detailed notes to particular poems: the present note deals with general principles. And I would suggest that the most general reader, by giving some attention to the principles of metre, can immensely enhance his appreciation of the force, and often of the interpretation, of poetry.*

The literary significance of metre is a thing quite distinct from the principles revealed when verse is analysed from the linguistic point of view. The distinctions of rhythms and metres, their feet and other component parts, their possible modifications and laws of recurrence, all these belong to prosody; only a very small part of all this has any connection with literature. The distinction I have in mind may perhaps be expressed most simply by saying that the literary student is concerned, not with metres, but with metrical variations. He must be sensitive to transitions between one metrical style and another; but he need not seek to associate a particular literary significance with a particular metre.

To a limited extent indeed this last may be done. In Greek Comedy the scholar is aware that anapæsts have an association with (mock) grandeur, and the long iambic lines are devoted to ribald satire. In the Peace of Aristophanes trochaic measures are used quite as a leit-motif to accompany the presence of the country party. Similarly in the poem of Job it will be found that Job and Elihu employ a much greater variety of different metres than the three Friends: a difference entirely in accord with the contrast between the staid insistence upon orthodoxy of the one party, and the passionate strength of Job, or the youthful fervour of his last critic. It is curious, moreover, that introversion appears nowhere but in the speeches of Job; while by Elihu alone is used a special rhythm which will be described below under the name Augmenting Alternation, and which is exquisitely expressive of the position of the speaker at the particular point of the argument.

But this association of a particular metre with a particular meaning is an exceptional thing. The principle which is found to run through dramatic literature in various languages is that a change from one metrical style to another always reflects a change in the spirit or tone of the scene. Whether the reader is occupied with the sustained anapæsts and strophic passages of Greek Tragedy, or with the anapæsts and trochees of a parabasis in Greek Comedy, or with the distribution of trochees and iambic verse in Latin Comedy, above all when he is appreciating the delicate use of verse and prose in the plays of Shakespeare, he will find that a transition from a passage in which one metre has been predominating to a passage in which another metre is to rule means a change of thought, as clearly as when the reader of a printed book comes upon a new chapter with a fresh title.† In the Book of Job this usage is so fundamental that it makes the basis on which the whole can be analysed: the changes of metre tally with the stages in the argument. I have accordingly arranged the poem on this principle.

When minutiæ of form like those here reviewed are under discussion, an objection often forms itself in the mind of readers unaccustomed to such studies: Can a writer of an impassioned poem be supposed to have burdened himself with such mechanical arrangements as are thus suggested? The answer is that nothing of the kind is to be supposed. Conscious planning of metres or other formal devices are for learners in the art of poetry; the poets of Job and The Psalms are credited only with an exquisite sense of symmetry as part of their poetic equipment. The more exalted the strain, the more will it fall of its own accord into symmetries which the cold analysis of criticism can measure and classify. In any case, whatever may be the mental process of poetic composition, this can make no difference to that which is a matter of fact, — the forms which can actually be traced in what is produced.

*Appendix III to my Literary Study of the Bible [D. C. Heath & Co., Boston and London] contains a formal discussion of this subject.

Parallelism the Basis of Biblical Verse

The verse system here followed is based upon the parallelism of clauses. In Greek and Latin what constitutes verse is a succession of syllables of varying quantity; in Old English it was alliteration, in modern English it is number of syllables and rhyme that constitute verse. In the Bible, what makes a 'verse' is not any particular number or quality of syllables, but the parallelism of two or more clauses:

Why do the nations rage?
And the peoples imagine a vain thing?

The parallelism of which this is the simplest form can be extended to an infinite complexity, the parallelism connecting together not only contiguous lines, but also masses of verse widely separated from one another.

It is to be observed that the word 'metre' is used in two different senses. In the broader usage it is almost the equivalent of rhythm in general; in the more particular sense it describes certain kinds of rhythm, especially that depending upon feet and syllables. I use the word in this work in the broad sense, which will include a system founded on parallelism. At the present time it is a subject of discussion among Hebraists whether the Bible in the original has not a metrical system in the other sense; and strophic arrangements of portions of Bible poetry are offered, which will be found to be very different from those in the present work. I allude to this subject only to point out that the results of such discussion cannot affect the arrangement offered here. The other metrical arrangement belongs to the original Hebrew, and has not been followed in the received translations. But parallelism of clauses is independent of particular languages, and appears in any adequate translation. Nor is there anything strange in the idea that the same poetry should admit of more than one metrical system. To illustrate I append a stanza of Spenser's Fairy Queen.

Wrath, jealousy, grief, love, do thus expell:
Wrath is a fire; and jealousy a weed;
Grief is a flood; and love a monster fell;
The fire of sparks, the weed of little seed,
The flood of drops, the monster filth did breed:
But sparks, seed, drops, and filth, do thus delay;
The sparks soon quench, the springing seed outweed,
The drops dry up, and filth wipe clean away:
So shall wrath jealousy, grief, love, die and decay.

Now this is printed so as to represent the rhyme and metrical feet of the passage, these being the basis of modern English verse. But this particular passage is full of parallelism and antithesis, and it is perfectly possible, disregarding rhyme and syllabic metre, to print the passage on a basis of clause parallelism.

Wrath, jealousy, grief, love, do thus expell:
Wrath is a fire;
And jealousy a weed;
Grief is a flood;
And love a monster fell;
The fire of sparks,
The weed of little seed,
The flood of drops,
The monster filth did breed;
But sparks, seed, drops, and filth, do thus delay;
The sparks soon quench,
The springing seed outweed,

The drops dry up,
And filth wipe clean away:
So shall wrath, jealousy, grief, love, die and decay.

Thus both the metrical system of feet and the metrical system of parallelism apply to the same passage; they are not inconsistent with one another; and either, displayed by printing to the eye, assists the reader to the rhythmic heart of the poetry.

General Principles of Biblical Metre

It is necessary to distinguish Similar and Dissimilar Parallelism. The first obtains where, in a given sequence, all the lines are parallel with one another.

Yet he commanded the skies above,
And opened the doors of heaven;
And he rained down manna upon them to eat,
And gave them of the corn of heaven.
Man did eat the bread of the mighty:
He sent them meat to the full.

Dissimilar Parallelism implies that particular lines adhere together with a bond that is closer than the bond which unites them all into a sequence.

The LORD is my light and my salvation;
Whom shall I fear?
The LORD is the strength of my life;
Of whom shall I be afraid?

This passage is obviously a single sequence; and yet the third line is closely parallel with the first, the fourth with the second. In the next example it is clear that the first two lines are bound together, and again the last seven:—

Is the righteousness ye should speak dumb?
Do ye judge uprightly the sons of men?
Yea, in your heart ye work wickedness;
Ye weigh out the violence of your hands in the earth.
The wicked are estranged from the womb:
They go astray as soon as they be born, speaking lies.
Their poison is like the poison of a serpent:
They are like the deaf adder that stoppeth her ear;
Which hearkeneth not to the voice of charmers, charming never so wisely.

Yet that the whole makes one sequence is clear from the fact that this same dissimilar parallelism of 2 and 7 is reproduced in the stanza that immediately follows the above (in psalm lviii).

Break their teeth, O God, in their mouth:
Break out the great teeth of the young lions, O LORD.
Let them melt away as water that runneth apace:
When he aimeth his arrows, let them be as though they were cut off.
Let them be as a snail which melteth and passeth away:
Like the untimely birth of a woman, that hath not seen the sun.
Before your pots can feel the thorns,
He shall take them away as a whirlwind,
The green and the burning alike.

The term Variation may be applied to the effect by which, in a series of sequences otherwise parallel, the dissimilar parallelism is differently distributed. Thus the stanzas of psalm cxliii are all quatrains, but (see the psalm on page 869) three different arrangements of the lines in the stanzas can be traced, viz., aabb, abab, abba. Similarly with the sonnet on Wisdom and Perversity (page 906) the two first sections have each six lines in the proportion of $4a + 2b$; but the first runs abaaab, the other ababaa. Such variation is not so mechanical a thing as might at first be thought; it is used for example with great effect in the strophe and antistrophe of The Two Paths (page 907).

Coming to particular figures of parallelism we may note three different sources of metrical rhythm in biblical poetry, which have contributed three different metrical units. (1) The Traditional poetry preserved in the historical books is for the most part in 'Antique Rhythm,' which seems to be based upon a unit that may be called a strain. This consists of a couplet, either line of which may be strengthened by an additional line, but not both.

Strive thou, O LORD, with them that strive with me:
Fight thou against them that fight against me.

Take hold of shield and buckler and stand up for mine help:
Draw out also the spear and stop the way against them that pursue me:
Say unto my soul, I am thy salvation.

Let destruction come upon him at unawares;
And let his net that he hath hid catch himself;
Into that very destruction let him fall.

All three are 'strains': the first is a simple couplet; the second is a couplet with the first line strengthened; the third has the second line strengthened. The elasticity of the strain has a special fitness for extemporisation, which figures largely in Traditional poetry. It is very important for the appreciation of biblical lyrics to accustom the mind to this idea of an elastic unit. When once this idea is grasped it becomes easy to see, for example, that the two divisions of psalm iii are perfectly symmetrical, although one contains eight lines, the other nine: as printed on pages 748–9 it is obvious to the eye that each portion is made up of four strains. Similarly in the more elaborate rhythm of psalm vii the first and third sections are symmetrical, though one has four, the other six lines: each contains just two of these 'strains.'

(2) Wisdom literature is founded on the proverb, which is a couplet (rarely a triplet) of parallel lines: this contributes as a unit the couplet, and aggregates couplets into stanzas.

(3) Dancing with musical accompaniment is a leading feature in primitive poetry: the intricate involutions of the dance reflect themselves in similar involutions of metre, especially by means of antiphony (different singers answering one another), and antistrophic effect (portions of a poem answering one another apart from difference of performers). A glance at Deborah's Song (pages 223–5) will show to what minuteness these effects can be carried. Thus from the dance we get the single line (i.e. half a parallel) as a unit, and the aggregation of lines into strophes. All these divisions of poetry exercise an influence upon one another: in the psalms all three units obtain — the strain, the couplet, and the single line.

Three main types of structure may be distinguished. The first is Stanza Structure. Stanzas founded upon the strain as a unit may be illustrated from psalms vi, xxii, lxxvii: the first has three stanzas of three strains, the second has three of eleven strains; the third has seven stanzas of three strains. Stanzas founded on the couplet unit are very common; especially the Quatrain (xii, xiii, xxviii, xxxii, xxxvii, lxi, lxiv, cxx, cxxi, cxxii, cxxiii, cxxix, cxliii). Psalm xiv (= liii) is in triplets. Sextets are found in psalms xlviii, lxxvi, lxxxvii, cxlii. A longer stanza of eight couplets distinguishes the acrostic psalm cxix. Psalm cxlv is in acrostic couplets.

A great rhythmic effect is produced by Mixed Stanzas. The companion psalms ciii, civ (see page 831) are cast in a common mould of stanzas of four and five (couplets or strains). The first has stanzas of five at the beginning and end, changing to stanzas of four where the topic of the frailty of man comes in; similarly, the general view of nature in civ is expressed by stanzas of five, which change to stanzas of four to express the dependence of all nature on God: the first form is renewed for the final burst of glory in nature. The elaborate Anthem of Judgment, made by psalms ix–x, is in quatrains, which change to sex tets at the two places where the tone of complaint comes in. In the companion psalms cxi, cxii, a sextet is used for the conclusion, the rest of the poem being in quatrains. The dramatic change from trouble to deliverance which distinguishes so many psalms is in psalm xxxi twice repeated: to vary this repetition triplets are substituted for quatrains. In lxxxiii the change from octets to sextets seems to mark an intensification. Other examples of mixed stanzas are psalms lx, lxxi, cviii, cxxxv.

The effect of Duplication is common in Wisdom poetry. A fine example is the Sonnet on the Strange Woman (page 908): besides the introduction and conclusion this has four octet stanzas with the second of them duplicated. It will be seen that this duplication does not merely imply that the second stanza consists of sixteen lines instead of eight, but further that its dissimilar parallelism is one of 4 + 12, thus exactly duplicating the dissimilar parallelism of the other stanzas, which in each case is 2 + 6. This effect will be found to play a great part in the metrical scheme of Job. (See below.)

Augmenting is distinct from Duplication, as implying a gradual increase of number of lines in successive stanzas. In the great monologue of Wisdom (pages 913–4), as the thought crescendoes the stanzas augment from four to five, six, seven lines. Another example is the opening poem of Ecclesiasticus (page 956). It is interesting to note the contrasted effect of Diminution in psalm xliv (see note, page 1612).

The Stanza Structure admits of introductions and conclusions outside the rhythmic form of the stanzas themselves. Compare psalms xxvi, cxvi, cxxxviii. Sometimes the conclusions may be postscripts adapting the song to other uses (xiv, li, cxxviii, cxxx, cxxxi). From these may be distinguished the leads: a couplet or triplet leading off a theme which is then developed in stanzas: psalms xc, xciv, and the two portions of cxxxii are good examples of this effect. Other leads may be found in lxxxv, ci, cxxxiii, cxliv; or the monologue on pages 911–4.

To Stanza Structure naturally belongs the Refrain: though occasionally (compare psalms lvii and xl) it is found in connection with antistrophic arrangement. The Refrain is a verse, or portion of a verse, which recurs in two or more successive stanzas. Typical examples are psalms xlvi and lxvii, though in each case the refrain has been omitted by ordinary versions in one of the places where it ought to occur. Psalm cxxxvi has a continuous refrain —

For his mercy endureth for ever — after every line. In lxii, cxl we have initial refrains. Fine effects are produced by Double Refrains in psalms xcix and cvii. In the first case, each stanza is a sextet: the first and third consist each of five lines, completed by the short refrain —

Holy is He —

(this has been dropped by ordinary versions in the third stanza); the second and fourth have only three lines, brought to a proper length by the longer refrain —

Exalt ye the LORD our God,
And worship at his footstool:
Holy is He.

In the main body of psalm cvii each stanza brings forward a different type of sufferers: one refrain —

Then they cried unto the LORD in their trouble,
And he delivered them out of their distresses — with a sequel verse represents the cry for help; the burst of thanksgiving is conveyed by the refrain —

O that men would praise the LORD for his goodness,
And for his wonderful works to the children of men — which also has a sequel verse. This stanza structure is four times repeated. In some cases the refrain is varied (e.g. psalms xlix, lxxx, cxvi, cxliv). In the lament made by psalms xlii–iii the words of the refrain are unchanged, but its recurrence at the end of the changing stanzas seems to give the effect of hope gradually becoming firmer and firmer.

In Antistrophic Structure, the second of the three main types, the stanzas run in pairs, strophe and antistrophe: the second of the pair 'answers' its strophe, the answering effect implying both rhythmic symmetry and (in biblical, though not in Greek lyrics) a certain degree of correspondence of thought. This antistrophic effect is familiar to most readers in Greek poetry, and was there an effect of dance origin: the Chorus worked their way in a strophe from the centre to the end of the orchestra, and in the antistrophe worked back to the starting point, reversing all movements. In Greek the relation of strophe and antistrophe is only rhythmic; in biblical Wisdom a relation of thought goes with the rhythmic relation: such Antistrophic may also be called Rhetoric structure. The structure admits of 'introductions' and 'conclusions' of different rhythm.

This type of structure is most marked where the unit is the single line, and Dissimilar Parallelism comes in. A good example is psalm l: see pages 786–7. After an introduction, presenting the visionary surroundings of the judgment that is to be pronounced, the Divine address to the 'saints' makes a strophe, the address to the 'wicked' an antistrophe. It is easy to see that the two strophes correspond, not only in the number of their lines (nineteen), but also in the distribution of the dissimilar parallelism: there is first (three lines) an invocation, then (twelve lines) an argument, then (four lines) a solemn decree. Psalm xlix has an introduction and strophes of eighteen lines, each with a refrain and a parenthesis (though, by 'variation,' the parenthesis appears at different points of the two sequences): the difference in the refrains shows that the strophe and antistrophe are successive stages in the solution of a mystery. — For other examples compare psalms xxxvi, lviii.

Simpler examples of antistrophic structure are (on units of strains) iii, xvi, xxiv, xxxviii, xlv, lxvi, lxxii, lxxv, lxxxii, xci, xcvii, cxxiv, cxxxix. Founded on the couplet unit are the following: xxi, lvii, lxii, lxxxi, xcii, xciii, cxxvi.

Where the antistrophic structure runs to more than a single strophe and antistrophe, certain elaborations come in. Antistrophic Alternation implies a succession in which each strophe is immediately followed by its antistrophe (the form aa', bb', cc'). Examples are psalms xxx (which has the form 6, 6; 3, 3; 4, 4), and cxxxvii (the lines of which run aabaa for the first pair, aabbb for the second pair); psalms ii, xxxiv, xxxix, xl. The last has the form 6, 6; 4, 4; 5, 5; with parenthetic enlargement in the second pair, and refrains for the third pair.

A second elaboration of antistrophic structure is Interlacing: a strophe is followed by a strophe of a different rhythm, then come the antistrophes to each. (The form is thus ab, a'b'.) A clear example is psalm cx: an oracle (in triplets) is followed by its glorious fulfilment (quatrains of longer lines): again an oracle, and a glorious fulfilment in corresponding rhythm. Compare also v, xix, lix, xcix. Psalm vii is compound: its first part has interlacing strophes (2, 3; 2, 3 in strains), its second part alternation (3, 3).

Another elaboration is Inversion (or Introversion). Here a strophe is followed by a different strophe, but the antistrophe to the second precedes the antistrophe to the first strophe. (The form thus becomes ab, b'a'.) A fine example is psalm cxiv. Here all the strophes are quatrains, the difference is made by the attitude of thought in the four, which may be thus conveyed to the eye:

A new conception of Deity!
All nature convulsed!
Why all nature convulsed?
At the new conception of Deity!

Other examples are lxxix (in strains 4, 3; 3, 4), cxxvii (in lines 4, 3; 3, 4). The structure of psalm lxxiii is interesting: a trial of faith is developed in a strophe made up of three sextets, with a final quatrain as the faith almost gives way; for antistrophe the turn of thought opens with a quatrain, and the resulting triumph makes three sextets. Two compound psalms may be noted. The elaborate processional hymn of lxviii has first a single pair of strophes, each made up of four quatrains; then inversion obtains, and we have the form (in lines) 10, 9; 9, 10. Psalm lxxiv has inversion first (5, 6; 6, 5 in lines), and then a single pair of sextets. For a remarkable example of inversion in Wisdom poetry see The House of Wisdom and the House of Folly on page 914.

From antistrophic must be distinguished the third type, or Strophic Structure: here the strophes have no correspondence of rhythmic form, but are merely divisions resting upon the thought of the poem, like the paragraphs of prose. Examples of this structure are psalms i, iv, xviii, xx, xli, liv, lvi, cxviii, cxxv, cxxxiv. It is the natural form for liturgies, in which each strophe represents a different mood of devotion (psalms xxv, lxv, lxxxvi). Psalm cxxxvi gives an example of Augmenting: the stanzas increase from four to five, six, seven couplets, returning in the conclusion to four. This is a Hymn of National Rejoicing: it should be read with the converse Hymn of National Depression (psalm xliv), where (the rhythm being antistrophic) there is a diminution from strophes of five to strophes of four, three, two couplets.

To Strophic Structure belongs the Pendulum Rhythm so characteristic of Biblical literature, by which successive strophes alternate between one and another of two thoughts. This rhythm distinguishes two kindred psalms lxxviii and cvi (see notes to these): also the latter part of psalm cvii. It belongs also to the elaborate hymns and anthems which alternate between ejaculations of praise and development of matter for thanksgiving: the form may be traced by the eye through psalms xlvii, xcv–vi, xcviii, c, cxxxv, cxlvi–cl.

In Wisdom poetry it is antistrophic structure that is usually found in connection with the pendulum effect so common in Biblical literature, by which a discourse swings successively between one and the other of two related topics. A simple example is on page 902: the first strophe (of a single line) puts temptation, its antistrophe resistance; the next strophe (of nine lines) elaborates the idea of temptation, its antistrophe that of resistance. The structure may be expressed as 1, 1; 9, 9. A fine example is the middle part of the poem on page 903. Here the thought swings between the obstinate sinners (in the strophes, indented to the right), and the avenging Wisdom (in the antistrophes, indented to the left). The formula would be 5, 5; 1, 1; 1, 1; 4, 4. — The pendulum constantly recurs in Job.

The main types of structure in biblical poetry, with their elaborations, have been described. Two other elements of biblical parallelism may be mentioned.

An interesting figure of parallelism is the Envelope: the opening line or lines of the sequence are repeated at the close, all that intervenes being read in the light of this common 'envelopment.' A perfect example is the eighth psalm: as printed on pages 751–2 the figure can be caught at a glance. [See page 1534, for the misinterpretation of this psalm through neglect of this envelope structure.] Similarly the recurrence of the ejaculation —

Bless the LORD, O my soul —

at the beginning and end of psalms ciii and civ turns both these into examples of envelope structure.

More frequently a modified form of the Envelope Structure is found, by which the opening and closing lines unite in a single thought of which the intermediate parts are an expansion. Thus in psalm xv, the opening lines of question,

LORD, who shall sojourn in thy tabernacle?
Who shall dwell in thy holy hill?

receive an answer in the final line,

He that doeth these things shall never be moved:

while the intermediate parallels contain the 'these things.' Compare psalm xxvi. A fine example is the great psalm cxxxix: here the opening protest,

O LORD, thou hast searched me, etc., concludes as a prayer:

Search me, O LORD:

while the whole antistrophic movement of the psalm is occupied with effecting the transition from the one mood to the other. (See note, page 1624.) Psalms xxiii and xxxiii are also examples of modified envelopment; the whole device of antistrophic inversion, and the type of psalm described as Dramatic Anthems (see note on page 1603), are akin to envelopment.

Interruption plays a leading part in the lyric structure of the psalms. First, we have stanzas interrupted by antistrophic structure. A typical example is psalm lv: here sextets of despairing complaint are broken by a strophe and antistrophe (8, 8 in couplets) of strong execration: there is a return to the sextet form (varied) with the final stage of trust in God. In psalm lxxxix, the covenantal promises to David developed in a long succession of quatrains make the main topic: when this has been barely opened there is an outburst (strophe in seven quatrains) of adoration; when the main topic is completed an antistrophe puts plaintively the disappointment of all these hopes. A very marked example is psalm lxix. Stanzas of four strains are conveying complaint: before the sixth of these stanzas is quite completed there breaks in an interruption of execration in seven couplets: this is seen to be a strophe when presently, after the broken stanza is completed, there comes an antistrophe of seven couplets celebrating the deliverance that ends the whole trouble. Interruption proceeds a stage further in psalms lxxx and lxxxiv. In the first, stanzas of elegy (two strains and refrain) are interrupted by strophe and antistrophe (four couplets each) developing the image of the Vine and its uprooting: but the refrain of the stanza section breaks in (with a modification) upon this antistrophic portion: thus the interruption is mutual. A still more striking example of mutual interruption is afforded by psalm lxxxiv: triplet stanzas of longing for the house of God are interrupted by antistrophic description of the pilgrimages (strophe) and the pilgrims' hymn (antistrophe): this last is broken by a parenthetic triplet of longing, and then resumes and concludes.

Or, stanzas are interrupted by stanzas of different rhythm. I have already pointed out this effect in regard to psalms ciii and civ (above, Mixed Stanzas). In psalm cii personal depression expressed in a succession of stanzas of three strains each is interrupted by a succession of stanzas of four couplets each, which rise to the plane of national trouble and its relief: there is then a return to the first rhythm and the first tone.

An effect akin to this Interruption may more properly be called Suspension. In psalm xi (see page 754 where the structural form is made plain to the eye) a stanza expressive of trust in Jehovah is interrupted by a strophe (2, 5) reciting hostile threats and its antistrophe of answering faith. But from the place at which the interruption occurs, viz. the end of a single line of a quatrain, the other three lines following after the interruption is concluded, it is better to regard the single stanza as 'suspended' until the antistrophic effect has been elaborated. Exactly similar is xciii: a sextet of confidence in the firmness of Jehovah's rule is broken by antistrophic interruption of an image that suggests assailing power driven back, and the suspended sextet is then concluded.

Metrical System of Job

The Book of Job, as it is preëminent in every other variety of poetic beauty, is also of extreme interest in its metrical scheme. The principles explained above for lyrical and Wisdom poetry in general apply here also; but they are used with much more elaboration. The changes of thought and of rhythm are so closely interwoven that it is practicable to divide the whole poem into metrical units, which will also be stages in the argument. It is so divided in the text of this edition (sections 1 to 50): and the references that follow are to these sections. [In the notes to Job, the metre of each section is technically described.]

The Antistrophic and Stanza Structures are the basis of the whole. The famous celebration of Wisdom with which Zophar brings to a conclusion the arguments of the Friends is a complete sonnet, of complex strophe, antistrophe, and conclusion. The very special form of sonnet designated Number Sonnet is found once, in the opening speech of Eliphaz; this is constructed on the number seven, and is worked out in couplets. Recitative couplets like the Leads of the psalms, are freely used, and twice (19, 46) they are extended to triplets. Considerable use is made in Job of Alternate Parallelism. In Proverbs this is confined to passages not prominent; but in Ecclesiasticus it makes up the body of the great monologue of Wisdom, while this rises to a climax in stanzas. So in Job some of the climaxes or sustained outbursts are in alternate parallelism. And it is extensively used for transitional passages, between one division and another of a lengthy argument, or where a speaker at the commencement of his speech notices half contemptuously the words of the last speaker before he enters upon his own line of attack.

The elaborations mentioned above appear, with more fulness and variety, but always in harmony with the elaboration of the thought. The antistrophic Pendulum is not found in Job; but the irregular form of this structure is several times employed in the sustained outbursts. And there is an extension of this structure in what may be called the Triple Pendulum. Here the swaying of thought is between three and not two ideas. Job's Oath of Clearing is of this form. This is, as it were, a song constructed on three notes: one describes the sins to be disavowed; a second invokes penalties if the speaker has been guilty of them; while a third note is made by a recoil from the very thought of entertaining such sins against God.

If I have walked with vanity,
And my foot hath hasted to deceit;
(Let me be weighed in an even balance,
That God may know mine integrity;)
If my step hath turned out of the way,
And mine heart walked after mine eyes,
And if any spot hath cleaved to mine hands:
Then let me sow, and let another eat;
Yea, let the produce of my field be rooted out.

The same figure seems to underlie the first part of the Divine Intervention: one note is made by the startling questions of nature mysteries, another subsides into exquisite picturing of details in these wonders of nature, while for a third there is an occasional word of challenge to Job to answer.

Where the structure is antistrophic, Interlacing and Introversion are regularly used. In a single instance the two are found to be combined (see note to section 34).

Duplication of stanzas regularly occurs. In Job's answer to Eliphaz (see page 1045) an extension of it is found in a group of verses taking the forms 1, 6; 2, 12; 3, 18. The effect is increased by the order of the stanzas: Job having three times used the form 2, 12, in an accession of bitterness rises to the form 3, 18, and then subsides into despair in a verse of the form 1, 6. A new variety of duplication is to be noticed, when it is applied to antistrophic structure, the antistrophe being not the equal but the double of its strophe. The use of this figure by Elihu (40) is suggestive. He has reached the very heart of his argument, or rather, his modification of the argument of the Friends. Their contention was that affliction was punishment; and Eliphaz had introduced this idea with a description of an impressive vision. Elihu wishes to say that affliction is a warning, just as much as would be a supernatural vision. His words take the form of a strophe of three lines describing a vision, and an antistrophe of six lines putting the warning it conveys; then a strophe of eight lines describing the affliction of sickness, and an antistrophe of sixteen lines to convey the purpose of this sickness to warn. The symmetry of treatment, by which each strophe is duplicated, leads us instinctively to associate together the warning of affliction and the warning of a vision, while the increased mass of the second pair of verses serves to emphasise the form of warning on which Elihu is to lay stress. This figure then may be termed Antistrophic Duplication.

Augmenting stanzas are used in those passages in which Job has actual or imaginary objections to answer. In his first response to Zophar he confronts the wisdom of the aged, which has been urged against him, with a higher wisdom which he sees reflected in the doings of Omnipotence. As he warms with this theme the stanzas are found to increase, from the form 2, 8 to 2, 20. Job's second reply to Zophar cites four objections: the answers to these make stanzas of five lines, again of five lines, then of eight lines, finally of eleven. And here must be noted the Augmenting Alternation of Elihu. This speaker, it must be remembered, occupies the position of a young man intervening uninvited in a debate of old men. With the almost superstitious reverence for old age that belongs to early civilisations, it is natural to find that Elihu has great difficulty in nerving himself to this effort; and it takes him fifty-two lines to complete his apology for speaking at all in so venerable a presence. The stanzas which express this gradual conquest over nervousness are found to take the highly suggestive forms, 1, 1; 1, 1 2, 2; 2, 2 4, 4; 4, 4 6, 6; 6, 6. Later on he has been threatening Job with judgment, when a rumble of distant thunder darts into his mind the idea that the judgment is that moment impending. His thoughts now become engrossed with the advancing signs of the storm; and the growing excitement expresses itself in stanzas of the forms, 1, 3; 1, 3 2, 6; 2, 6 4, 12; 4, 12. This second example is duplication combined with augmenting. It would be impossible to imagine any closer harmony between the outer form of a scene and its inner spirit (sections 38, 44).

Of Variation it is enough to say that it is used as in other parts of Scripture, but to a much less extent than we should have expected. Interruption plays an important part in the dramatic poetry of Job. Its first appearance is at the opening of the Curse. The essence of this whole section is contained in two couplets.

Let the day perish wherein I was born;
And the night which said, There is a man child conceived:

Because it shut not up the doors of my mother's womb,
Nor hid trouble from mine eyes!

But between these two couplets are interposed two tours-de-force of execration, invoking upon that day and that night all conceivable forms of darkening. Again, Bildad's first speech has the form of sextet stanzas. Two of these suffer interruption: in the one a conditional sentence is delayed by additional conditions; and in the other case a stanza of illustration is loaded with an additional illustration. A marked case of interruption is found in Job's speech before the Oath of Clearing (35). The whole passage describes how the patriarch is despised by the youths and the rabble, and consists of two octets. The first octet is interrupted by an outburst of fifteen lines, presenting the fathers of these youths as the very canaille of the last generation. The second stanza has an interruption of only a single line, which comes as an echo of the previous outburst. Interruption is used for a different dramatic purpose in the great passage where Job rises to a sudden confidence in a vindication beyond the grave. With the magnitude of this sudden inspiration Job (as his words clearly convey) nearly faints: and at this point (see section 20) one of the quatrains lacks a single line. When he has resumed in a calmer mood, there is again a lack of a line where Zophar breaks in upon the unfinished sentence, as he himself confesses, because he cannot any longer restrain his indignation.

Job contains one example of Suspension. Elihu, when he passes from apology to argument (39), recites in a sextet what he conceives to be Job's plea, and in the same measure answers it. These two sextets do not follow one another, but the plea is interposed in the middle of the answer; the first sextet being thus suspended, and concluded when the point to be answered has been stated. That this is the right way of analysing the metre seems confirmed by the fact that a similar effect immediately succeeds in the next section; the antistrophic duplication described above being interposed between the two parts of a sextet which evidently make one whole (see note to section 40).

The Metre of Traditional Poetry

By Traditional Poetry I mean the metrical passages preserved in the historical books of the Bible, as distinguished from such poetry as the Book of Psalms, which is a literary collection, though it may contain ancient poems. I exclude from the matter here reviewed metrical passages in II Samuel xxii and I Chronicles xvi; which are identical with passages in the Book of Psalms.

This Traditional Poetry is found to be constructed upon a basis of what may be called 'Antique Rhythm,' the law of which can be simply stated. Its unit consists in a couplet of parallelism, of which either member may be strengthened by a parallel line, but not both.

Assemble yourselves, and hear, ye sons of Jacob,
And hearken unto Israel your father.

Zebulun shall dwell at the haven of the sea:
And he shall be for an haven of ships;
And his border shall be upon Zidon.

Judah, thee shall thy brethren praise:
Thy hand shall be on the neck of thine enemies;
Thy father's sons shall bow down before thee.

I have called such a unit a ' strain ': and it will be seen in the examples that the first strain is a simple couplet, the second has its first line strengthened, the last has its second line strengthened. For the appreciation of this Antique Rhythm it is important to think always of the strain as the unit, and not the couplet or the single line. The only exception to the law as above stated is the Lament of David over Saul and Jonathan, which is constructed on a couplet in which both lines are strengthened by parallel lines. But this, though contained in an historical book, is associated with the same David to whom the Book of Psalms is ascribed. [Page 281.]

This power of occasionally strengthening either line of a couplet by an additional line gives the Antique Rhythm a flexibility which would be suitable to spontaneous composition. A similar device is found in connection with the traditional ballad poetry of England, of which such collections as the Percy Reliques are accidentally preserved specimens. While a regular metre of such ballads is a four line alternate stanza, yet a few poems, such as the Ballad of Sir Cauline, show some stanzas with individual lines strengthened:

Fair Christabel, that lady mild,
Was had forth of her tower;
But ever she droopeth in her mind,
As nipt by an ungentle wind
Doth some pale lilly flower.

The metrical passages in the historic books are aggregations of such strains of Antique Rhythm, without further rhythmic form. The question is whether there are stanzas or strophes. I believe the utmost that can be said is that the stanza sense is rudimentary in these poems. Particular strains will seem to cluster together, as if to make quatrains or larger stanzas, but no wide correspondence will be found extending over a whole poem, or uniting one division of a poem with another. And this is what was to be expected: (a) The poems are largely spontaneous outpourings, needing a flexible rhythm, unfavourable to high parallelism. (b) The power to strengthen by additional lines is itself antagonistic to the stanza idea. (c) The cleavage of these poems will often be determined by other than rhythmic considerations. A good example is the Blessing of Jacob on the Twelve Tribes (page 50), of which the natural divisions are twelve (or rather eleven, Simeon and Levi being taken together). These divisions are found to be very unequal, consisting of one, two, three, five or eight strains. There is more of form in this poem than is usual in this traditional poetry; besides an introduction, there is an exclamation dividing the whole in two parts:

I have waited for thy salvation, O LORD!

Yet so little does the sense of balance rule that we find seven tribes dealt with before the dividing line, and only five after. On the other hand there is a suggestion of a sense of balance when we find that the long blessings on Judah and on Joseph, which respectively make the pièce de resistance of the two parts, consist each of eight strains.

Two poems stand out from the above description, as exhibiting a highly elaborate rhythmic structure — Deborah's Song, and the Song of Moses and Miriam. Their form is closely associated with the dance and antiphonal performance. They fall into the class of lyric poetry the structure of which has been discussed above; and it has been noted that the dance is one of the three sources of lyric structure.

Metre of Solomon's Song

The metre of Solomon's Song will be found to be both regular and beautiful when once its principle is caught. It presents points of resemblance and difference when compared with the metres of other parts of the Bible which have been already discussed.

The poem is in what I have called ' Antique Metre ': the metre of the poetry contained in the historical books of the Bible. Its law is simple. A unit or ' strain ' of Antique Metre consists of a single couplet of alternate parallelism, of which either line may be strengthened by an additional parallel line, but not both.

The voice of my beloved! behold, he cometh,
Leaping upon the mountains,
Skipping upon the hills.

My beloved is like a roe or a young hart:
Behold, he standeth behind our wall.

He looketh in at the windows,
He sheweth himself through the lattice.
My beloved spake, and said unto me.

Here are three 'strains': the second is a simple couplet; the third has its first line supplemented, and the first has its second line supplemented. The analysis of Antique Metre rests entirely upon the recognition of the 'strain' as its unit; in measuring its rhythmic correspondences the estimate must be made as to number of strains, not of lines.

Occasionally a line may be found that is considerably longer than adjacent lines. Such a line will sometimes contain a vocative, and this is felt as a recitative expression, outside rhythm.

I have compared thee, O my love, to a steed in Pharaoh's chariots.

Or its length may measure the effort of leading off a fresh subject.

By night, on my bed, I sought him whom my soul loveth.

In other cases the length is made by repetitions.

Come with me from Lebanon, my bride, with me from Lebanon.
Thou hast ravished my heart, my sister, my bride; thou hast ravished my heart.

There is nothing in these cases to upset the rhythmic balance.

In Antique Metre generally a poem will be an aggregation of such strains, without further rhythmic form. [Compare the Song of Moses, and the Last Words of Moses, in Deuteronomy.] But Solomon's Song has another rhythmic characteristic — it is throughout antistrophic: a strophe of one, two, or more strains is balanced by an antistrophe of the same number.

By night, on my bed, I sought him whom my soul loveth:
I sought him, but I found him not.
I said, I will rise now, and go about the city,
In the streets and in the broad ways,
I will seek him whom my soul loveth:
I sought him, but I found him not.

The watchmen that go about the city found me:
To whom I said, Saw ye him whom my soul loveth?
It was but a little that I passed from them,
When I found him whom my soul loveth:
I held him, and would not let him go,
Until I had brought him into my mother's house,
And into the chamber of her that conceived me.

A strophe of three strains is here answered by an antistrophe of the same number. The student will be careful to distinguish between the number of lines and the number of strains in the strophes. So fundamental is the idea of the strain as the unit in Antique Metre, that one strain is always felt as rhythmic counterpoise to another strain, whatever be the exact number of lines in each.

The antistrophic rhythm in this poem is of the continuous kind, so familiar in Greek literature, where each strophe is immediately followed by its antistrophe — aa' bb' cc'.

This we have above called alternation. There is a single case of antistrophic inversion in Solomon's Song (ab b'a'). It is noticeable that it occurs, not in dialogue, but at the point (in Idyl III) where the dialogue gives place to impersonal description. (Pages 890–1.)

The divisions between the strophes and the divisions between the speeches of dialogue do not necessarily coincide; sometimes portions of successive speeches are required to make a strophe, and sometimes the division of strophe and antistrophe will come in the middle of a speech.

Strophe

THE BRIDEGROOM

Behold, thou art fair, my love; behold, thou art fair;
Thine eyes are as doves.

THE BRIDE

Behold, thou art fair, my beloved, yea, pleasant:
Also our couch is green.
The beams of our house are cedars,
And our rafters are firs.

Antistrophe

I am a rose of Sharon,
A lily of the valleys.

THE BRIDEGROOM

As a lily among thorns,
So is my love among the daughters.

THE BRIDE

As the apple tree among the trees of the wood,
So is my beloved among the sons.

The refrains used to separate the seven idyls, or to break the longer idyls into parts, though in the same Antique Metre, are yet outside the antistrophic system, — a confirmation of the parenthetic character I have claimed for them. (See Introduction to Song of Songs, page 1444.)

There is one break in the antistrophic completeness, and this is highly interesting. It occurs in Idyl V. If a strophe with its antistrophe be considered a regular section of the poem, then this idyl covers four sections; of these the first and the last two have the regular strophe and antistrophe, each of three strains. The intervening section has a strophe of three strains, but the place of the antistrophe is taken by an irregular succession of strains. But when this irregular mass is examined, it is found to be the quasi-dramatic reminiscence which is projected into the midst of the meditation on the bride that occupies the idyl as a whole. (See Introduction, page 1447.) Thus the break in the regularity of the rhythm is the outward and visible sign of a break in the order of the thought. [Compare in Job note to section 20, where it is shown that interruptions of the dialogue are reflected in interruptions of the metre.]

The metre of each section is analysed as follows.

i. 2. Strophes of two strains each. The metre is so broken by the dialogue that it may be worth while to print the lines continuously:

Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth:
For thy love is better than wine;
Thine ointments have a goodly fragrance;
Thy name is as ointment poured forth:
Therefore do the virgins love thee.
Draw me — we will run after thee.
The king hath brought me into his chambers.
We will be glad and rejoice in thee,

We will make mention of thy love more than of wine.
In uprightness do they love thee.

Use of Prose and Verse in the Modern Reader's Bible

The subject of the preceding Note leads naturally to another — the relations of prose to verse in such a system as has been there described. Biblical verse rests upon the parallelism of clauses. But, in all languages, parallelism of clauses belongs also to prose literature, being a marked feature of oratory. In such a system then prose and verse will overlap; the extremes of each will be as far apart as in other languages, but there will be passages which have relations with both.

The subject is of special importance for the presentation of the Bible made in the present work. The reader will notice passages — especially in such a book as Ecclesiasticus * — appearing here as prose, which in other editions of Scripture he has seen as verse; further, upon examination he may seem to find as much 'parallelism' in the prose portions as in the verse portions of this presentation. The explanation is simple. Neither class of passages is 'prose,' and neither 'verse,' in the sense in which the reader has been accustomed to use these terms; but the conventional forms of prose and of verse are here used to differentiate literary types which need differentiating, but the difference between which is not wholly rhythmical. To illustrate. The passage which commences at Deuteronomy viii. 11 may, if we look exclusively at parallelism of clauses, be presented as highly symmetrical 'verse.'

* This subject is further discussed in the Introduction to Ecclesiasticus, above, page 1459.

Beware lest thou forget the LORD thy God,
In not keeping his commandments and his judgements and his statutes,
Which I command thee this day:

Lest when thou hast eaten,
And art full,
And hast built goodly houses,
And dwelt therein:

And when thy herds and thy flocks multiply,
And thy silver and thy gold is multiplied,
And all that thou hast is multiplied;

Then thine heart be lifted up,
And thou forget the LORD thy God,
Which brought thee forth out of the land of Egypt,
Out of the house of bondage;

Who led thee through the great and terrible wilderness,
Wherein were fiery serpents and scorpions,
And thirsty ground where was no water;
Who brought thee forth water out of the rock of flint;
Who fed thee in the wilderness with manna
Which thy fathers knew not; *
That he might humble thee,
And that he might prove thee,
To do thee good at thy latter end:

And thou say in thine heart, My power,
And the might of my hand hath gotten me this wealth:
But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God,
For it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth:

Of course it would not be proper so to present the passage, because examination of the matter, and its relation to the rest of Deuteronomy, shows that this is oratory, and that we have here the parallelism which belongs to rhetoric, not the parallelism which belongs to verse.

An interesting corollary from the principles here laid down is that, in such a system, prose and verse can unite in the same rhythmic scheme. If the reader will turn to the first act of the rhapsody of Amos (pages 698–700) he will see a succession of seven well marked stanzas, each constituted by regular recurrence of prose in combination with verse; he will note further how the verse portions are fixed in their form (except at the conclusion), while the prose portions, as might be expected, are highly elastic. The effect is very much like the combination of recitative and timed bars in a musical chant. And this constitutes a valuable addition to the sources of rhythmic effect in literature.

This combination of verse and prose in the same rhythmic system characterises a literary type of very frequent recurrence in the Bible, which is here called the 'doom form,' because it is so regularly found in the Doom Songs. This form involves passages of Divine monologue (here presented as 'prose') with interruptions of passages of lyric celebration (here presented as 'verse'). It is interesting to note, in such an example as the Book of Zephaniah (pages 726–9), how the 'prose' portions can be read by themselves, and will be found to make a continuous whole; similarly the 'verse' passages make a poem in themselves.

The arrangement must be judged by its results in assisting the reader to catch the literary effect of what he reads. But I may illustrate the sort of discriminations which I have attempted. An important case may be illustrated by Isaiah's Doom prophecy on Babylon (xiii. 1). Here, as in many similar cases, we have a Divine word of denunciation and threatening [here presented as prose], interrupted at intervals by what seem to be songs of exclamation, or celebration of what the Divine word conveys. The 'prose' passages make a complete discourse of denunciation; the 'verse' passages constitute highly artistic interruptions and emphasis. In his Doom of Moab (xv. 1), the order is reversed: we have a highly rhythmic wail over fallen Moab, interrupted at intervals by [prose passages] the Divine word denouncing and threatening. In the opening of the Rhapsody of Zion Redeemed (page 514) a Divine word of comfort is spoken [prose], and Voices [represented by verse] carry the tidings over the wilderness to Zion. The first Vision of this rhapsody is a lengthy discourse of God, interrupted at times by [verse] outbursts of joy. The third Vision is a succession of appeals from God to Zion [prose], with occasional passages [verse] of some other power that seconds the appeal of Jehovah. There are many similar examples.

Other cases are more general. The difficult prophecy of Isaiah vii. 1–16 becomes intelligible if we understand the [prose] testimony of Isaiah as interrupted by ballad fragments of the enemy quoted in scorn. The rhapsody that closes Book IV (pages 497–501) has a general dramatic movement [conveniently represented as prose] interrupted by what are announced as 'songs.' And such announcement of 'songs' in the midst of what as a whole belongs to some other literary form is common.

Another discrimination which I have made by the same device is illustrated by the prophecy of the Watchman (pages 493–5). Here we have alternately vivid realisation of something seen in vision, and the prophet's explanation or meditation: the forms of verse lines and continuous prose fit well with the alternating passages. Kindred examples occur, commencing viii. 9, xviii. 1, xxxiv. 1. Important cases are the first and third Songs of Zion Exalted (pages 529, 531). In the first, what I have presented in verse form makes a song-like poem, complete in itself, celebrating Zion as Jehovah's Bride; it is interrupted by passages, distinctly spoken by Jehovah, giving in the style of discourse the basis for this conception. Similarly the verse portions of the third 'song' are spoken by Zion to the Nations, and make a complete appeal; the interrupting passages [presented as prose] give Jehovah's commission that constitutes Zion a witness in this manner to the Nations. A confirmation of this arrangement is found in the words (page 531), "For my thoughts are not your thoughts," etc. A study of the whole shows that the for connects what follows, not with the sentence immediately preceding, but with the previous [prose] passage: the thought that God's mysterious work is as sure as the operations of nature emphasises, not the promise of pardon to the nations, but the mysterious elevation of afflicted Zion to the position of a witness to the peoples of the world.

Most of the above examples have been taken from the single work of Isaiah; but the combination of verse and prose will be found to extend through prophetic writings in general.

On Footnotes

It is a fact that writers of antiquity — Hebrew, Greek, Roman — and English writers who (like Milton) composed under the immediate influence of ancient literature, used parenthetic sentences of length and complexity such as would be used by no modern writer in any language. To some extent this reflects a real difference in mental habits as regards involution of thought. But the difference is partly due to an advance in the mechanism by which literature is presented to the eye. In such matters as punctuation and the use of brackets, and in paragraphing, the printed page does far more to assist the comprehension of the subject-matter than was done by the manuscripts of antiquity or the earliest printed books. But the most important device of this kind is the 'footnote.' It is clear that the footnotes of modern books are no more than parentheses, removed to a distance so as not to interrupt the main flow of the argument; their matter has an indicated place in the order of the thought, but their separation assists the mind to hold the train of thought suspended while the subordinate matter is being taken in. Clear examples of such footnotes will be found in Deuteronomy, pages 160, 161, 162, 169. It seems to me, then, legitimate to apply this device to some of the elaborate parentheses in such a work as Wisdom.*

It is hardly necessary to explain that by putting such portions of the text into footnotes I am not meaning to suggest that they are 'glosses,' or that they have any less authority as representatives of the writer's thought than the rest of the matter. All that is meant is that the passages so treated carry their parenthetic character to the degree which in a modern work would be indicated by the use of footnotes. To the modern reader, whose mental attitude is determined by the custom of such devices, this treatment seems a necessity, if such works as Wisdom are to be appreciated without being weighted with an appearance of awkwardness which in reality does not belong to them. At the same time, if, as is generally believed by scholars, commentators' glosses have found their way in the lapse of time into the sacred text, the proper treatment for such passages will be to make them footnotes.

The Parenthetic Preface

A notable feature of the prophetic style, especially in Isaiah and Amos, is what may be termed the Parenthetic Preface: that is, the tendency to place what is prefatory in character, not before, but after, or in the middle of, that which it prefaces.

The most interesting example is Isaiah viii. 9 (pages 480–1). The prophecy is as a whole a highly realistic vision of peoples combining against Judah but brought to confusion. The vision is interrupted in the middle by the Divine commission to the prophet, commanding him to lay before the panic-stricken of Judah a Divine 'law and testimony' to which they should seek instead of consulting familiar spirits and wizards. The interest of this example is that this parenthetic commission is itself interrupted in the middle by the prophet's acceptance of it: he and his children [to whom he has given significant names, Shear-jashub and Maher-shalal-hash-baz] are living signs in Israel. This preface within a preface makes the whole prophecy suggestive of an algebraic expression with double brackets:

Proud foes [A word (Prophet accepts) for the timid] overthrown.

Similar examples occur often. It is significant that the original call of Isaiah to his ministry is placed at the end of Book I. In the second Vision of Zion Redeemed the soliloquy of Jehovah's Servant on his mission occurs between his ministry to Israel and his ministry to the Nations. In Isaiah's Covenant with Death (page 501) the course of the prophecy is interrupted by answers to those who attack the whole ministry of Isaiah: there is a similar interruption to the series of visions of Amos (page 704). The prophecy against trust in Egypt (page 503) is interrupted by an oracle against Egypt. The companion pictures of destruction and restoration (pages 506–7) are each interrupted by prefatory verses emphasising the importance of the prophecy. In the third Vision of Zion Redeemed the song of the Watchmen (page 527) begins before the announcement of the singers: The voice of thy Watchmen, etc. And in the fifth Vision (page 531) Zion is heard issuing its invitation before the words of God which proclaim Zion a witness to the Nations.

There is an extension of the same principle when we find passages conveying realistically a supernatural vision before we have the words that introduce the idea of a seer in the position to behold the vision. The effect is not unlike that of classical poetry which made it a law to plunge in medias res, and leave the commencement of the story to be afterwards brought out indirectly. The prophecies of the Watchman are a clear example (see pages 493–5): another is the Doom of Ethiopia (page 491).

In the Book of Amos the Parenthetic Preface is a still more marked feature of style. See above, page 1390, and the notes to that book.

The Pendulum Movement

The student of biblical literature should keep before him a special tendency of Hebrew thought, to substitute for temporal or logical succession an alternation between opposite thoughts, like the swinging to and fro of a pendulum. This is of frequent occurrence in Isaiah.

The most extended example is in the first Vision of Zion Redeemed (pages 515–23). The situation is that the Nations and Israel are summoned before the bar of Jehovah to hear of his deliverance wrought through Cyrus. God is the sole speaker: and his discourse—prolonged through eight chapters — is a regular alternation (seven times repeated) between appeals to the Nations and addresses to Israel. A similar pendulum-like swinging between the ideas of Judgment and Salvation closes this rhapsody (pages 540–2): the change sometimes occurring in the middle of a sentence. An interruption takes place at one point (page 541): but the interruption is itself a pendulum swing between cries of the lost and the saved.

The rhapsody that closes Isaiah, Book IV (pages 497–501: the difficult chapters xxiv–xxvii of the ordinary arrangement of Isaiah), is wholly constructed on this form of movement. Its three parts do not succeed one another in order of time: the judgment is complete in the first two, and is but commencing at the beginning of the third. But throughout the whole there is the alternation between Judgment and Salvation: and from this point of view the three sections can be seen to increase in intensity. Thus the advance in dramatic movement can be represented by the quickening of the pendulum swing:

Section 1 J S J
Section 2 J S J S
Section 3 J S J S J S J S J S

The pendulum movement may be a touchstone for interpretation of difficult passages. The obscurity of Isaiah ix is in this work removed by assuming an alternation between triumph of Judah's enemies and triumph of Judah. (See pages 480–1.)

Use of Direct Metaphor, especially in the Psalms

A particular mode of conveying imagery comes to be of special importance in the poetry of the Psalms from its bearing upon questions of interpretation.

According to a well-known distinction, the Simile is a branch of imagery in which the comparison is indicated by a distinct particle (like, as, etc.) linking the image to the direct statement.

As the hart panteth after the water brooks,
So panteth my soul after thee, O God.

A Metaphor, on the contrary, has no such symbol of comparison, but the words conveying the image are interwoven into the framework of the direct sentence:

My hunted soul panteth after the water brooks of Zion.

The interweaving may be effected in a large variety of ways: and it is not difficult to see that some modifications of the expression may be such that the metaphorical element may have the appearance of direct speech. One modification of the image just cited might be —

A hunted hart panteth after the water brooks of Zion:

but this is an ambiguous expression, which might be interpreted as a direct statement of fact, and not a metaphor. Such expressions I am here calling Direct Metaphors.

There are several places in the Book of Psalms where the interpretation of a whole poem, or section of a poem, seems to turn upon the question whether certain words are metaphor or direct speech. In psalm viii, we find —

Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings hast thou established strength, etc.

This has been read as a direct statement, and various attempts have been made, with little success, to explain the allusion. It is better to understand an image: Out of man, who is, as it were, no more than a babe and suckling in comparison with the world he is to govern, hast thou established strength of rule, etc. The ordinary mistake has been caused by neglect of the structure of this psalm. The usual versions make the opening apostrophe consist of three lines:

O LORD, our Lord,
How excellent is thy name in all the earth:
Who hast set thy glory upon the heavens.

Accordingly, the commencement of the argument becomes the sentence, Out of the mouth of babes, etc., which naturally wears the air of a direct statement. But the envelope figure requires in the present case that only two lines constitute the opening (and closing) apostrophe (see pages 751–2); and the opening of the argument now reads thus:

Who hast set thy glory upon the heavens,
Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings hast thou established strength, etc.

That the architect of the mighty heavens should have elected the mere babe, man, as his deputy over creation is the wonder, not only of the opening lines, but of the whole psalm, which takes a clear unity under the title, Man the Viceroy of God.

Again, a critical sentence in psalm lxxviii is the following:

The children of Ephraim, being armed and carrying bows,
Turned back in the day of battle.
They kept not the covenant of God, etc.

It has been customary to see in this an allusion to a specific historical incident, though no satisfactory incident of history has been adduced. Here, again, the whole can be read as a piece of imagery: Like warriors who, in armour and with weapons in hand, turn their backs in the midst of the battle, so the children of Ephraim were treacherous to the covenant of God. No particular incident is described, but the whole defection of northern Israel from the covenant is compared to soldiers deserting on the field of battle. And this makes a suitable starting-point for the psalm, which is a national hymn of Judah, portraying alternately God's strength displayed over his people, and their frailty resisting his purposes, until a final outburst of divine power rejects northern Israel and proclaims the house of David as the chosen people. It may be added that a not dissimilar image (but this time in simile form) occurs in verse 57:

But turned back, and dealt treacherously like their fathers:
They were turned aside like a deceitful bow.

Another important case arises in psalm lxxxiv:

Yea, the sparrow hath found her an house,
And the swallow a nest for herself, where she may lay her young,
Even thine altars, O LORD of hosts, my king and my God.

Read as direct statement, this has been understood by some commentators to refer the psalm to the period of the exile when the temple is in ruins, the haunt of birds; others see an indication that the poet must have been a dweller in the temple precincts, accustomed to watch the birds flitting round the sacred edifice. A better interpretation is surely found by understanding an image: Like the birds finding in spring their nesting places, so the sacred seasons of the pilgrimages bring me to the altars of God. Nothing else in the psalm suggests the period of the exile, the whole being filled with the idea of the pilgrimages to Jerusalem at the sacred feasts: the passage here discussed adds the exquisite image which compares the joyous approach of the sacred festivals with a stirring instinct of birds in the nesting season.

There are no less than three psalms, ordinarily classed as exile songs, where the doubt arises as between metaphor and direct expression. The one of the three which has the best claim to be construed directly is the lament of psalms xlii–iii, where there is certainly a prima facie appearance of directness in the detailed expression —

Therefore do I remember thee from the land of Jordan,
And the Hermons, from the hill Mizar.

Yet the poem as a whole leaves strong doubt in my own mind whether it is to be read as an exile's lament. Exiled the speaker certainly is from the house of his God: but this may be by sickness, or other personal hindrance, such as would go well with the depression of the first two stanzas. There is an absence of any local colour of a foreign land, and the conquest of hope at the close gives no hint of an expected return to a native soil. If the poem be read of exile from the house of God only, then, amid the strong metaphors of stanza 2, one more metaphor is added by the above quotation: Like a traveller taking his last look at the home land he is leaving, so does my memory yearn after the place of my God. — In psalm lxi it appears to me certain that the expression of the first stanza is metaphorical:

From the end of the earth will I call unto thee, when my heart is overwhelmed, etc.

The image of a cry from an infinite distance is to measure the depth of overwhelming trouble; and it is a supposed case, not a statement of fact. All the rest of the poem is entirely out of keeping with an exiled king: the speaker rejoices in success —

Thou hast given me the heritage of those that fear thy name.

The companion psalm, lxiii, presents a case that is not quite so strongly in favour of direct statement; but even here the opening stanza becomes much more striking when the words, My flesh longeth for thee in a dry and weary land where no water is, are understood to convey an image of longing. The same image is used for longing in psalm cxliii. 6. The three stanzas go on to describe the king's longings as felt in the sanctuary, in the night watches, amidst his enemies; and the whole concludes with a triumph out of keeping with a literal rendering of the opening stanza.

It will be obvious that, in regard to any one of the passages discussed in this note, the case in favour of a metaphorical as against a literal interpretation is strengthened by the other examples adduced of Direct Metaphor. It may be added that allied usages are often found in cases where no doubt of the meaning would really arise. Such are (psalm lxviii),

Rebuke the wild beast of the reeds,
The multitude of the bulls, with the calves of the peoples:

where metaphorical names are substituted for the proper names of peoples; or again (psalm lxxvi), In Salem also is his covert, and his lair in Zion. The abruptness of Hebrew favours Direct Metaphor.

It must not be supposed that such use of Direct Metaphor is confined to the Psalms. A striking example is in the Book of Habakkuk, ii. 5: Wine is a treacherous dealer, etc. This, which might be read as a proverbial statement, is really the image on which depends the whole solution of the mystery of the book; the haughty career of the Chaldeans is compared to the reeling of the drunkard which precedes his fall. Similarly in the Doom of the Chaldeans which follows (pages 722–3): the ideas reflected in successive strophes — usury, house building, violence as a means for building up cities, drunkenness — have usually been understood literally, as so many characteristics of the Chaldeans. A truer interpretation is to understand each as an image, by which the sudden fall of the Chaldeans is illustrated. [See note to the passage, below, page 1596.]

On Literary Formulæ in Ecclesiastes

One of the characteristic features of style in this writer is the employment over and over again of certain phrases, which have the effect of formulæ. But they are not used with the precision and uniformity of philosophic terms; on the contrary they are artistically varied, and add a subtle literary charm to the book.

Vanity of vanities, all is vanity.
All things are full of weariness.
All is vanity and a striving after wind.
This also was vanity.
There is a vanity which is done upon the earth.
It cometh in vanity, and departeth in darkness (vi. 4).
There be many things that increase vanity (vi. 11).

Etymologically the word for 'vanity' is suggestive of breath or vapour. But the force of these formulæ is best appreciated by noting how the word occupies the position which in other biblical philosophy is occupied by the word 'wisdom,' in the sense of the universal harmony or one-ness. Thus 'vanity' to this thinker connotes the failure to satisfy the reflective faculty. In this connection 'all' or 'all things' is suggestive: it is antithetic to the conception of a unity in the universe.

All that is done under heaven.
All the works that are done under the sun.
What it was good for the sons of men that they should do under the heaven all the days of their life.
The work that is wrought under the sun.
There is a grievous evil which I have seen under the sun.
Who can tell a man what shall be after him under the sun?
Thou knowest not what evil shall be upon the earth.
All the days of the life of thy vanity, which he hath given thee under the sun.
(many others)

The whole group of expressions, under the sun, or upon the earth, etc., make formulæ for the objective world, antithetic to the world of consciousness and reflection which fills the thought of the book. Another antithesis to these expressions is the following:

The work that God hath done from the beginning even to the end (iii. 11).
The work of God who doeth all (xi. 5).
Consider the work of God . . . God hath even made [prosperity] side by side with [adversity].

These are formulæ, not for the phenomena, but for the underlying principles which are hidden, and (Ecclestiastes thinks) impossible to discover. The two formulæ clash in one passage:

I beheld all the work of God, that man cannot find out the work that is done under the sun: because however much a man labour to seek it out, yet he shall not find it (viii. 17).

Another set of expressions are used to introduce distinct stages or steps in the reflective process.

I communed with mine own heart.
I said in mine heart.
I searched in mine heart how . . .
Then I looked.
And I turned myself to behold.
I returned, and saw.
All this have I seen, and applied my heart unto . . .
etc.

The following make an important group.

There is nothing better for a man than that he should eat and drink, and make his soul enjoy good in his labour (ii. 24).
Who can eat, or who can have enjoyment, more than I?
Nothing better for them than to rejoice and to get good so long as they live: and also that every man should eat and drink, and enjoy good in all his labour is . . . (iii. 12–13).
There is nothing better than that a man should rejoice in his works (iii. 22).
Good . . . and comely . . . to eat and to drink, and to enjoy good in all his labour (v. 18).
Riches and wealth and . . . power to eat thereof, and to take his portion, and to rejoice in his labour (v. 19).
God giveth riches, wealth, and honour, so that he lacketh nothing for his soul of all that he desireth, yet God giveth him not power to eat thereof (vi. 2).
Then I commended mirth, because a man hath no better thing under the sun than to eat and to drink and to be merry: and that this should accompany him in his labour all the days of his life (viii. 15).

When all these passages are read together it becomes evident that the expression eat and drink is not used by this writer in the limited sense of indulging sensuous appetite, but as a formula for appreciation in the widest extent: some of these passages applying eat and drink to riches, to labour, and even to honour. A similar remark may be made as to mirth: the last quotation makes it an element of labour. As a fact, Ecclesiastes never dwells upon the revel, or the sensuous, by itself: all happy appreciation of life is treated as one.

The word 'labour' has the appearance of being used as a formula.

What hath a man of all his labour, and of the striving of his heart wherein he laboureth under the sun? (ii. 22).
I hated all my labour . . . seeing that I must leave it unto the man that shall be after me (ii. 18).
Then I looked on all the works that my hands had wrought, and on the labour that I had laboured to do (ii. 11).

etc.

The sense suggested seems to be the effort of production, as antithetic to consumption.

The word time enters into the usage of formulæ.

To everything there is a season, and a time to every purpose under the heaven (iii. 1).
He hath made everything beautiful in its time (iii. 11).

A wise man's heart discerneth time and judgement: for to every purpose there is a time and judgement (viii. 5).
For man also knoweth not his time . . . so are the sons of men snared in an evil time (ix. 12).

It will be argued below (pages 1639–40) that the word time in the two sets of passages points to totally different ideas.

In reference to the word wisdom itself a distinction may be made. To a great extent the word is used in this book in a very general sense, as the equivalent of knowledge, or the antithesis to folly.

To know wisdom, and to know madness and folly (i. 17).
Whose labour is with wisdom, and with knowledge, and with skilfulness (ii. 21).

It approaches a formula when used of the reflective process, either for the process itself or its results.

All this have I proved in wisdom . . . to seek wisdom and the reason of things (vii. 23).
To search out by wisdom concerning all that is done under heaven (i. 13).
I have seen wisdom under the sun in this wise, and it seemed great unto me (ix. 13).
(Mine heart yet guiding me with wisdom) (ii. 3).
Also my wisdom remained with me (ii. 9).

The two last quotations — from the imaginary experiment of Solomon — are specially important: he is experimenting in folly, but retaining all the while 'wisdom' that could reflect on the folly.

On Quotations and Buried Verses

It will be noted in this edition of Ecclesiasticus that in certain compositions which are presented as prose, there occur isolated passages having the form of verse. These quotations, or verse passages buried in prose compositions, are both interesting in themselves, and further furnish an important instrument of exegesis, which will often assist over obscurities or irregularities of sentence flow.

To begin with one example which is unquestionable. In the last essay of Book I, that on 'The Horror of Adultery,' there is thus 'buried' a number sonnet on the same theme.

Two sorts of men multiply sins,
And the third will bring wrath:
A Hot Mind,
A Fornicator in the body of his flesh,
A Man that goeth astray from his own Bed.

No literary form is so unmistakable as a number sonnet: and the above is found without the omission of a single word in the essay; only, it does not stand out by itself, but is 'buried' in the prose of the essay, its several clauses worked into sentences of comment. (See page 979.)

With this may be taken other cases, scarcely less clear. The epigram represented as a quotation in an essay at xli. 14 occurs by itself at xx. 30; and Fritzsche recognises this as a popular proverb. The verses printed in the Essay on the Stedfast Friend (page 978) have a flow of sentence quite different from the uniform flow that precedes and follows: and the suggestion of these as a quotation is confirmed by what seems a reference to the same at xxvii. 21. To my own mind the conclusion of the Essay on Riches (page 988) is not less clearly a verse quotation: parallelism in prose can be carried to great lengths, but a passage which is found to be a pair of triplets, with a third triplet regularly duplicated, can hardly be other than a sonnet, or portion of a sonnet.

The objection may possibly be made that other editors treat the whole context in which these passages occur as verse. But this does not meet the point: the question here is not what is to be called verse and what prose, but whether there is not a break or divergence between the literary form of these passages and that of their context, such as a citation might readily account for.

When once the occurrence of such 'buried verses' has been established, it will be easy to point out other cases in which such a suggestion cannot indeed be insisted on, but may be claimed as an improvement. In the 'chapter li,' which is here treated as an 'Author's Preface,' occurs a passage which, if printed as straightforward prose, will run as follows:

> And I lifted up my supplication from the earth, and prayed for deliverance from death. I called upon the Lord, the father of my Lord, that he would not forsake me in the days of affliction, in the time when there was no help against the proud. I will praise thy name continually, and will sing praise with thanksgiving. And my supplication was heard: for thou savedst me from destruction, and delivered me from the evil time: therefore will I give thanks and praise unto thee, and bless the name of the Lord.

The grammatical structure of this passage is difficult, not to say impossible, and altogether out of keeping with the easy rhetoric flow of the rest of this preface. The sudden future, "I will praise," might stand by itself, but there is a return to the past — "and my supplication was heard"; another future follows. Even the elasticity of the parenthesis can hardly be stretched so far as to make the first future clause harmonious. But if once a citation be supposed, the whole becomes easy.

And I lifted up my supplication from the earth, and prayed for deliverance from death.

I called upon the Lord,
The father of my Lord,
That he would not forsake me in the days of affliction;
In the time when there was no help against the proud:—
I will praise thy name continually,
And will sing praise with thanksgiving.

And my supplication was heard: for thou savedst me from destruction, and deliveredst me from the evil time: therefore will I give thanks and praise unto thee, and bless the name of the Lord.

As so arranged it is easy to see how the opening prose — "I lifted up my supplication" — is resumed — "And my supplication was heard": what comes between is precisely of the character of the psalms of deliverance in which the psalter abounds, and in which the abrupt future is a constant feature (compare Psalms cxxxix. 14, lxix. 30, lxxi. 22, cxliv. 9). Moreover the much disputed passage, "I called upon the Lord, the father of my Lord," is less difficult to understand in a poetic psalm than in an autobiographical preface.

Again, on page 995 is suggested the following quotation:

Of sorrow cometh death;
And sorrow of heart will bow down the strength.
In calamity sorrow also remaineth;
And the poor man's life is grievous to the heart.

The essay in which this occurs is short and extremely simple; every sentence of it has to do with the one topic — mourning for the dead. Of the above passage the first two lines are strictly relevant; the other two deal with sorrowful circumstances of another order. Now, it is quite natural for a writer, making an apposite quotation, to cite a whole verse where only half of it is essential to his point; but, if the passage be not a quotation, it is impossible to understand how the writer puts one wholly irrelevant sentence into the midst of other sentences which are all to the point.

It would be tedious to discuss every single case. If the reader will examine the verse quotations suggested at x. 18, xxviii. 10, xxix. 25, xxxii. 5, xxxiii. 24, xxxiv. 20, xxxv. 15, xli. 8, the arrangement will speak for itself.

In all but one of the quotations suggested so far the matter quoted is Wisdom literature. For such cases the term 'quotation' is almost too strong, since the evolution of Wisdom literature consists in a gradual progression from welding together of current sayings to the style which consists in the developing of thoughts. I pass on to a more important set of citations, found in the two compositions of Book V and in the Essay on God's Work of Creation, etc. (page 970), which may be taken with these. Here the case for recognising quotations is specially strong; moreover, such treatment solves the most obscure sentences of these compositions, and the passages so quoted represent a special literature with an interest of its own.

To take first the Essay. The verse passages — I refer to the first three, the rest being gnomic — stand out from their context as couched in different style: the pictorial phrase 'garnished' and the semipersonifications of the first passage, the highly poetical expression in the second, "He set his eye upon their hearts," are unlike the plain prose of the whole essay. In each case the resumption of prose after the suggested quotation comes in naturally; whereas if the whole be supposed to be continuous writing, there is great redundancy and repetition. Similar comments may be made on passages represented as verse at xliii. 7 and xlv. 20. The first does not join on naturally to what precedes if the whole be continuous. The second disturbs the narrative flow of sentences, but becomes entirely natural if regarded as a portion of a priestly hymn, introduced to support the statement: "He gave him a heritage."

The case is still clearer when we come to the longer quotation where the Praise of Famous Men reaches the name of Solomon (page 1004).

How wise wast thou made in thy youth,
And filled as a river with understanding!
Thy soul covered the earth,
And thou filledst it with dark parables.
Thy name reached unto the isles afar off;
And for thy peace thou wast beloved.
For thy songs and proverbs and parables,
And for thine interpretations, the countries marvelled at thee.
By the name of the Lord God,
Which is called the God of Israel,
Thou didst gather gold as tin,
And didst multiply silver as lead.

Thou didst bow thy loins unto women,
And in thy body thou wast brought into subjection.
Thou didst blemish thine honour,
And profane thy seed,
To bring wrath upon thy children;
And I was grieved for thy folly:
So that the sovereignty was divided,
And out of Ephraim ruled a disobedient kingdom.
But the Lord will never forsake his mercy;
And he will not destroy any of his works,
Nor blot out the posterity of his elect;
And the seed of him that loved him he will not take away;
And he gave a remnant unto Jacob,
And unto David a root out of him.

Of course there is nothing impossible in the idea of a prose composition apostrophising a personage to whom it alludes. But as a matter of fact, this and the similar passage on Elijah are the only apostrophes addressed to personages in Ecclesiasticus. It will be seen at once how different their style is from that of the context. There is, moreover, in the address to Solomon the unusual expression: "And I was grieved for thy folly." Fritzsche and other commentators translate the aorist by a present, and understand the words as a remark of the author. It is natural for the author to say he hates particular types of character; it would be less natural for him to speak of being grieved with a personage who had been dead for centuries. On the other hand, if this be part of a poetic hymn, the 'I' represents the sudden interposition of the Divine Speaker, which is common in the psalms (compare xxxii. 8, xlvi. 10, xiv. 4, xci. 14).

The apostrophe to Elijah is in all respects an important and a difficult passage.

How wast thou glorified, O Elijah, in thy wondrous deeds!
And who shall glory like unto thee?
Who did raise up a dead man from death,
And from the place of the dead, by the word of the Most High;
Who brought down kings to destruction,
And honourable men from their bed:
Who heard rebuke in Sinai,
And judgements of vengeance in Horeb;
Who anointed kings for retribution,
And prophets to succeed after him;
Who was taken up in a tempest of fire,
In a chariot of fiery horses;
Who was recorded for reproofs in their seasons,
To pacify anger before it brake forth into wrath;
To turn the heart of the father unto the son,
And to restore the tribes of Jacob.

Blessed are they that saw thee,
And they that have been beautified with love:
For we also shall surely live.

Elijah it was who was wrapped in a tempest: and Elisha was filled with his spirit; and in all his days he was not moved by fear of any ruler, and no one brought him into subjection.

The prose portion of this extract seems difficult if one author has been speaking throughout; all is quite natural if it be read as the author commenting on a quotation he has made. It is the concluding triplet which needs his comment; and he says in effect that, Elijah being the subject of the whole description, Elisha is the one to be understood in connection with the words, "they that have been beautified with love": Elisha was the loved companion who saw his master taken up, and so was filled with his spirit.

This arrangement further throws light upon the third line of that triplet,

For we also shall surely live —

which is perhaps the most difficult passage in Ecclesiasticus. The words are surely a small peg on which to hang a resurrection doctrine which appears nowhere else in our author. Nor is the passage made clear by trying to associate it with Messianic hopes: the words are too vague to hold such a meaning. But if we have here a prophetic hymn — a hymn perhaps emanating originally from the very schools of prophets which figure so prominently in the biblical story of Elijah and Elisha — then the words, "we also shall surely live," are a simple expression on the part of the singers of the sense of deliverance wrought by the heroic Elijah for the worshippers of Jehovah compelled under Jezebel to hide in caves and dens. In any case, what obscurity may attach to that line is of less consequence if it be a portion of an old hymn than if it contain the words of the son of Sirach himself.

Another difficult passage is found where this Praise of Famous Men reaches Ezekiel and the later worthies. Printed as continuous prose it would run as follows:

> It was Ezekiel who saw the vision of glory, which God shewed him upon the chariot of the cherubim. For verily he remembered the enemies in storm, and to do good to them that directed their ways aright. Also of the twelve prophets may the bones flourish again out of their place. And he comforted Jacob, and delivered them by confidence of hope. How shall we magnify Zerubbabel? And he was as a signet on the right hand: so was Jesus the son of Josedek: etc.

Every commentator finds the exegesis of this passage difficult. Fritzsche and others transpose sentences, so as to take the words "he comforted Jacob" with the reference to Ezekiel before the twelve prophets are mentioned. But this does not strip the passage of difficulties; and in particular the connective particles are unnatural. But without any alteration the passage may be made intelligible by distribution between the author's own words and his brief quotations from prophetic hymns.

It was Ezekiel who saw the vision of glory, which God shewed him upon the chariot of the cherubim —

For verily He remembered the enemies in storm,
And to do good to them that directed their ways aright —

Also of the twelve prophets may the bones flourish again out of their place —

And He comforted Jacob,
And delivered them by confidence of hope —

How shall we magnify Zerubbabel? —

And he was as a signet on the right hand —

so was Jesus the son of Josedek: etc.

The writer has been touching in his own words upon successive worthies, and supplementing his treatment by citations from familiar hymns. When he reaches Ezekiel and the minor prophets he is compelled to quicken his pace; his own remarks become single sentences, his quotations mere snatches. The lines written above as verses are intelligible as broken quotations from a hymn, and the 'he' of the first four lines refers to God. There is a close precedent for this supporting of hurried narrative by snatches of song in Psalm lxviii, verses 12–14 of which are now generally interpreted as fragments of battle songs.

It is evident that the plea for the recognition of quoted passages gains with the multiplication of the cases where such an explanation seems in point. It becomes stronger still when we recognise a family likeness in the passages put forward as citations. If the reader will read together the passages so suggested on pages 971 (the first three passages), 1001, 1003, 1004–5, 1006, he will be struck with their uniformity of style. All are composed in the same flow of alternate parallelism, such as would be consistent with their forming parts of one whole, or of a series of similar poems. And the general model is that found in Psalm cv, together with (what are modifications of that poem) Psalms lxxviii, cvi. The whole points to a literature of prophetic hymns: traditional rather than written, and thus admitting free modification such as might make the hundred and fifth psalm into the seventy-eighth or hundred and sixth, when the bright period of the first life in Canaan had given place to the solitude of Judah after Israel had been carried away, or even to the captivity of Judah itself. Such poems seem to start with the calling of a chosen people, with the appointment of priests and their feast days, with the succession of prophets and kings. All the extracts here dealt with would fit into the different parts of such a poem. One passage, indeed, seems separate from the others: that dealing with the heavenly bodies (xliii. 7). But it is noticeable that the creation of sun, moon, and stars is given a place at the commencement of the hundred and thirty-sixth psalm, which seems the primitive model of these national anthems, belonging by internal evidence to a history that is not carried further than the wilderness and conquests on the east of Jordan.

NOTES TO PARTICULAR BOOKS

Notes to Genesis

 Unless otherwise stated the references at the head of these Notes are to Chapters and Verses of Bible

See Introduction, page 1363; and General Note, page 1526, for metre of Traditional Poetry.

Book I of Old Testament History

i. 1. The most marked feature in this Story of the Creation is its extreme parallelism, the whole dividing into two symmetrical halves, of three days each, while every section of the one half is balanced by a corresponding section of the other.

And God said — [Creation of Light] And there was evening and there was morning, one day	And God said — [Creation of Lights] And there was evening and there was morning, a fourth day
And God said — [Creation of the Firmament dividing waters from waters] And there was evening and there was morning, a second day	And God said — [Creation of Life in the Firmament and in the Waters] And there was evening and there was morning, a fifth day
And God said — [Creation of Land] And God said — [Creation of Vegetation, Climax of inanimate Nature] And there was evening and there was morning, a third day	And God said — [Creation of Life on Land] And God said — [Creation of Man, Climax of animate Nature] And there was evening and there was morning, the sixth day

The act of creation is also associated with the Sabbath, a leading institution of the Chosen Nation.

ii 4 Whatever other reasons there may be for a double account of the Creation, this second account clearly connects itself from the very beginning with the Temptation in the Garden.

iv. 1. This separation of the righteous and the wicked is a first step towards the call of a Chosen Nation.

iv. 16. A brief historic notice of first beginnings in development, on the one hand of things secular (with weapons of war for a climax), and on the other hand of religion (the calling upon the LORD). — The 'Song of Lamech' or 'Song of the Sword' is a celebration of the power of deadly weapons. The 'vengeance on Cain' may be a proverbial expression: the new power for vengeance provided by weapons is beyond even that. If the marginal reading of R. V. to Matthew xviii. 22 be taken, the saying of Christ may be an allusion to this Song of the Sword.

v. 1. A Genealogy connecting Adam and Noah.

vi. 1. Development of wickedness in the world leading up to the Flood.

vi. 9. The recommencement of the world in the righteous Noah, and the new Covenant of the Rainbow. [The word 'covenant' was not used in the case of Adam, but the whole situation implies it.]

ix. 18. The breaking out again of separation between the righteous and the wicked, this time in nations, Canaan being the ancestor of the wicked nations. A clear stage towards the coming Call.

x. 1. A Genealogy of the nations of the world according to their descent from the sons of Noah, and their localisation.

xi. 1. Dispersion of the nations and confusion of speech: a stage towards the selection of a single nation.

xi. 10. A Genealogy linking Shem with Abram.

Book II of Old Testament History

xii. 1. Book II starts with the founder of the Chosen People: an individual separated by a mission to found a nation, with Canaan as a Promised Land. Throughout the rest of the book this nation is in the stage of a family.

xii. 10 and xiii. 1. Family incidents, affecting the wife and nephew. Special protection for the wife (so xx. 1), as the mother of the coming Seed.

xv. 1. Further narrowing of the Call (Ishmael, or illegitimate children, excluded), and renewal of the Covenant with two tokens: (1) change of names [Abram is lofty father: Abraham, father of a multitude of nations; Sarah is princess, the meaning of Sarai is unknown]; and (2) circumcision as an outward token. [Not an absolute mark, as Ishmael is circumcised. But the true seed Isaac is born from a circumcised father.]

xviii. 1. Different relation of Abraham and Lot to the judgment on the wicked cities of Canaan.

xix. 29. Origin of nations outside the Covenant with which the Chosen Nation was to be much mixed up — the Moabites and Ammonites, descended from Lot.

xxi. 1. Birth of the true heir, and complete exclusion of Ishmael.

xxi. 22. This, like many of the historic sections, seems to have for its purpose to explain local names in the Promised Land.

xxii. 1. The Offering of Isaac emphasises the devotion of the Chosen People.

xxii. 20. This Genealogy of the kindred of Abraham is of course to introduce Rebekah.

xxiii. 1. The negotiation for Sarah's Tomb is in reality a taking possession of the Promised Land, nomad peoples having no point of fixity except their sepulchres.

xxiv. 1. The wooing of Rebekah emphasises still further the separation of the Seed from the peoples of Canaan.

xxv. 21. This and subsequent sections dealing with the relations of Esau and Jacob constitute a still further narrowing of the Call: not only have the illegitimate descendants of Abraham been excluded, but now of the lawful sons of Isaac one loses his birthright and falls out of the succession. The name Jacob means 'supplanter' in the sense of one who 'takes by the heel,' — an allusion to the circumstances of the birth.

xxvi. 1. The story of Rebekah and Abimelech is in a different position from the similar stories of Sarah, because it is part of a lengthy section dealing with the relations between Isaac and the men of Gerar, the purpose of which is the obvious historic purpose of explaining local names.

xxvi. 34. This is a brief transition to what follows, as showing how Esau by intermarrying with the people of the land still further separates himself from the succession of the Chosen.

xxvii. 1. In this elaborate story we have the formal exclusion of Esau.

xxvii. 41. Not only is this a crisis in the personal history of Jacob, to whom the succession has now passed, but it further emphasises the separation in marriage of the Seed from the peoples of Canaan.

xxix. 1. Besides carrying on the history, this story explains the names of sons of Jacob, ancestors of the tribes. — And Laban called it Jegar-sahadutha: but Jacob called it Galeed. The former is Aramaic and the latter Hebrew for the same meaning, — 'the heap of witness.'

xxxii. 3. This is a crisis in the history of Jacob, connected with the change of the name to 'Israel.' Taking the first and third paragraphs together we may say that it amounts to a renewal of the Covenant to this the third ancestor.

xxxiv. 1. This history is introduced for its important bearing on the antagonism between the Chosen People and the peoples of Canaan.

xxxv. 1. This section has a purpose connected with local names. Allon-bacuth signifies 'oak of weeping.'

xxxv. 9. A still more formal renewing of the Covenant with Jacob.

xxxv. 16. Family incidents: birth of Benjamin and disgrace of Reuben. — Ben-oni is 'son of my sorrow'; Ben-jamin, 'son of my right hand.'

xxxvii. 1. This is the fully developed Epic of Joseph and his Brethren, interrupted, and continued. Besides its intrinsic interest, it has proportionate historic importance as connecting the Chosen Nation with Egypt. Note the renewal of the Covenant to Jacob on his way down to Egypt, and the indication in this vision of the place of Egypt in the history of the Chosen (xlvi. 1–4).

xxxviii. 1. The history here introduced has double importance (1) as giving the origin of a leading family of Judah (compare Ruth, chapter iv. 12, 18; I Chronicles xxvii. 3; Nehemiah xi. 4–6); and (2) as giving antiquity to the custom of the husband's brother raising seed to the widow. Its introduction at this point (interrupting the story of Joseph) is obviously explained by the words at that time.

xlvii. 13. Joseph's administration of Egypt: the chosen family for once in its history connected with the world empire.

xlvii. 28. This makes a natural conclusion to Book II, the Blessing of Jacob, which must be regarded as a form of Prophecy, foreshadowing the future of the Tribes of Israel; in particular, recognising Manasseh and Ephraim as heads of tribes, and also the priority of Ephraim over Manasseh. For the metre, etc., of the Blessing, see above, page 1527.

Notes to Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers

These three books of the Bible make the section of history here entitled The Exodus. See Introduction, page 1364.

Book III of Old Testament History

Exodus i. 6. This brief section is important as conveying the change of the Israelites from a family to a nation.

Exodus i. 8. The elaborateness of this epic story emphasises how the exodus from Egypt was the real birth of Israel as a nation; and also how the sign of such new birth was the revelation of God by the new name of JEHOVAH. As a literary study, it is very suggestive to read side by side the accounts of the Plagues in Exodus, and the elaborate pictures of the same in The Wisdom of Solomon. Compare pages 1033–6.

Exodus xii. 1. This is to be separated from the narrative as the Constitution of the Passover for all time. Compare its full provision for the future with the brief mention of the future below, where the narrative describes Moses acting on this Divine ordinance.

Exodus xii. 40. This joint ordinance brings together the institution of the Passover and the law of the Firstborn, both being here and elsewhere connected with the night of the deliverance from Egypt.

Exodus xv. 1. Metre of the Song of Moses and Miriam. The characteristics of Antique Metre are stated above, page 1526. This song has an elaborate stanza structure. The words I have presented as a footnote, taken in connection with the introductory words, indicate the mode of performance: the body of the song would be performed by Moses and the Men, the refrain between the stanzas by Miriam and the Women. [Compare Deborah's Song (page 223), in which the structure requires a Chorus of Men and a Chorus of Women alternating.] In this song the structure suggests a prelude and three stanzas, each opening with an apostrophe to God. By a recognised lyric device, the stanzas augment, both in the number of their lines, and in the fulness with which the incident is treated.

Exodus xv. 22. A simple historic section bringing out the leading incidents on the march from Egypt to Sinai; they are associated with the miraculous provision of manna and water, the institution of subordinate judges, and the contest at Rephidim, which was the foundation of the lasting feud between Israel and Amalek.

Exodus xix. 3. The biblical word 'law' is wider than its modern usage. A 'law' will comprehend historical circumstances of its institution, and in Deuteronomy may express an oration in recommendation of God's laws and their observance. (See below, page 1548.)

The 'Ten Commandments' from Sinai, as given here and in Deuteronomy, are found to differ substantially, although in each case they are introduced as the words of God. The explanation is that the actual Divine command, delivered supernaturally on this occasion, is to be understood as merged in general recommendatory matter, the result of Moses' whole intercourse with God. Hence only the portions here printed in small capitals are to be understood as the actual 'Ten Commandments.' Compare Deuteronomy, chapter v.

Exodus xx. 22. With this 'Book of the Covenant' compare others: Exodus xxxii. 1, Leviticus xvii. 1, and Deuteronomy xii. 1. The essence of each is a summary of Divine ordinances: hence they may be differently stated in each. Besides, there may be narration of the circumstances attending the institution of the Covenant, statement of the relation between God and his people, ceremonial recognition of the covenantal relation, elaborate promises and warnings.

Exodus xxiv. 12 and xxxv. 1. The first of these is a specification of the Tabernacle and its service; the second gives in specific detail the carrying out of the first. — And he gave unto Moses, when he had made an end of communing with him upon mount Sinai . . . tables of stone written with the finger of God. It might seem as if these words ought to commence the next section, H. But Section G has begun with a summons to Moses to come up to the mount to receive these tables of stone: the interview so commenced is made the occasion of the specification of the tabernacle.

Exodus xxxii. 1. See above, xx. 22. A second Covenant is not to be understood as abrogating what has gone before, but is a different statement of the relations between God and his people, things appearing in different proportions as adapted to a different conjunction of circumstances.

Exodus xxxiv. 27 is understood by many to imply that this Covenant, like the preceding, contains 'ten words,' or Commandments. I reprint the latter part here, so as to intimate what may probably be understood as the ten distinct 'words': here as in the text of the Ten Commandments from Sinai, the actual command will be found merged in recommendatory matter. (Capital type distinguishes the Commandments. Compare above, page 72.)

> 1. Take heed to thyself, lest thou make a covenant with the inhabitants of the land whither thou goest, lest it be for a snare in the midst of thee: but ye shall break down their altars, and dash in pieces their pillars, and ye shall cut down their Asherim: for THOU SHALT WORSHIP NO OTHER GOD: for the LORD whose name is Jealous, is a jealous God: lest thou make a covenant with the inhabitants of the land, and they go a whoring after their gods, and do sacrifice unto their gods, and one call thee and thou eat of his sacrifice; and thou take of their daughters unto thy sons, and their daughters go a whoring after their gods, and make thy sons go a whoring after their gods. 2. THOU SHALT MAKE THEE NO MOLTEN GODS. 3. THE FEAST OF UNLEAVENED BREAD SHALT THOU KEEP. Seven days thou shalt eat unleavened bread, as I commanded thee, at the time appointed in the month Abib: for in the month Abib thou camest out from Egypt. 4. ALL THAT

OPENETH THE WOMB IS MINE: and all thy cattle that is male, the firstlings of ox and sheep. And the firstling of an ass thou shalt redeem with a lamb: and if thou wilt not redeem it, then thou shalt break its neck. All the firstborn of thy sons thou shalt redeem. And none shall appear before me empty. 5. SIX DAYS THOU SHALT WORK, BUT ON THE SEVENTH DAY THOU SHALT REST. 6. IN PLOUGHING TIME AND IN HARVEST THOU SHALT REST And thou shalt observe the feast of weeks, even of the firstfruits of wheat harvest, and the feast of ingathering at the year's end. 7. THREE TIMES A YEAR SHALL ALL THY MALES APPEAR BEFORE THE LORD GOD, THE GOD OF ISRAEL. For I will cast out nations before thee, and enlarge thy borders: neither shall any man desire thy land, when thou goest up to appear before the LORD thy God three times in the year. 8. THOU SHALT NOT OFFER THE BLOOD OF MY SACRIFICE WITH LEAVENED BREAD: neither shall the sacrifice of the feast of the passover be left unto the morning. 9. THE FIRST OF THE FIRSTFRUITS OF THY GROUND THOU SHALT BRING UNTO THE HOUSE OF THE LORD THY GOD. 10. THOU SHALT NOT SEETHE A KID IN ITS MOTHER'S MILK.

Leviticus i. 1. I entitle this 'Law and Ritual': the earlier part makes prominent the actual oblations, the latter part gives more specific directions to the priests as to details in the mode of offering.

Leviticus viii. 1. This is a case where the word 'law' includes an historic incident associated with its institution or early execution. Compare Appendix E above, or Appendix D of Book IV.

Leviticus xvi. 16. In the institution of the Scapegoat the words he shall make atonement for the holy place, because of the uncleannesses of the children of Israel, show that this is to be taken as a part of the general Law of Purification.

Leviticus xvii. 1. For this important 'Covenant of Holiness' compare other Covenants [Exodus xx. 22, Exodus xxxii. 1, Deuteronomy xii. 1]. The conception of Holiness seems to include separation from the sins or evil customs of the surrounding peoples; separation by national signs, such as the Sabbath and the Jubile; separateness in the way of laws and legal customs; holiness as opposed to uncleanness in the offerings of the Lord. The section is further unified by characteristic expressions, such as "I am the LORD." The first four paragraphs (chapter xvii of Leviticus) are by some separated from this section. But their connection consists in their providing as to the proper place of sacrifice; and it is noticeable that both the Covenant in section F above, and that in Deuteronomy, commence with provisions as to the rightful place of sacrifice.

Numbers v. 1. Sundry laws: the law of the Leper, of Restitution, of the Jealous Husband, of the Nazirite, and of the Priestly Blessing.

Numbers ix. 1. The supplementary, sometimes called the Little Passover.

Book IV of Old Testament History

Numbers ix. 15. In preparation for the Start from Sinai, which makes the natural place for beginning Book IV, are given the general ordinances and arrangements for the march.

Numbers xiii. 1. This incident of the Spies is the turning point in the Israelitish migration; it is the foundation for the thirty-eight years' wandering in the wilderness, and the provision of a new generation to enter the Land of Promise.

Numbers xvi. 1. Though the section is full of historic difficulties, yet the general tenor of this documentary section seems to connect the laws as to the position of priests and Levites with the incidents of rebellion here narrated.

Numbers xx. 1. Another turning point: the incident of Meribah appears as the foundation for the deposition of Moses.

Numbers xxi. 1. This brief section has an importance as connected with the 'devoting' of the conquered Canaanitish nations. The word Hormah means 'devoted.'

Numbers xxi. 14, 17, 26 etc. I have represented certain portions of these sections as footnotes, because of their unlikeness to the rest of the narrative. It must be understood that such arrangement is not meant to suggest any doubt as to the authenticity of passages so treated; it is solely a question of the different page-setting of ancient and modern books.

Numbers xxii. 2. For this epic incident of Balaam see the Introduction, page 1366. It will be observed that the paragraph containing the incident of the Ass (verses 21–35) is ignored in the rest of the story; verse 36 following naturally after verse 20. This suggests interpolation.

Numbers xxv. 1. This section has a double importance, as laying the foundation of the greatness of one of the priestly houses (compare the prominence of Phinehas in the son in Sirach's list of the Worthies of Israel in Ecclesiasticus xlv. 23); and also as the origin of the lasting feud with Midian.

Numbers xxxi. 1. It is somewhat difficult to determine whether this is not to be reckoned as a section of the historic narrative; but on the whole it appears that the narrative is introduced as the foundation of what was a general law.

Notes to Deuteronomy

See Introduction, page 1366; and General Note on Footnotes, page 1532.

Title: Deuteronomy

The title 'Deuteronomy' is a curious one. It is a Greek expression meaning 'second law' or 'repeated law.' In this sense it is used in the Septuagint (chapter xvii. 18), where the R. V. reads:

> [The king] shall write him a copy of this law in a book, out of that which is before the priests the Levites.

But the Greek of the Septuagint means 'this repetition of the law' [deuteronomion], not copy of this law: and on this mistranslation the traditional title of the book has been founded.

Title Page

Verses 1, 2, of chapter i seem to constitute (in modern phrase) a 'title page' of the whole book. Compare Proverbs, Isaiah, etc. The district so exactly located is the scene of all that comes within the book; the local indication in the title to the fourth oration is general, and does not conflict with the title of the whole in these verses. There is a title page with a similar amount of exactness to the Book of Tobit.

Oration I

Preface. The point of this brief preface is to define the exact date of the first oration, and so approximately of those which follow, just as the title page to the whole book has exactly defined the place in which these speeches were delivered. When it is recollected that unity is given to Deuteronomy as a literary whole by the idea of its being a Farewell to Israel, then it will seem only natural to find prefatory matter bringing the scene to the final halting-place of Moses with the people, and the final month of the hero's life.

To declare this law, saying . . . It may be worth while to remind the reader that the word law has a wider sense in biblical than in modern English. Besides what is of the nature of ordinance and commandment it will include histories connected with these (the Law and the Prophets); more than this, the 'law of the Lord' extends to all revealed literature (Psalm i. 2, etc.). So in the present work, the phrase this law in this preface introduces, not actual law, but an oration on the subject of law; and the phrase later on (preface to Oration III) seems to signify the Ceremonial of the Blessing and the Curse (see note).

Title of the Oration. It is easy to infer from the clear argument of this first speech the title: MOSES' ANNOUNCEMENT OF HIS DEPOSITION. The historic survey leads up to this point of God's refusal, repeated after Moses' intercession, to allow Moses to lead the people into the land of promise; and the exhortation which makes the rest of the speech takes its rise from the same consideration, — that the commandments of Moses can now be neither added to nor diminished, it remains to keep them.

Argument of the Oration. 1. Historic survey of the authority wielded by Moses: its supremacy revealed in appointment of subordinates — rebellion against it at Kadesh-barnea led to the thirty-eight years' wandering in the wilderness until the rebellious generation was consumed, Moses himself being involved in the Divine wrath — these years spent in peace in the neighbourhood of nations the Israelites were not permitted to touch — then a new era appears in which panic goes before their steps, Moses still ordaining what people to spare and what to exterminate, and dividing the conquered lands — Moses' personal hopes rise with this change of fortune: but God denies his prayer, and finally confirms his deposition. 2. Exhortation. By this deposition Moses' work of lawgiver stands as a complete whole: it remains to obey — they must remember the original giving of the law on Horeb, voice without form: so they must make no form — nor worship the hosts of heaven, which God has divided among all nations, but Israel is a people of inheritance kept by God for himself — he will be jealous for his inheritance (Moses himself has experienced this Divine jealousy) — yet over judgment mercy preponderates (which last makes the peroration of the speech).

[Here may be noted the distinction of this from the following oration: in this first it is general authority of Moses that is treated, and a general view of the law; in the second, Moses' special prerogative as an interpreter of God's statutes is made prominent, and these statutes, as a whole and in detail, follow.]

i. 37. Also the LORD was angry with me for your sakes. These words, or an allusion to the circumstance in other words, occur five times (in the Bible numbering: i. 37, iii. 26, iv. 21, xxxi. 14, xxxii. 51). The last explains more fully the incident on which they are founded (with which compare Numbers, chapter xx. 10). They form a most important thread of connection through the different parts of the book (see Introduction, page 1371).

The footnotes on pages 160–2. It is obvious that the passages printed as footnotes to this oration are not intended as part of the speech. They are notes, chiefly on the aboriginal settlement of the regions mentioned in the speech by races of giants. Compare Genesis, chapter xiv. 5.

iv. 41. Then Moses separated three cities, etc. This is an editorial conclusion to the first oration. The historic survey in that oration has been carried to the complete establishment of a portion of Israel on the east of Jordan: the note adds a detail of this omitted in the speech — the final act of appointing cities of refuge in the east Jordanic district. It also may serve as a time link between Orations I and II, if it be understood to imply that the appointment of these cities was made between the delivery of the first and the second oration. The then favours this view.

Oration II

Preface. The second oration is a natural sequel of the first, dealing elaborately and in detail with what the first oration opened in general terms. The first oration had presented the law of Moses as now brought to completeness, and made appeal for obedience to this law. The second oration announces that " this is the law " of which the former speech had spoken.

Title. I have varied widely from the usual interpretation of Deuteronomy in giving to this second oration the title: THE DELIVERY OF THE COVENANT TO THE LEVITES AND ELDERS. I must premise that I am making two orations (II and III) of what is usually considered a single discourse (see on Preface to Oration III). But the two are closely connected in time, and may be understood as delivered on the same day (though this day has not necessarily a literal significance in Deuteronomy: compare chapter ix. 1), in any case, the close of Oration II makes provision for the ceremony which leads to Oration III. There is no doubt about the occasion of what I am calling the third oration; but what, according to my arrangement, is the exact point of Oration II?

I take my idea of its title from the following passage in chapter xxxi. 24.

> And it came to pass, when Moses had made an end of writing the words of this law in a book, until they were finished, that Moses commanded the Levites, which bare the ark of the covenant of the LORD, saying, Take this book of the law, and put it by the side of the ark of the covenant of the LORD your God, that it may be there for a witness against thee. For I know thy rebellion and thy stiff neck; behold, while I am yet alive with you this day, ye have been rebellious against the LORD; and how much more after my death? Assemble unto me all the elders of your tribes, and your officers, that I may speak these words in their ears, and call heaven and earth to witness against them.

The association of this passage with the occasion of Oration II just gives the purport for the speech which is required. The first speech, by announcing Moses' deposition, implied the end of that state of things under which the leader had proclaimed each ordinance as it came to him. They henceforth make a whole: a written 'Book of the Covenant,' which is recited or read at the conclusion of Oration II. Passing out of Moses' hands, the law must be given into the custody of the Levites and elders; the passage cited above describes the confiding of the written volume to the Levites to be placed by the ark, and the summoning of the elders and officers that Moses may speak these words in their ears. It is true that the second oration is, in its preface, described as delivered to 'all Israel.' But this gives just the combination suggested by my title to Oration II: Moses addresses the law to the Levites and elders in the presence of the whole people. In this way it is easier to understand the words, "call heaven and earth to witness against them," as following the mention of Levites, elders and officers.

The only difficulty is that the extract cited above appears, not in connection with the second oration, but in the preface to the Song of Moses. But the reference of the paragraph cannot be to the Song, for the means of preserving and handing this down have occupied the preceding paragraph. It is clearly the Book of the Covenant which is to be laid by the ark. Nor can the position of this paragraph in the preface to the Song imply that what this paragraph describes took place at that time; because part of the incident is the calling an assembly "that I may call heaven and earth to witness against them," — words that fit in with the Book of the Covenant and its sequel ceremonies, but not with Moses' Song. The suggestion is that the paragraph describes what took place earlier, but, for some reason, is mentioned later. And the reason is not difficult to discover. This preface begins by describing the arrangements for the oral transmission of the Song, and it proceeds to tell how analogous steps had been taken for the custody and reading of the written law.

No doubt the matter is not free from difficulty, but there seems foundation enough for connecting this second oration with an assembly in which Moses, in the presence of the whole people, is delivering his Book of the Covenant into the charge of the Levites and elders.

Argument of Oration II. This is not so much a logical order of thought as a (faintly marked) pendulum swing between future and past. — Introduction: The Law from Sinai, delivered by actual voice of God, so terrified the people that they begged that Moses should stand as interpreter between God and themselves: the statutes so interpreted are now gathered into one whole. — Moses commences with the Name of Jehovah, the whole-hearted love for Jehovah, His law to be ever present with the people — [future] the enjoyment of the promised land shall not lead them to tempt God, but their children's inquiries shall be answered with the story of the deliverance from Egypt [past] — [future] when the nations are being conquered they shall not make alliances with them (for they are a peculiar people to Jehovah) but shall make all that pertains to idolatry a devoted thing — [past] the memory of the way God has led them shall teach them that their wealth is not of their making, but God has given them power to get wealth — [future] when the nations perish before their arms they shall not think that for their righteousness the enemy is overthrown, but [past] shall remember all their stiffnecked rebellions: yet what has God required of them but love and obedience? — [future] the land into which they are to enter is not, like Egypt, a land depending upon human labour for fertility, but directly upon God's rain from heaven: disobedience will thus mean loss of the increase of the land, until they perish from it — so the oration returns to its starting-point: the law to be ever present with them. For conclusion, mention is made of the ceremonial of the Blessing and the Curse (which is the subject of the next oration): but first the Book of the Covenant is recited at length.

v. 6–21. The variations in the Law from Sinai, as it appears here and in Exodus, are most simply explained by understanding that the brief words of command, here printed in capitals, are all that is to be considered as actual words of God: the rest is the comment of Moses. These variations include entirely different reasons assigned in the two accounts for the observance of the Sabbath.

vii. 20. The LORD thy God will send the hornet among them. This is in the Wisdom of Solomon (xii. 3–22) enlarged upon as a form of mercy to the enemies of God (compare above, page 1029).

x. 6: footnote to page 169. These sentences are recognised as one of the greatest difficulties in the whole book. Quite apart from the historical questions they raise, they seem entirely disconnected from their context. Three different kinds of explanation have been offered. 1. That they are out of their place, or else a gloss. This cannot be entertained here, as this series accepts the text of the R. V. 2. A spiritual explanation, founded on the meaning of the names of places. [Thus Mr. Waller, in Bishop Ellicott's Commentary for Schools: "From certain 'wells of water'—the wells of the children of Jaakan (crookedness) — the people of God take their journey to the scene of the high priest's death. From thence to Hor-hagidgad or Gudgodah, the mount of the 'troop,' or 'band' (Sinai is the mount of the 'congregation' in the Old Testament, Zion in the New), and thence to a land of rivers of water. It is only another way of relating how from the wells of the Law we pass to the rivers of living water opened by the Gospel. But we must pass by way of the cross of Christ." There are rabbinical interpretations of the same kind, with different meanings.] Such methods of interpretation belong to hermeneutics, which take in secondary and mystic senses. But they have no place in literary interpretation, which seeks the primary or natural sense, if for no other reason, because the passage so understood would stand alone in the book, all the rest of it admitting a natural meaning (whatever additional and mystic senses may be added to it). 3. The third alternative, which I have adopted, is to understand the words as a 'footnote,' commenting upon the word ark in the text, here mentioned for the first time in this book. The note concerns itself with the point in the journeyings where the Levites were first separated as custodians of this ark, in which the Law of Sinai had been placed. Even as a footnote the words are far from seeming natural. But this explanation has the advantage of being supported by five other places in which similar footnotes occur (chapters ii. 10–12; 20–23; iii. 9, 11, 14, of the Bible numbering). A further confirmation is the change in these verses from the first to the third person. The objection that the words the LORD thy God are inappropriate in a footnote may be met by supposing the last part of the note to be a (free) quotation from the Book of the Covenant (compare chapter xviii. 1, 2).

The Book of the Covenant

Chapters xii to xxvi (inclusive) evidently contain the 'Book of the Covenant,' the central point of Deuteronomy, that which all the rest is to enforce. [The full phrase (Exodus, chapter xxiv. 7) does not occur in Deuteronomy; but the separate words 'book' and 'covenant' are found repeatedly.] Like the similar books of the covenant elsewhere in Bible history, it does not consist of laws only, but these are formally introduced, and the whole is concluded with exhortation and promise. The style of this Book of the Covenant is popular and spiritual, rather than technical. Compare pages 72, 83, 106.

Oration III

Preface. Between the Book of the Covenant and the third oration is found a succession of paragraphs which needs careful study.

1. An ordinance enjoining the Ceremony of the Blessing and the Curse as an institution to be observed on the other side of Jordan. [The words Thou shalt write upon (the stones) all the words of this law mean that the Curses and the Blessings are to be so written. This is appropriate and practicable; whereas the Book of the Covenant would be far too long for writing upon an altar. Compare, moreover, the phraseology used in the Book of Joshua where the fulfilment of this ordinance is narrated (chapter viii. 32, 34): And he wrote there upon the stones a copy of the law of Moses . . . and afterward he read all the words of the law, the blessing and the curse, according to all that is written in the book of the law.]

2. A paragraph which seems to describe the commencement of a ceremonial: And Moses and the priests the Levites spake unto all Israel, saying, Keep silence, and hearken, O Israel; this day thou art become the people of the LORD thy God, etc.

3. A paragraph that apparently describes Moses arranging a ceremonial, though a ceremonial connected with the other side of Jordan: And Moses charged the people the same day, saying, These shall stand upon mount Gerizim . . . And the Levites shall answer, etc.

4. A Series of Curses in full ritual form, with the Amen of the people [but no similar ritual of Blessings].

5. Blessings, not in ritual form, but in oratorical language [the first and second persons used, not the third person; flowing sentences, etc.].

6. In similar oratorical form, and at great length, a series of Curses.

It appears to me impossible to explain this succession of paragraphs except by understanding a REHEARSAL OF THE CEREMONY OF THE BLESSING AND THE CURSE. Ground similar to the valley between Ebal and Gerizim is chosen, Moses arranges the Ceremonial (as he afterwards teaches the Song), and it proceeds in ritual form as far as the close of the Curses. Then (as it is only a rehearsal) Moses interrupts it, takes the matter in his own hands, and himself, in the language of oratory, deals with the Blessings, and subsequently with the Curses. This constitutes the third oration.

Argument. There is no logical argument, for it is all peroration. The matter of the Blessings constitutes a single paragraph. The matter of the Curses makes three lengthy paragraphs: the first painting in general terms the threatened woes — the second enforcing the thought: All these shall come because they have not hearkened unto the voice of the LORD, and foreshadowing the mystic 'enemy' — the third starts with the 'glorious and fearful Name': and carries forward the ruin to a climax by which the original deliverance from Egypt is reversed in a voluntary slavery.

Oration IV

Preface and Title. The brief preface does not imply any locality different from the locality of the rest of the book. It speaks of a second 'covenant' between the LORD and Israel, beside the covenant which he made with them in Horeb. These last words relate to the covenant which began with the giving of the Law from Sinai, was continued in the separate statutes 'interpreted' to the people by Moses, and brought into a complete whole in the 'Book of the Covenant,' with which the two previous speeches have associated themselves. A 'covenant' with God is to be understood, not as a specific act (like the signing of a bond) to be performed once for all, but as a ceremonial (like the coronation of a monarch) recognising what is already in existence. Thus a covenant ceremony is designed for repetition, and there is nothing to create difficulty in finding a second covenant celebrated in the same place, and at but a short interval of time after the other.

But in such repeated ceremonials the matter of the covenant may vary, as occasion may suggest. Is there anything in the occasion, or in the matter of this fourth oration, to make any material difference in the ceremonial so celebrated? Two differences are noticeable. 1. In the occasion: it is the final appeal of Moses, and at the close he retires from the leadership, and installs Joshua in his place. 2. There is a notable addition to the matter of Moses' address, as compared with that of previous addresses. Hitherto he has treated the people as a whole: now for the first time the idea of personal or tribal, as distinguished from national righteousness, comes in. It might seem desirable to convey this by the title: but as the oration is almost given a title by the biblical introduction of it, I have thought it best to keep to this: THE COVENANT IN THE LAND OF MOAB.

Argument. After a brief historic review the speaker seems to survey the different classes of people standing before him, the survey including those who will be found in future scenes of the same kind: he thus at once reaches his main theme. If (1) any man or woman, or (2) family or tribe, shall be nourishing evil in their hearts, and thinking to escape in the general righteousness: that man or woman shall be separated unto evil out of all the tribes of Israel, the land of that family or tribe shall be as Sodom. — Then there is a promise of mercy upon repentance as in previous addresses — then a final appeal and the personal farewell.

xxix. 19. To destroy the moist with the dry. This is of course a proverbial expression: compare the green tree and the dry in Ezekiel, chapter xx. 47, and Luke xxiii. 31. The general sense of the passage is clear: the individual evil-doer has no fear of so infecting the rest of the nation with his evil as to draw down the curse (compare the echo of the passage in Hebrews, chapter xii. 15). The construction of the English sentence is peculiar: a negative seems wanted before the words to destroy, etc. I presume a negative is involved in the expression bless himself, which is equivalent to 'except himself from the curse': so that the whole is, 'he shall except himself from the fear of destroying the moist with the dry.'

xxix. 29. The secret things belong unto the LORD our God: but the things that are revealed belong unto us and to our children for ever, that we may do all the words of this law. The context makes the meaning: the secret things (of the sin) are for God to discover, but the judgment when revealed is before us for ever as a warning.

xxxi. 9–13. And Moses wrote this law and delivered it, etc. This passage must be distinguished from the somewhat similar passage in the preface to the Song (chapter xxxi. 24–9). The first is an editorial note to Oration IV, with respect to its being read to the people on subsequent occasions. The word 'law' covers 'legal exhortation,' and the further words, Assemble the people, the men and the women and the little ones, and thy stranger that is within thy gates, connect themselves with the commencement of this oration. On the other hand, the later passage (as already pointed out above, page 1549) relates to the delivery of the (other) Book of the Covenant to the Levites and elders before the ceremony extending through Orations II and III: the Levites to have the custody of the book, and the elders to receive Moses' charge in public as representatives of the people.

The Song of Moses

Preface. The preface consists of three parts: 1. The circumstances under which Moses received the command to compose and teach this Song; and how he composed and taught it. 2. The similar means used to ensure the preservation of the Book of the Covenant, and the teaching it (through the elders) to the people. 3. Resuming 1, the preface describes the reciting of the Song before the people.

Metre. The Song of Moses and the Last Words of Moses are in what may be called 'Antique Metre.' The law of this is very simple. A unit or 'strain' of this metre is a single couplet of alternate parallelism, of which either line may be strengthened by an additional line, but not both. (See above, page 1526.)

Argument of the Song. The line of thought seems to be a pendulum movement, swaying between descriptions of God and Israel. After a prelude the keynote of the Song is struck in the word Rock as applied to the righteous Jehovah in contradistinction to the perverse people. Then a long succession of verses depicts the tenderness and bounty of God to his people of inheritance — a turning-point is found where Jeshurun waxes fat and kicks — the next division of the ode is filled with the judgments of the unswerving God — for the next section the poet is reflecting on the blindness of Israel, and the loathly gods which they have preferred to their own Rock — by a sudden turn the Divine Voice is heard meditating on the vengeance he has yet in store for the oppressors of his people — when this has reached a climax a brief conclusion calls upon the nations to rejoice in the rescue of the people of God.

Title of Song. The Rock: the prominence of this metaphor is interesting in a song adapted to a nation in the wilderness. — He set the bounds of the peoples according to the number of the children of Israel. The reference is to a Jewish tradition that the number of nations after the Babel dispersion was seventy, and the number of families of Israel going down to Egypt, seventy also. This is, as a poetic expression, made an example of God's delight in his own: their very numbers he uses in the numbering of the nations. — Jeshurun. Used here, and in the Last Words of Moses, and again in Isaiah, chapter xliv. 2. It is (if the expression may be allowed) a 'pet name' for God's people. It is a word signifying 'righteous' with an intensive termination.

Editorial Conclusion. This is simply a continuation of the preface: the enforcement of the remembering and acting on the Song. There is a similar preface and editorial conclusion to the next section.

The Last Words of Moses

Preface. This simply describes the command to ascend mount Nebo, and announces the final blessing of Moses.

Metre. See above, Metre of the Song of Moses.

Structure of the Poem. The structure seems to be the General Blessing of Moses, as announced by the preface, with a traditional document inserted in the middle of this, containing the blessings on particular tribes. This is what might be expected from the ceremonial implied. Moses is taking his journey to mount Nebo, never to be seen again; the elders and representatives of the tribes line the route, to bid farewell in the name of the people. The first section is spoken when Moses first appears, and it addresses the people as a whole. The last portion comes when he has traversed the whole line of tribal representatives, and turns to survey the whole people for the last time. The portions between would be spoken separately to separate tribes, then would become collected into a traditional Blessing on the tribes, like that of Jacob. The editor responsible for this concluding part of Deuteronomy inserts this document as a whole in its proper place. That this is the correct interpretation of the structure of the poem is suggested by two considerations. 1. The fresh heading or title, coming after nine lines of song, the whole having been regularly introduced by a preface. 2. The continuity of thought between the opening lines and the resumption after the particular blessings: Who rideth upon the heavens is a natural sequel to the appearance in heaven of Israel's God at the commencement.

xxxiii. 2. The LORD came from Sinai, etc. Compare the similar openings to Deborah's Song (Judges, chapter v. 4), and the Ode of Habakkuk. The sense of these opening lines is difficult; but the general idea seems to be an expansion of the 'voice out of the fire' which has been prominent in the first and second orations. This fire is symbolic of the law which would consume its transgressors. — He loveth the tribes; all their holy ones are in thy hand. Compare notes to Job, below, page 1661. It appears as if here the provinces entrusted to the holy ones were tribes, rather than nations.

Editorial Conclusion. A brief account of the passing away of Moses, and the mourning for him.

Notes to Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Ruth

The biblical Joshua, Judges, I Samuel (including first chapter of II Samuel), and Ruth make up what in the present arrangement is styled "The Judges." See Introduction, page 1373.

Joshua: or Book V of Old Testament History

i. 1. This section gives us the formal assumption of the leadership by Joshua. — Prepare you victuals: this of course refers to the cessation of the manna which would take place as soon as the Israelites had crossed from the wilderness into Canaan.

v. 1. Part of the purpose of this section is to connect events with local names in Canaan. Gibeath-ha-araloth is 'the hill of foreskins'; and Gilgal is connected with the 'rolling' away of reproach. This purpose has been pointed out in several sections of previous books.

vii. 1. Took of the devoted thing: for this idea compare the provision in the Deuteronomic covenant (chapter xiii. 17) and the vow of Israel at Hormah (Numbers xxi. 3).

Page 205: footnote. This portion of the Bible History does not, like the Books of Kings, make regular reference to authorities or other literature; hence such references as this, or the similar cases in Numbers (see above, page 140) are best put in the form of footnotes.

x. 28–xi. The first section summarises the conquests in the south, the next (xi. 1) those in the north, the next (from xi. 16) takes a general survey.

Judges: or Book VI of Old Testament History

i. 1–ii. 5 and ii. 6–iii. 6. Two important sections introductory to the Book of Judges. The first is negative, showing the failure of the people in zeal against the nations of Canaan The second speaks of positive transgressions against the LORD. Both unite in the common result, that the nations are left by God as a trial to the Israelites. The second section further describes the Judges as temporary saviours raised up by God. Note in the first that at this point the tribe of Judah has a sort of leadership.

iv. 1. The hegemony has here passed to the tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali, and the enemy is in the northern part of Canaan.

v. 1. Deborah's Song. This important ode, foundation of so much of the future poetry of Israel, is in 'Antique Metre' (see above, page 1526). It has further an elaborate antiphonal structure, which can be caught at once from the arrangement in the text. The opening words suggest an antiphony between Deborah leading a chorus of Women, and Barak leading a chorus of Men (compare the Song of Moses and Miriam, Exodus, chapter xv). This arrangement is confirmed by the details of the poem, which as given in the text often show special fitness to the respective performers. Antiphonal structure is closely allied to antistrophic structure, but is not identical with it, because the strophes may not be equal. In the present case the latter part of the poem is strictly antistrophic, and is so marked in the text; the earlier part may be so described if allowance be made for the passages assigned to the Men and Women singing together, which passages are analogous to the epodes or mesodes in antistrophic poetry.

vi–xii. 6. Throughout the events of these sections the tribe of Ephraim seems to claim an hegemony; the leaders in these episodes do not come from that tribe, but the Ephraimites make it a grievance that they have not been summoned as a matter of course. Gideon succeeds in soothing their offended pride, but in the case of Jephthah a civil war ensues. The importance of these sections as bringing to a focus the floating idea of kingship, which is the link binding together all this portion of the sacred history, has been pointed out in the Introduction, pages 1374–5.

xiii. 2–xvi. The stories of Samson make a continuous 'cycle'; compare the Elisha Cycle in the Books of Kings. The Danites now seem in the forefront, as also in the next section (xvii–xviii); but Samson appears as the representative of the Nazirites even more than the representative of his own tribe.

xvii. 1. Besides being representative of the tribal history of Dan, this section has a place in the book as illustrating the general state of lawlessness, when there was no king and every man did that which was right in his own eyes.

xix–xxi. In this final episode of Book VI, we see an approach towards national unity, in the fact that, though it is a case of civil war, yet all Israel is united against a single tribe. In the civil wars of Abimelech, and of Jephthah with the Men of Ephraim, the disturbance was much more confined in its area.

xx. 36 or Page 243: footnote. The sentence So the children of Benjamin saw that they were smitten is evidently continued in the words but six hundred men turned and fled. What comes between is a comment on saw that they were smitten, explaining this by repeating what has been already related.

Notes to the Book of Ruth

For the book as a whole, see Introduction, page 1375.

i. 16. Intreat me not to leave thee, etc. It will be readily understood that where a language founds its verse system upon parallelism of thought and phrase the line between prose and verse may be often difficult to draw. In a prose narrative impassioned thought will easily rise into the parallelism of verse. There are three passages of Ruth which raise the question whether they should be presented in the one form or the other. The musical entreaty of Ruth seems certainly verse; it has caught the ears of readers of many generations, and come down as a formula of faithful attachment. The other passages are more doubtful. One is a Marriage Blessing:

The Lord make the woman that is come into thine house, etc.

This might be expected to be verse; and it will just go into the loose form of Antique Metre but several lines are very prosaic. The next is the felicitation on the babe's birth addressed to Naomi: as to which the same remark may be made.

iii. 12. It is true that I am a near kinsman: howbeit there is a kinsman nearer than I. The legal custom underlying the story seems to be an extension of what appears in the Mosaic law. This imposes on the deceased husband's brother the duty of raising up seed to the dead (Genesis, chapter xxxviii; Deuteronomy, chapter xxv. 5). The story of Ruth implies that the obligation extended, failing a husband's brother, to whoever was nearest of kin.

iv. 6. And the near kinsman said, I cannot redeem it for myself, lest I mar mine own inheritance. Boaz had first called upon the kinsman to buy the estate of the deceased Elimelech from Naomi. Now Naomi was an old woman past hope of children, as she herself said to her daughters in law; hence the kinsman was willing to do this much, which would only involve an expenditure of money on his part, in return for which he would have the land. But when he is reminded that Elimelech's son has left a widow, a young woman to whom it would be his duty to raise up seed, the affair wears a different look: he would then be buying the land for Ruth's children, not for his own family, and he declines.

I Samuel: or Book VII of Old Testament History

i–vii. 1. These sections contain the birth and call of Samuel, who is the centre of the whole transitional stage which makes Book VII (see Introduction, page 1375). It will be observed that an approach towards national unity, in advance of anything in previous books, is suggested by the position of Shiloh as a recognised national centre, and the ark as the symbol to which all look for the emblem of national safety. Eli is however only described as a judge.

ii. 1. Song of Hannah. This is in Antique Metre, without any further structure. Like the thanksgivings of Zacharias and of Mary in St. Luke, it is a personal thanksgiving merged in a hymn of general character.

vii. 2. In this incident the authority of Samuel appears as fully established.

viii–xii. Incidentally this story supplies a link in the development of the idea of kingship. The notion seems to have vaguely established itself, that the authority of a judge descended in his family; and the unworthiness of the sons both of Eli and Samuel gives an impetus to the demand for a kingly family. This section is of course the pivotal incident of the whole book: Samuel the judge appoints (with Divine sanction) a king, and retires, retaining his prophetic position as a check upon the kingship in the name of the old theocracy.

xiii. 1. This historic section first evidences the success of the new king in uniting the whole nation against the foe; and then brings out the first breach between the kingly and prophetic authorities.

xv. 1. This story brings out the second and final breach between king and prophet; in the next section the kingship is transferred to the house of David. In him the prophetic spirit is to be united with the kingly.

xvi. 14. From here to the end (with the interruption of a story personal to Saul) we have the epic history of the Feud of Saul and David. There is the epic interest of a sacred story of adventure; historically the fulness of the story is justified by the struggle between the rejected and chosen royal families, with the beautiful unifying effect of the recognition of David by Jonathan.

II Samuel i. 19. David's Lament over Saul and Jonathan. In the note on Traditional Poetry (above, page 1526) this has been mentioned as an exception to the law of Antique Metre: its structure showing parallel couplets of which both lines are strengthened, which is of course one way of developing quatrains. It has the further structural interest of an augmenting refrain. This beautiful refrain seems to rest for its effect upon the bringing together two ideas, like a crescendo and decrescendo in music: How are the mighty <> Fallen! This fragmentary refrain as it appears at the beginning is enlarged at the passage from the section on Saul to that on Jonathan, and still further enlarged at the close of the whole.

Notes to II Samuel, I and II Kings

These books of the Bible (commencing with the second chapter of II Samuel) make the grand division of Bible history here styled, "The Kings." For the general spirit of it see the Introduction, page 1376. For the literary appreciation of this history the main necessity is the clear arrangement of the text. Marginal and other headings have been used for this purpose in the present edition, and they are here summed up.

Book VIII of Old Testament History

This has two main divisions: the Reign of David, the Succession and Reign of Solomon. The minor divisions group themselves thus.

II Samuel ii–ix. The consolidation of the kingdom under David.

Relations with the House of Saul (II Samuel ii–v. 3 and again ix).

Capture of Jerusalem, and inauguration of the capital and of Divine service (II Samuel v. 4–16 and vi–vii).
Philistine and general wars (v. 17 and viii).

iv. 3, 4 or footnotes to page 285. These are two sentences isolated from the narrative: the first, apparently, is suggested by the mention of Ishbosheth as Saul's son without any notice being taken of children of Jonathan; the second seems to be interjected to explain how a Beerothite can be mentioned among the children of Benjamin.

II Samuel x–xx. 22. This deals with the history of the royal family. The affair of Bath-sheba brings a curse upon David in his household, which culminates in the elaborately narrated rebellion of Absalom. The Ammonite war is related here and not with the other wars of the reign, because the murder of Uriah is the circumstance which gives it its chief importance.

II Samuel xx. 23–end. Here we have memoirs of David's reign not specifically dated; including poetical compositions, which are in Antique Metre (see above, page 1526).

I Kings i–iii. 3. The succession and marriage of Solomon.

I Kings iii. 4–iv. A general view of Solomon on the throne: including his wisdom, which is his special distinction among the kings.

I Kings v–ix. 25. Solomon's great achievement of the Temple. His intercourse with Hiram king of Tyre is clearly connected with this.

I Kings ix. 26–x. Another view of Solomon in the fulness of his glory, including the wisdom which is now famous enough to bring the distant queen of Sheba.

I Kings xi. Fall of Solomon; followed by Revolt of the Ten Tribes.

Book IX of Old Testament History

The arrangement of this complex book has been fully discussed in the Introduction (pages 1377–9). The sections group as follows.

I Kings xii–xvi. 14. House of Jeroboam and worship of the calves of Beth-el; and various successors.

I Kings xvi. 15–II Kings x. 27. House of Omri, with the Baal worship of Ahab and Jezebel, and the ministry of Elijah and Elisha, the whole culminating in the Conspiracy of Jehu.

II Kings x. 28–xvii. Partial Restoration of Judah, and Fall of Israel.

II Kings viii. 7. It is to be noted that at this period Elisha appears as a prophet for Syria, as well as for Israel.

Book X of Old Testament History

The arrangement of this book is simple and straightforward, following the successive kings of Judah to the Fall of Jerusalem.

II Kings xviii. 13–xix. This is substantially identical with a portion of Isaiah (from chapter xxxvi), relating the invasion of Sennacherib.

II Kings xx. This is largely the same as a portion of Isaiah (chapter xxxviii); but the latter gives in addition the song of thanksgiving of Hezekiah after his recovery.

II Kings xxiv. 18–xxv. Considerable portions of this are identical with portions of Jeremiah (xxxvii. 1 and lii. 1).

Notes to the Book of Tobit

The Book of Tobit (in the Apocrypha) and of Esther make a supplement to "The Kings," as containing Stories of the Exile. For the book as a whole, see Introduction, page 1380.

Title page. The first verses of the book seem to make an elaborate title page; for which compare the elaborate titles of Proverbs and Deuteronomy.

The Book of Tobit resembles Ecclesiasticus in the fact that the Hebrew original had not survived, and the translation of our English versions was made from the Septuagint. The Hebrew versions of Tobit that exist are late, and of no critical weight.

i. 4. And when I was in mine own country, etc. The long sentence commencing with these words I have made by altering the punctuation of the R. V. By removing the full stops which in that version are made to separate coördinate sentences, it is possible to save the historic probability of the text. As it stands in the R. V., Tobit is made to assert that the falling away of Naphtali from the worship of Jerusalem took place when he was a young man: this would make him more than two centuries old when carried into captivity. What is obviously meant is that when he was a young man he alone went to Jerusalem to the feasts; the explanation about the falling away of the tribe being introduced to explain why this was significant. The sentence as thus punctuated is regular, if somewhat long; the temporal sentence, When I was young, has for its principal sentence, all the tribe of Naphtali . . . fell away, and all the tribes which fell away together sacrificed to the heifer Baal, and I alone went often, etc. There is nothing in this punctuation to conflict with the Greek text.

ii. 14. Where are thine alms and thy righteous deeds? The insinuation is, his calamity has revealed that all his piety was hypocritical.

iv. 17. Pour out thy bread on the burial of the just. Two explanations are offered of this expression. One is that it refers to the custom of carrying food to a house of mourning, in behalf of the mourners who would be unable, as unclean, to visit their homes. The other assumes the custom of putting food on the tomb, though for the poor and not for the dead. The custom, whatever it was, is noted also in Jeremiah (chapter xvi. 7): Neither shall men break bread for them in mourning, to comfort them for the dead.

vi. 2. A fish leaped out of the river, and would have swallowed up the young man. The Chaldaic version puts the matter differently — that the fish threatened to eat Tobias's bread.

vi. 12. Raguel may in no wise marry her to another according to the law of Moses, or else he shall be liable to death. No law of Moses is known as bearing on the case, except that of Numbers, chapter xxxvi. 6–9, which simply prescribes the marriage of a daughter heiress within her tribe; nor is there any death penalty attached.

viii. 3. But when the devil smelled the smell, he fled into the uppermost parts of Egypt, and the angel bound him. The commentators seem to assume that it was by an evil smell that the fiend was driven away; and Bissell wonders that Tobias and his bride were not driven away likewise. But I doubt if this is the meaning. In oriental superstition it is the good and fragrant perfumes that drive away the evil spirits, with whose natures they are incompatible. Southey makes use of this idea in his Thalaba (vi. 22), speaking of such perfumes —

As Peris to their Sister bear,
When from the summit of some lofty tree
She hangs encaged, the captive of the Dives,
They from their pinions shake
The sweetness of celestial flowers,
And, as her enemies impure
From that impervious poison far away Fly groaning with the torment, she the while Inhales her fragrant food.

In support of this, Southey quotes a note of D'Herbelot on a similar detail of the Caherman Nameh.

> The dives could not bear the perfumes, which rendered them gloomy and melancholy whenever they drew near the cage in which a Peri was suspended.

A similar idea underlies the incidents of the Miracle Plays in which devils are driven off by rose petals cast by the hands of Faith, Hope, and Charity. So the fish's heart on the ashes of incense may have emitted a delicious perfume, from which the evil fiend shrank. In Milton's well-known reference to this passage of Tobit there is a curious ambiguity, so that we cannot tell whether he understood a savoury perfume or the opposite.

So entertained those odorous sweets the Fiend
Who came their bane, though with them better pleas'd

Than Asmodeus with the fishy fume
That drove him, though enamoured, from the spouse
Of Tobit's son, and with a vengeance sent From Media post to Egypt, there fast bound.

Paradise Lost, iv. 166.

Better pleas'd may mean that the other was the reverse of pleas'd; or, if the smell of the fish be a fragrant smell, then that the fragrance of Paradise surpassed it.

Notes to the Book of Esther

This book is here made part of a supplement to "The Kings," being a Story of the Exile. For the book as a whole, see Introduction, page 1382.

Apocryphal Additions to Esther

The Septuagint contains several passages which are not in the original Hebrew; additions, or in one case an amplification. These are on the face of them interpolations, carrying no authority. They have, however, a certain interest of their own; and they are worth noting for another reason: the way they have been dealt with in early translations, including the Authorised Version, shows how indifferent early translators were to the literary continuity of what they translated. I take the following clear account of the matter from Smith's Bible Dictionary.

> When Jerome translated the Book of Esther, he first gave the Version of the Hebrew only as being alone authentic. He then added at the end a Version in Latin of those several passages which he found in the LXX, and which were not in the Hebrew, stating where each passage came in, and marking them all with an obelus. The first passage so given is that which forms the continuation of chapter x (which of course immediately precedes it), ending with the above entry about Dositheus. Having annexed this conclusion, he then gives the Prooemium, which he says forms the beginning of the Greek Vulgate, beginning with what is now v. 2 of chapter xi; and so proceeds with the other passages. But in subsequent editions all Jerome's explanatory matter has been swept away, and the disjointed portions have been printed as chapters xi, xii, xiii, xiv, xv, xvi, as if they formed a narrative in continuation of the Canonical Book. The extreme absurdity of this arrangement is nowhere more apparent than in chapter xi, where the verse (1) which closes the whole Book in the Greek copies, and in St. Jerome's Latin translation, is actually made immediately to precede that (v. 2) which is the very first verse of the Prooemium.

Another of the absurd results is that in chapter x Mordecai explains a dream, which dream we do not hear until chapter xi. The Revised Version of the Apocrypha has given the passages separately, with indications as to the place of each in the Greek original. What is interesting in these interpolations is given in the notes that here follow.

ii. 21. In those days, when Mordecai sat in the king's gate, etc. In the interpolations of the Greek version Mordecai's discovery of the conspiracy is connected with a dream, which is thus related.

> Behold, noise and tumult, thunderings and earthquake, and uproar upon the earth: and, behold, two great dragons came forth, both of them ready to fight, and their cry was great. And at their cry all nations were ready to battle, that they might fight against the righteous nation. And, lo, a day of darkness and gloominess, tribulation and anguish, affliction and great uproar upon the earth. And the whole righteous nation was troubled, fearing the evils that should befall them, and were ready to perish. Then they cried unto God, and upon their cry, as it were from a little fountain, there came a great river, even much water. The light and the sun rose up, and the lowly were exalted, and devoured the glorious.

The narrative goes on to say that Mordecai pondered over the interpretation of this dream, "and until night by all means was desirous to know it"; that he took his rest in the court with the two eunuchs who were the keepers of the court, heard their communings, and gave information. The eunuchs were executed, and Mordecai commanded "to serve in the court"; but the execution of these eunuchs brought Mordecai into enmity with the powerful Haman.

When the whole story reaches its end, one of the interpolated passages makes Mordecai find the interpretation of his dream.

> As for the little fountain that became a river, and there was light, and the sun, and much water, the river is Esther, whom the king married, and made queen: and the two dragons are I and Aman: and the nations are those that were assembled to destroy the name of the Jews: and my nation, this is Israel, which cried to God, and were saved: for the Lord hath saved his people, and the Lord hath delivered us from all these evils, and God hath wrought signs and great wonders, which have not been done among the nations.

iii. 7. They cast Pur, that is, the lot, before Haman. This is an artistic touch in the construction of the narrative which should not be overlooked. Haman is a fatalist; and this makes the swinging round of destiny against him more emphatic. Compare below, note to vi. 13.

iii. 13. And letters were sent by posts, etc. The Greek version purports to give the letter: a rhetorical expansion of the situation, of which the chief features are the description of the Jews as a nation "alone continually in opposition unto all men, following perversely a life which is strange to our laws"; and again a reference to Haman in the words: "who is ordained over the affairs, and is a second father unto us."

v. 1. Now it came to pass on the third day, that Esther put on her royal apparel. . . . So Esther drew near, and touched the top of the sceptre. The few sentences which stand thus in the Hebrew are in the Greek amplified into an elaborate description of several paragraphs. First the prayer of Mordecai is given at length; in which, amongst other things he is made to say:

> Thou knowest, Lord, that it was neither in contempt nor pride, nor for any desire of glory, that I did not bow down to proud Aman. For I could have been content with good will for the salvation of Israel to kiss the soles of his feet. But I did this, that I might not prefer the glory of man above the glory of God: neither will I bow down unto any but to thee, which art my Lord.

Then the mourning of Esther is elaborately described; and her prayer is given at length. She speaks of herself as abhorring the bed of the uncircumcised, and the sign of her high estate, which has come to her as a 'necessity.' Lastly we have a minute account of the critical moment.

> And being majestically adorned, after she had called upon the all-seeing God and saviour, she took her two maids with her: and upon the one she leaned, as carrying herself delicately; and the other followed, bearing up her train. And she was ruddy through the perfection of her beauty, and her countenance was cheerful and right amiable: but her heart was in anguish for fear. Then having passed through all the doors, she stood before the king, who sat upon his royal throne, and was clothed with all his robes of majesty, all glittering with gold and precious stones; and he was very dreadful. Then lifting up his countenance that was flushed with glory, he looked upon her in fierce anger: and the queen fell down, and turned pale, and fainted, and she bowed herself upon the head of the maid that went before. Then God changed the spirit of the king into mildness, who in an agony leaped from his throne, and took her in his arms, till she came to herself again, and comforted her with soothing words, and said unto her, Esther, what is the matter? I am thy brother, be of good cheer: thou shalt not die, for our commandment is for our subjects: come near. So he held up his golden sceptre, and laid it upon her neck, and embraced her, and said, Speak unto me. Then said she unto him, I saw thee, my lord, as an angel of God, and my heart was troubled for fear of thy glory. For wonderful art thou, my lord, and thy countenance is full of grace. And as she was speaking, she fell down for faintness. Then the king was troubled, and all his servants comforted her.

The narrative of the Hebrew version is then continued: how the king inquired as to Esther's petition and request.

vi. 13. If Mordecai, before whom thou hast begun to fall, be of the seed of the Jews, etc. This is evidently a touch of fatalism. The family council cannot help being struck with the circumstance that the man through whom Haman has just been humiliated is one of those he had plotted to destroy by massacre; here is the finger of Nemesis. Haman's superstition in casting lots for a lucky day for the massacre has been already pointed out.

viii. 13. A copy of the writing . . . was published. The Septuagint again offers the letter at full length. One of its sentences may be quoted:

For by these means he thought, finding us destitute of friends, to have translated the kingdom of the Persians to the Macedonians. But we find that the Jews, whom this most ungracious wretch hath delivered to utter destruction, are no evil-doers, but live by most just laws: and that they be children of the most high and most mighty living God, who hath ordered the kingdom both unto us and to our progenitors in the most excellent manner.

It may be remarked that such interpolated speeches must not be considered in the light of forgeries; they simply illustrate the convention of ancient history by which the historian would bring out the situation of affairs in the form of an imaginary speech put into the mouth of a personage of the history.

Notes to I and II Chronicles

The biblical I and II Chronicles, with the sequel books of Ezra and Nehemiah, make the division of Old Testament History here styled "The Chronicles." For the general character of this, see Introduction, pages 1383–7.

I Chronicles, chapters i to ix. 34: or Chronicle I of the present edition

The bearing of what is here presented as Chronicle I upon the succession of Chronicles depends mainly upon the maintenance of the Temple service at Jerusalem as the leading interest of the Return from exile. "This could only be effected by the residence of the priests and Levites in Jerusalem in the order of their courses; and this residence was only practicable in case of the payment of the appointed tithes, first-fruits and other offerings. Immediately these ceased the priests and Levites were obliged to disperse to their own villages to obtain a livelihood, and the Temple services were neglected. But then again the registers of the Levitical genealogies were necessary, in order that it might be known who were entitled to such and such allowances, as porters, as singers, as priests, and so on; because all these offices went by families; and again the payment of the tithes, first-fruits, etc., was dependent upon the different families of Israel being established each in his inheritance. Obviously therefore one of the most pressing wants of the Jewish community fter their return from Babylon would be trusty genealogical records." *

ii. 23. Machir the father of Gilead: this and similar expressions are probably to be understood as territorial designations.

ii. 42. And the sons of Caleb, etc. This paragraph seems to be of the nature of an appendix to the preceding, dealing mainly with the geographical purpose of Chronicle I.

iv. 9. And Jabez was more honourable than his brethren. The connection of this paragraph with its context has not been satisfactorily explained. Hebrew tradition identifies Jabez with Othniel.

vii. 14. The Children of Joseph. The tribes of Manasseh and Ephraim seem here to be treated as a unity: the third paragraph dealing with the geographical possessions of both.

I Chronicles, Chapter ix. 35 to end of II Chronicles: or Chronicles II, III of the present edition

ix. 35. This genealogy is repeated with slight variations from Chronicle I (chapter viii. 28): it seems to mark the beginning of Chronicle II, which starts with the death of Saul and accession of David.

The chief interest of these two Chronicles, which make the substance of the chronicle history, will be the points of comparison with the treatment of the same matter in the books of Kings. This has been discussed fully in the Introduction, page 1384. A conspectus is here added, exhibiting in parallel columns the treatment of the same topics in the two types of history.

Notes to the Book of Ezra

Ezra, Chapters i – vi: or Chronicle IV of the present edition

i. 1. Now in the first year of Cyrus . . . which is in Jerusalem. These sentences are found [with one slight verbal difference] twice, as the concluding words of II Chronicles and the opening words of Ezra.

ii. 1. Genealogy. This is substantially identical with the Genealogy in Chronicle VI (see page 460), where Nehemiah states that he discovered it.

iv. 6: or footnote to page 448. The modern literary form of a footnote is specially necessary at this point: printed as the Chronicle is in the Bible a letter relating to the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem, and addressed to Artaxerxes, appears as if cited in illustration of an attempt to stop the building of the Temple, by application to Cyrus or Darius. The important point is not the question how such a citation comes into the book, but rather what is the relation between the letter with the words introducing it and the context. The use of a footnote just fits this: a mention in the text of opposition to the returned exiles exercised at the Persian court is supported by an annotation bringing forward similar opposition at different periods. . . . Rehum the chancellor and Shimshai the scribe wrote a letter. . . . Then wrote Rehum the chancellor and Shimshai the scribe. The collocation of sentences at this point is puzzling; on the whole the best explanation is that we have in the note an extract from a chronicle which itself includes an extract from an official document. [It must be noted that with the words Rehum the chancellor and Shimshai the scribe wrote a letter, Syrian or Aramaic dialect takes the place of Hebrew to the end of the footnote.] The annotator says that Bishlam, etc. were guilty of similar opposition, of which he is able to bring forward evidence from an original Syrian source. The extract he quotes begins (in Syrian): Rehum . . . wrote . . . in this sort, and then extracts from the royal archives the full entry of the letter, in which naturally the text of the letter would be introduced: Then wrote Rehum . . . and so forth. The last words indicate an abridgment of conventional compliments; and the clauses preceding, especially the great and noble Osnappar are more in keeping with an official archive than with the simplicity of the quoted chronicle as it appears outside the forms of the letter. To make the matter quite clear I have distinguished the official extract by italic type.

Page 449. Then ceased the work of the house of God, etc. From this point down to the end of the last paragraph but one of Chronicle IV the Syrian or Aramaic dialect is used instead of Hebrew. The key to this seems to be found in the preceding footnote. There a Syrian chronicle is quoted as containing an extract from official archives of the letters of opposition to the good work; as all this part of Chronicle IV is occupied with similar opposition, the writer may well be using the same Syrian chronicle, and conforms his language to that of the works quoted, both being familiar to his readers. He returns to the sacred tongue when he proceeds to speak of the Passover.

Ezra, Chapter vii–x: or Chronicle V of the present edition

The form of this Chronicle is self-explanatory: extracts from the personal memoirs of Ezra, with an Introduction giving an account of this Ezra. Now after these things: these words do not convey any date, but are a regular introductory phrase in historic narrative.

vii. 11. Now this is the copy of the letter, etc. This letter is in the Syrian or Aramaic dialect; compare above, notes to Chronicle IV.

x. 1. Now while Ezra prayed, etc. The change to the third person would seem to indicate that the editor, who is responsible for the Introduction, here carries on the account of the incident, which the actual words of Ezra's memoir had commenced.

Notes to the Book of Nehemiah

Nehemiah, Chapters i–vii. 73 (a): or Chronicle VI of the present edition

The general form of this Chronicle is transparently clear: a personal narrative by Nehemiah of his own experiences.

Page 457: footnote. These words seem a footnote attached to the name Ophel: in the Bible they precede the verse of which they are exegetical.

vii. 5. And my God put into my heart to gather together the nobles, etc. Chronicle VI concludes abruptly without explaining fully how Nehemiah proposed to remedy the sparse population of the holy city. His purpose is however implied: the reckoning the nobles by genealogy was to establish who should be called upon to reside in Jerusalem. The long genealogy brings Chronicle VI to conclusion, but the result of Nehemiah's action appears in Chronicle VIII: the Allotment of the Families of the Return in Jerusalem and in the Cities.

Page 460. Genealogy. This is, with trifling variations, identical with the Genealogy in Chronicle IV, page 446.

Nehemiah, Chapters vii. 73 (b)–x: or Chronicle VII of the present edition

The form of this Chronicle is a simple narrative needing no comment.

ix. 5. Then the Levites . . . said. It is generally understood that the Levites named in this sentence recited together a prayer, as in the previous sentence a number of Levite individuals (or families) led the people in a hymn. But a prayer of such length as the one here given does not lend itself to choral recitation as a hymn of praise would. It is conceivable that the suggestion intended is that the several Levites occupied various places, the crowd gathering round several centres; that they then led each his section of the people in a prayer of which the general lines had been determined beforehand.

Nehemiah, Chapters xi – xii. 26: or Chronicle VIII of the present edition

This is made up of two separate documents of a statistical nature, illustrating different points connected with the Return. One is an Allotment of residence, in Jerusalem and in the other cities, in the spirit of the Allotments of Moses (Numbers xxxiv. 1) or Joshua (Joshua xiii). This connects itself naturally with Nehemiah's purpose of providing for the due population of Jerusalem (see note to Chronicle VI, on vii. 5). The other is a regis ter which explains itself, and bears upon the matter of Chronicle IV.

Nehemiah, Chapters xii. 27 – xiii: or Chronicle IX of the present edition

It is especially necessary in the case of this Chronicle to indicate the true literary form, a succession of extracts from Nehemiah's Memoirs. The form in which it is printed in our Bible gives an impression as to sequence of events inconsistent with the statement (xiii. 6) of the narrative itself, which shows that Nehemiah was absent from Jerusalem some years between what is narrated in the first and second sections.

Page 467: footnote. That this is a comment, and not a part of Nehemiah's personal narrative, is suggested not only by the change from the first person, but also by the phrase in the days of Nehemiah.

xiii. 1, 4. On that day . . . Now before this. The first is a general introductory phrase in memoirs of the nature of a personal journal: some temporal expression, exact or indefinite, introduces all Nehemiah's personal narratives. The phrase has no connection with what has preceded: but (as the narrative shows) refers to what occurred after Nehemiah's return several years later than the preceding incident. Taken in connection with the phrase Now before this, which commences the next paragraph, the general suggestion is that on Nehemiah's return he found the community interested in the business of separating the 'mixed multitude' (of those allied with Ammon and the like) from the pure people of God; that in the period of his absence Tobiah the Ammonite, simply on account of his marriage connection with the high priest, had been assigned chambers in the Temple itself. Hence Nehemiah's violent expulsion of the intruder.

Arrangement in Seven Books

The contents of our 'Book of the Prophet Isaiah' have been arranged (whether by the prophet himself or an editor) upon a singularly clear and harmonious plan. The whole falls into seven divisions, or 'books': the several books having individuality of interest, and each working up to a literary climax.

Book I contains General Prophecies: presenting Isaiah's main theme — the purging judgment that must precede the salvation of the remnant — without any specialisation to particular occasions or circumstances. A climax to the book is found in the prophet's vision of his call to the prophetic office; it is characteristic of Isaiah that this should follow prophecies to which it seems a preface (see above, page 1533).

The prophecies of Book II are specifically connected with an historic crisis, the Unholy Alliance (in the reign of Ahaz) of Northern Israel with Syria against Judah. A further bond of unity running through this book is the sign 'Immanuel.' For a climax, the sign 'Immanuel' is enlarged into the 'Wonderful Counsellor,' and an ode follows denouncing the final Doom of the North.

The Third Book is wholly occupied with Assyrian invasion and the overthrow of the invader; the terms are general, and not determined to any particular invasion. The climax is the picture of the Holy Mountain and final Messianic peace.

Book IV is plainly independent of chronology, and gathers into one the various Dooms of the Nations. It culminates in a general Rhapsody of Judgment, picturing the overthrow of the whole earth, and the glory of the saved (both of Israel and of the Nations) in the Holy Mountain. [For the reference to Moab see below, page 1573.]

The separateness of Book V from what precedes and follows is obvious; and it is also easy to catch the harmony of spirit in the discourses of which it is made up. Here the universal theme of purging judgment and salvation of the remnant is bound up with a political situation of the chosen people: but it is a situation which is chronic rather than special — a tendency to seek defence from the coming overthrow other than that of submission to divine judgment. In the first discourse we read of a 'refuge of lies' on the part of the rulers of Judah; in the second discourse they 'hide their counsel from the LORD,' while the foe is here 'the multitude of all the nations that fight against Ariel.' In the third and fourth discourses the false refuge is specified as trust in Egypt, and the threatened destruction is from Assyria. The fifth discourse is again general in its terms. For a climax to this book we have a Rhapsody of Salvation coming at the eleventh hour, while the 'sinners in Zion' [those who have been resting on the false hopes] tremble before the 'everlasting burnings' that cleanse the holy city. There is however a second climax in the seventh prophecy, of an Utter Destruction and Great Restoration extending to the whole earth. [The reference to Edom is only a detail: see below, page 1574.] Thus the spirit of this fifth book is best expressed by a general title — Prophecies of Judgment and Restoration.

> The vexed questions of the date and authorship of chapter xxxv are outside the scope of the present work. Whatever may be the truth in regard to its authorship, it is clear that in the Isaiah which has come down to us this section is presented as the contrast to the preceding picture of destruction required by the plan of Book V, in all the discourses of which destruction is contrasted with restoration.

Book VI, like Book II, is specifically connected with a period of history — the reign of Hezekiah. It lacks the climax prophecy which appears in the other books: unless we are to regard Book VII as standing for the grand climax to this book and to the whole collection of prophecies.

What is here designated as Book VII is the all-important literary composition called by most modern commentators the 'Second Isaiah,' and assigned to a different author and a later age. With questions of date and authorship the Modern Reader's Bible has no concern. The present arrangement assumes only what all schools of criticism may concede — that these chapters (xl–lxvi) form a literary work distinct from all the rest. It is here presented as the Rhapsody (or Spiritual Drama) of Zion Redeemed.

Book I

i. 2. This discourse consists of a theme, God's arraignment of his children as rebels, treated in four paragraphs: the prophet's remonstrance — repentance by oblations — repentance of life — corruption redeemed with judgment.

ii. 1. This discourse has the 'envelope structure' so common in Hebrew lyrics: it opens and closes with pictures of the golden age of peace and righteousness, and between these pictures the body of the discourse emphasises the purging judgment through which alone such glory is to be reached. Four paragraphs make up the body of the discourse: corruption unforgivable — judgment advancing — judgment on men's pride — on women's luxury, till masculine rule and feminine beauty both go a-begging.

And it shall come to pass in the latter days, etc. This paragraph (except the last sentence) will be found almost verbatim in the Book of Micah. It must not be assumed that Micah borrowed it from Isaiah, or Isaiah from Micah. The prophetic writings abound in passages which recur with more or less variation. It is important in dealing with ancient literature to remember that the literature of books was preceded by a grand floating literature of oral speech, portions of which are worked up by the later authors into the poetry which has been stereotyped into books. Both Micah and Isaiah may be in this case citing and enlarging upon one of these floating prophecies.

ii. 22. Cease ye from man, etc. This sentence is not found in the Septuagint, and is by many regarded as a gloss, on account of its want of connection with what precedes. But (traditional divisions of chapters being ignored) the verse connects well with what follows, and I have made it the commencement of the new paragraph.

v. 8. For the structure of this prophecy, combining 'verse' and 'prose,' compare above, pages 1530–2. I do not see in this prophecy any allusion to particular contemporary incident; but idealised suggestions of earthquake and famine, and invasion of mystic foes. Compare the idealisation of locust plagues into mystic forces of destruction in Joel.

vi. 1. The position of this Vision of the prophet's Call at the close of the first book is in accordance with a feature of Isaiah's style, to place prefaces after that which they preface. [Above, page 1533.] — Make the heart of this people fat, etc. This must not be understood as a warning to the prophet from the outset that his ministry would be unsuccessful. The whole commission given him amounts to what is the fixed idea throughout all Isaiah's writings — a purging judgment, that destroys all but the 'remnant' who by submission are saved. The remnant is here exhibited as no more than the stock of a tree that has been felled.

Book II

Book II consists of four closely connected prophecies, unified by the specific mention in the text of a political situation, the alliance of Northern Israel with Syria against Judah, and also by the thought of the 'sign Immanuel.' It is necessary to discuss in full detail this difficult section of Isaiah, as I am advancing an interpretation of the 'sign Immanuel' different from the interpretations at present received.

Accepted interpretations, however much they may differ in detail, agree in understanding the 'virgin' who bears the child Immanuel to refer to a virgin (real or ideal) of Judah. The suggestion here offered is that the term 'Immanuel' is at first connected with a woman of the enemy's land, but is afterwards claimed in a truer sense for Judah and the chosen people of God. The word 'Immanuel' occurs three times. (1) In the first use of it (chapter vii. 14) the prophet is offering comfort to Judah in the panic of the allied invasion, and proclaims a sign from God. So confident is the foe that a woman [of the enemy] bringing forth a child calls him by the proud name 'God-with-us'; but before that proudly named child is old enough to discern good food from bad he will be eating famine fare. [That 'butter and honey' is an expression for famine fare is clear from the use of it below (chapter vii. 22), and is so recognised by Delitzsch, etc.] (2) The word occurs a second time in chapter viii. 8. The Assyrian invasion is to inundate Israel [the whole passage relates to the enemy's land, except the single clause that it will sweep onward into Judah]: it will 'fill the breadth of thy land, O Immanuel' — O boaster of God-with-us. (3) When the expression occurs the third time (chapter viii. 10) there is clearly a change in the use of it: the connective 'for' shows that what before was a proper name is here made into a sentence. The prophet cries to the allied enemies: Make what uproar ye please, ye will be broken in pieces, for GOD IS WITH US. The enemy's boast is appropriated in a true sense for the people protected by God. (4) But this is not the end of the train of thought represented by the expression 'Immanuel.' The prophecy goes on to depict the complete triumph of God's chosen people of Judah over their enemies, and at the climax expands the idea of the child named from the Divine presence into something yet more glorious: For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given . . . and his name shall be called [not merely 'God with us,' but] Wonderful Counsellor, Mighty God, Everlasting Father, Prince of Peace. Thus the whole group of prophecies finds a unity in the Immanuel idea.

By some readers the objection may be made that this interpretation conflicts with the use made of the passage in the New Testament. St. Matthew (chapter i. 22) describing Jesus born of the Virgin Mary cites the passage of Isaiah: That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the Lord through the prophet, saying, Behold the virgin shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son, and they shall call his name Immanuel; which is, being interpreted, God with us. The answer is: (1) As regards the literal meaning of the particular verses of Isaiah, the present interpretation conflicts with the passage of St. Matthew only in the way in which all other interpretations conflict with it; (2) when the general drift of Isaiah's use of 'Immanuel' is considered, the interpretation here offered is a better basis for St. Matthew's reference than any other. (1) As regards the literal meaning of Isaiah vii. 14, nothing can be clearer than that the child whose birth is mentioned will be little more than an infant when the alliance of Israel and Syria is overthrown. The verse could therefore refer to the birth of the Christ only in a secondary or mystic sense. [The upholders of the ordinary interpretation recognise this. Delitzsch speaks of Isaiah seeing as a present event what is really future. Driver understands the child as a 'pledge and symbol.' Cheyne says, "There is no explanation which does not oblige us to make some assumption not directly sanctioned by the text."] Is it not simpler to recognise that the New Testament writers, following canons of secondary and theological interpretation, cite expressions from the Old Testament apart from their immediate context, with the feeling that the very language of the sacred books had mystic significations over and above the natural interpretation that would belong to it as mere literature? Examples of this will occur to every reader: an unmistakable illustration is found within a few verses of the passage of St. Matthew already quoted. Speaking of the flight of Joseph, Mary, and the Babe into Egypt St. Matthew adds (chapter ii. 15): That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the Lord through the prophet, saying, Out of Egypt did I call my son. No reference has been suggested for this except to Hosea, chapter xi. 1, which reads: When Israel was a child, then I loved him, and called my son out of Egypt. It is obvious that the words of Hosea cited by St. Matthew must be separated from their literary context in order to bear the significance he places on them. Thus as regards the verse of Isaiah quoted by St. Matthew, the interpretation here offered is no further than the received interpretations from St. Matthew's use of the prophecy. (2) But when we pass from particular verses to the whole drift of the Immanuel prophecies, it will be clear that the proposed interpretation makes a fitter basis for the theological use of the term than any other: for it involves the connection of the term 'Immanuel' with the expanded expression 'Wonderful Counsellor, Mighty God,' etc., which is the most Messianic of all Messianic prophecies.

I proceed to point out how the proposed interpretation simplifies the connectedness of the group of prophecies from the historic standpoint. Those who connect the virgin of chapter vii. 14–16 with Judah are bound to connect with Judah also the verse that follows:

> The Lord shall bring upon thee, and upon thy people, and upon thy father's house, days that have not come, from the day that Ephraim departed from Judah; even the king of Assyria.

They are thus saddled with the difficulty of understanding a threatened Assyrian invasion of Judah in the midst of a prophecy of which the explicit purpose is to comfort Judah under another invasion. This is surely rubbing the sore instead of bringing the plaister. The difficulty is usually met by saying that Ahaz, instead of accepting the prophet's message, went to Assyria for assistance, and in the end suffered from the power he had preferred to Judah's God. This may be true as an historic fact, but not a word to that effect is said by Isaiah. Nor is it questioned that in passages that immediately follow (e.g. chapter viii. 1, etc.) the prophet is describing the Assyrian overthrow of Israel and Syria. Thus the ordinary explanation of the Immanuel verses involves a threatened Assyrian invasion of Judah interjected — without anything to mark the change — into a comforting promise to suffering Judah that her enemies should be overthrown by the Assyrians, and this because of a sin of Judah which the prophet omits to mention. With the present interpretation all this difficulty vanishes. The connection of chapter vii. 14 with Israel carries with it the reference of the verses that follow to Israel: it is Israel and its ally who suffer the Assyrian invasion throughout the whole group of prophecies. I have made this clear by the division of the text. I may add as a confirmation that the expression (chapter vii. 17) days that have not come from the day that Ephraim departed from Judah is an unnatural expression in an address to Judah: in an address to Northern Israel it is the most natural of all expressions, being equivalent to saying, 'Since thou becamest a kingdom.'

This interpretation of the land suffering Assyrian invasion as the land of Israel (and her ally) in all cases, and never the land of Judah, applies also to chapter ix. My explanation of this difficult portion of Isaiah is conveyed chiefly by the mode in which I have printed the text (see pages 480–1). (1) It is necessary to isolate chapter viii. 11–20 as a preface to the prophecy which extends from chapter viii. 9 to ix. 7. For such parenthetic prefaces see above, page 1533: this is the most pronounced example, and has the further peculiarity of a parenthetic acceptance (chapter viii. 17, 18) by the prophet of the Divine commission

There is no difficulty in following such an arrangement when the passage is properly printed. (2) What remains (chapter viii. 9, 10 and viii. 21 to ix. 7) makes a rhapsodic vision of very interesting structure. In the first section there is a pendulum movement in single lines between the ideas of the enemy 'girding themselves' to destroy and their being dashed in pieces themselves. In the second section (following the parenthetic preface) there is the same pendulum movement in stanzas: alternately we have the boastful cries of Judah's enemies (indicated in my text by quotation marks) and the glorious triumph of Judah. By the time the third section is reached the boasting enemy has disappeared, and there is only the triumph of Judah in the child Wonderful.

There remains the difficulty of chapter vii. 7–9, which as ordinarily presented reads thus:

> Thus saith the Lord GOD, It shall not stand, neither shall it come to pass. For the head of Syria is Damascus, and the head of Damascus is Rezin: and within threescore and five years shall Ephraim be broken in pieces, that it be not a people: and the head of Ephraim is Samaria, and the head of Samaria is Remaliah's son. If ye will not believe, surely ye shall not be established.

All commentators recognise the extreme difficulty of following the connection of sentences here; and proposals are made to alter the text. I think the passage becomes intelligible (though not free from difficulty) on the basis of understanding quotations from the triumph songs of the enemy as scornfully interjected by the prophet in the midst of his pledge of their overthrow. (See my arrangement of the text: pages 478–9.) This may seem a violent interpretation; but it has the support (1) of the other prophecy in the same book: Judah and her Enemies (pages 480–1), which I explain on the basis of similar quotations; (2) of the undoubted example of Psalm lxviii. 12–14, where the progress of Israel's invasion of the land of Canaan is conveyed by snatches of their triumph songs. (See notes to that psalm, page 1615.)

vii. 17. Compare note on xix. 1.

ix. 8. The structure of this Doom Song is an interesting example of the combination of 'verse' and 'prose' which has been discussed in general terms above, page 1531. There are here four stanzas, exactly symmetric one with another. In each there is (a) an introductory couplet, (b) in the middle a quatrain of verse gnomic in character, (c) at the end a couplet refrain; between these fixed portions of verse there is prose (like recitative in music) which is expanded to varying degrees of fulness in the different stanzas. Though the refrain is verbally unchanged, yet it has the effect of continual advance, through the fuller meaning which comes into the word 'still' with each succeeding stanza.

Book III

The whole book is made up of a single prophecy of Assyria considered as the rod of Jehovah's anger: permitted to triumph as the unconscious agent of Jehovah's purposes, and cut down in his pride on the brink of complete success. The prophecy falls into two sections. The first section puts the thought in the form of general prediction. The second opens with realistic cries of panic, as if Jerusalem itself were on the point of falling: at this moment comes the Divine interposition, and as against fallen Assyria we have the picture of the Holy Mountain and the peace of 'the remnant': songs of salvation make the concluding note.

Book IV

xiii. 1. The structure of this Doom prophecy is made up of the Divine word of the overthrow of Babylon [prose passages] interrupted at intervals by [impersonal] songs realising or celebrating what the Divine word brings forward. Compare above, page 1531. The last of these verse interruptions is a fully developed Ode on Fallen Babylon. [Its structural form is antistrophic inversion (7, 6; 6, 7) on a basis of the Dirge or Taunt rhythm: this is (in contradistinction to equal parallelism) a line followed by a weaker line. The general impression of this rhythm is clear in this ode, though the inequality may be obscure in some couplets.]

My consecrated ones . . . them that exult in my majesty. The Divine voice is heard calling to his 'hosts'; the idea suggested by the title Jehovah Sabaoth. Compare Joel

iii. 11 and 13; Psalm ciii. 20, 21. — I will sit upon the mount of congregation in the uttermost parts of the north: for the north as the quarter from which Divine judgment is to be looked for, compare note on page 1672.

xiv. 29. The natural suggestion of this Doom Song is some affliction of Israel which is a cause of triumph for all the cities of Israel's hereditary foe Philistia. They are bidden not to rejoice too soon: forces of destruction await themselves, and the accumulation of such forces of destruction is expressed in the three degrees of comparison: serpent, basilisk, fiery flying serpent. — A smoke out of the north: the north is regularly the quarter from which Divine judgments come. There may be also a pointing to Assyria, especially in view of the date note appended. [Compare II Chronicles, chapter xxviii. 16–18.] — What then shall one answer the messengers of the nation? The prose epilogue suggests ambassadors of triumphant Philistia coming to Judah, but received with the answer that her confidence is still only in Jehovah.

xv. 1. In its structure this beautiful Doom prophecy is a realistic Wail over fallen Moab [quatrains of verse] alternating at intervals with [prose passages] the Divine word ordaining the overthrow. Compare above, page 1532. Towards the close (from xvi. 7) the dirge rhythm has become pronounced [each line of the quatrain represents a dirge couplet], and the quatrains are separated by varying refrains (italic passages).

xvi. 1. 'Send ye the lambs,' etc. Here Moab is supposed to speak and to appeal for help to the power from which she had revolted. Compare II Kings, chapter iii. 4. — This is the word that the LORD spake . . . but now the LORD hath spoken: for similar postscripts to prophecies compare below, xxii. 24 and xxiii. 17

xviii. 1. There is a certain amount of ambiguity about the situation presented in this striking Doom prophecy. Ambassadors are busily travelling in vessels of papyrus on the Nile — but to whom? Either (1) from the land beyond the rivers of Ethiopia to the Ethiopians (the 'nation tall and smooth,' etc.), as if making common cause against an invader; or (2) from the Ethiopians and neighbouring peoples on their way to Assyria The second verse will suit perfectly well with the Assyrians, especially the words, A nation that meteth out, and treadeth down, whose land the rivers divide. In either case the denouement is the same: an interposition of Jehovah such that henceforward Ethiopia (or Assyria) will send embassies to Zion alone. — For the structure compare above, page 1531. After the situation has been realistically opened in verse, prose puts the Divine attitude: that of waiting without a sign of activity until the moment of doom has arrived. like a clear summer day that gives no sign of the tempest that is going to destroy the harvest.

xix. 1. In this prophecy, as elsewhere, I have suggested a cluster of 'Prophetic Sentences.' These are brief prophetic utterances, each complete in itself; there is usually some pointedness of expression that makes them Prophetic Epigrams, like the maxims and epigrams of Wisdom literature. (See pages 1460 and 1457.) They would be suitable for passing from mouth to mouth among the people; or they might, as in these two places, be gathered about a prophecy of another kind. In vii. 18 a confirmation of the general character of such sentences is seen in the fact that the second of them makes reference to Egypt as well as Assyria, though the whole situation in Book II is entirely independent of Egypt. This present prophecy describes a judgment on Egypt so great that the Egyptians would tremble before the people of Judah. It is natural to append to this extended prophecy a cluster of Sentences all putting with more or less of epigrammatic point, the idea of a future conversion of Egypt to the worship of Jehovah.

xix. 18. One shall be called, The city of Destruction. A play upon words, as between Heres (destruction, especially used of iconoclasm) and Kheres (the sun: a reference to Heliopolis).

xxi–xxxii. 14. An extremely interesting cluster of prophecies, bound into a unity by the underlying image of the Prophetic Watchman. This is one of the standing images of prophetic literature [compare below, chapter lii. 8, lxii. 6, etc.; Habakkuk ii. 1; Ezekiel iii. 17, xxxiii. 2; Psalm lxxxv. 8]: but here appears elevated into a pictorial groundwork for the whole group of oracles. The prophet stands sentinel on the eastern boundary of the holy land, peering into the darkness of futurity for signs of coming judgments. [Verse 6 of chapter xxi reads: The Lord said unto me, Go, set a watchman: but the general drift of the whole suggests that the prophet himself is conceived to be acting as watchman.]

The first oracle opens with realistic exclamations [here presented as verse] and the prophet's excitement at what his vision shows [in prose passages]: the exclamations include the Divine cries [indicated by double quotations marks] to the foes of Babylon to set on. Next comes, after the fashion of parenthetic prefaces (see above, page 1533), the explanation of the establishment of the prophet's watch-tower. The vision is continued as before, and the whole ends with the prophet's apostrophe to the Babylon which the God of his vision will thresh as the corn on the floor. The title to this first of the four prophecies is, The Oracle of the Wilderness of the Sea: the 'Sea' being, as often, used for the Tigris and Euphrates waters; while the opening words describe the vision as sweeping like a storm across the wilderness that separates the Euphrates region from the holy land.

The second title is, The Oracle of Silence (or Dumah). As I understand it, no further vision is seen; but the section is devoted to keeping before us the poetic image of the prophetic watch-tower. It is a morsel of dialogue: a voice from the border region (Seir) cries for tidings of the night; answer is made (as if in the watchman's formula) that there are no tidings; that the succession of day and night goes on without interruption: the seeker must inquire again.

The Oracle at Evening is simple. Realistic verses express the prophet's vision of a scattered host being relieved by the wandering tribes of Dedanites; then plain prose puts the prediction of such a scattering for the hosts of Kedar.

The Oracle of the Valley of Vision. This is an extremely difficult passage. But it is to be reckoned with the cluster of Watchman prophecies: the prophet stands on a tower, the 'valley of vision' is the region in which what he sees appears. The situation implied in the prophecy is not simply panic or defeat, but a defeat mistaken for a victory. What the prophet sees from his watch-tower is a city wholly given up to rejoicings over a victory of its troops in the field, whereas the prophet can see that instead of victory there has been disgraceful rout — Jerusalem's troops have not even been slain in battle but are bound without the bow, i.e. have fled without striking a blow. After this vision has been put in realistic exclamations [presented in my text as verse], a paragraph [of prose] follows as in the other prophecies of the group, conveying the prophet's distress at what he has seen. When the next paragraph is reached, the delusion that has held the city has suddenly vanished: he took away the covering of Judah: and now all is panic and hasty preparations for a siege. The final paragraph goes back in thought to the first sight of the vision: in that day the LORD was calling to mourning, and there had been nothing but feasting and joy! An unforgivable offence.

xxii. 15. Among these Dooms of the Nations is here found a personal denunciation of the treasurer Shebna, and an exaltation of Eliakim as his successor. But apparently Eliakim in the end proves unworthy, and a postscript denounces his nepotism. The mode in which this postscript is linked to what precedes is ingenious. In glorifying Eliakim the prophet had used the image of a 'nail in a sure place.' When Eliakim's fault is apparent, the image is carried on: that he hangs on this nail all the glory of his father's house, the offspring and the issue, until the nail that was fastened in a sure place gives way.

xxiii. 1. In the first two sections of this Doom prophecy the shock of Tyre's fall is being felt all over the mercantile world: Kittim (Cyprus), a half-way station, Tarshish (extreme west, coast of Spain), the region of the Nile on the south. The third section is more difficult. Pass through thy land as the Nile, O daughter of Tarshish, etc.: the suggestion seems to be of a restraint exercised by Tyre on the rest of the mercantile world (e.g. by imposts, etc.): this girdle is now removed, and distant merchants are as free as the Nile in days of inundation. — O thou oppressed virgin daughter of Zidon: the daughter of Zidon is an expression for Zidon (compare Jeremiah's daughter of my people for the people): she is pictured as a ravished virgin fleeing to Kittim, and further. — And her merchandise . . . shall be holiness to the LORD: in vain should Tyre recover her greatness, her riches in the end shall be conquered and become the consecrated spoil of Jehovah's people.

To this Book of Dooms of the Nations a magnificent climax is made in this Rhapsody (or dramatic vision) of a Judgment embracing the whole universe. There is no note of particular events or special peoples; but a Day of the LORD that falls upon the whole earth, except the Mountain of the LORD which stands out as a point of light amid a ruined world [compare Zechariah, chapter xiv], where a remnant (of Israel and of the Nations) enjoy a glorious salvation. The whole falls into three sections. As with the Rhapsody of Zion Redeemed, these sections are not successive in time like the acts of a drama, but present the same judgment in different aspects. In place of temporal succession we have the pendulum movement dear to Hebrew imagination, alternating between Judgment and Salvation. The first section presents a destruction covering the earth; in the second section heaven and earth are involved; the third section displays the judgment in its moment of crisis, and here the pendulum-like alternation quickens and intensifies. [See pages 1533–4.]

I. The destruction of the whole earth is brought out in snatches of vision alternating with the Voice of Prophecy, which comments upon and enlarges what the vision reveals. At last the 'remnant' is reached (grape gleanings when the vintage is done): voices of the Saved in antiphonal rejoicings from all over the world are recognised by the Doomed. [Voices from the West . . . from the East: when we recognise the sea or the isles of the sea as conventional expressions for the west, these titles are easily inferred from chapter xxvii. 14, 15, in the light of verse 16.]

II. In the second section the destruction embraces heaven as well as earth: the host of the high ones on high [stars] and the kings of the earth upon the earth. — After many days shall they be visited: the context makes this mean, not punishment followed by forgiveness, but impunity followed by visitation. — In place of merely voices of the Saved we now have complete Songs. [Two Songs have a structure of antistrophic inversion (4, 6; 6, 4 and 8, 6; 6, 8); the rest are in triplet stanzas.] — And in this mountain, etc. The centre of the rhapsody is the presentation of Mount Zion standing out from the universal destruction. And he will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering that is cast over all peoples: here the dark pall of destruction that has embraced the whole universe is suddenly rent for the holy mountain [compare the similar crisis in Joel, chapter iii. 14–16]; there follows at once the triumph of the Saved: He hath swallowed up death for ever, etc. — Moab shall be trodden down in his place: in the momentary reversion to judgment Moab is mentioned merely as one of the border peoples; from the holy mountain the Saved behold the destruction extending from the border nations to the darkness of the ruined world.

III. In place of stationary pictures, we now have the judgment presented in its progress: a crisis of doom is before us. The Prophetic Spectator can see the hand of God lifted while the Doomed are yet blind; in a moment the judgment has fallen, and the Doomed cry out too late; all this while the Saved have been preparing themselves for the crisis by repentance. In the other sections there has been a slow alternation between Judgment and Salvation: now there is a change from the one to the other with almost every speech. [This last consideration is important for interpretation. There is a tendency, for example, to connect The dead live not (verse 14 of chapter xxvi) with Thy dead shall live (verse 19): the arrangement in my text shows how the two refer to the Doomed and the Saved respectively.] — Hide thyself for a little moment until the indignation be overpast: compare again Joel, chapter iii. 14–16.— The LORD shall punish leviathan . . . he shall slay the dragon, etc. The reference to these monsters of nature is to convey how all heaven and earth is involved in the catastrophe. For the idea of these monsters compare notes to Job, page 1662.—Fury is not in me, etc., the idea is, that all foes of Jehovah have disappeared: were there any left they would be but briers and thorns before his consuming fire. — In measure, when thou sendest her away, thou dost contend with her; he hath removed her with his rough blast in the day of the east wind. Here the subject of the whole speech (the purging of the Saved contrasted with the destruction of the Doomed by the same judgment) is presented under the image of winnowing: the Saved are treated with the measured wind of the winnowing fan, the others are met with a tempest that blows them away into nothingness. [To a modern reader there is difficulty in the indiscriminate use of him, them, her: this is in accordance with the rugged abruptness of Hebrew poetry.] — The final paragraphs put the root idea of the rhapsody under the favourite prophetic images of boughs lopped and consumed, corn beaten out, a trumpet summoning the exiles home.

Book V

xxviii. 1. The four paragraphs of this discourse exhibit the favourite alternation between Judgment and Salvation. — The crown of pride of drunken Ephraim trodden down — a crown of glory for the residue. — But there are drunken rulers in Judah also, trusting to a refuge of lies instead of the sure foundation stone, "he that believeth shall not make haste": the scourge will sweep away their refuge of lies. — But for the patient comfort is imparted in agricultural images: the cruel plowing does not go on for ever, the gentle sowing comes; there are sharp threshing instruments [for the guilty], the gentle threshing with the rod for the precious cummin; and even the threshing is not to crush, but to make corn fit for bread.

xxxii. 9. In this brief discourse the change from judgment to restoration, which is such a feature of this book, is found in the middle of a sentence: until the spirit be poured upon us from on high.

xxxiii. 1. This is the first of the climax prophecies to Book V. As the glorious restoration has been the most prominent theme in what has preceded, so here we have a rhapsodic drama of Salvation. The prophet beholds in vision the interposition of God while the people are yet groaning under the yoke. When the last hope is gone (the ambassadors returning with peace denied them, and describing the desolation of the land through which they have travelled) God rises to save. The Sinners in Zion tremble at the purging fire which is saving them: for the Godly in Zion there is nothing but rejoicing. — Thine eyes shall see . . . thine heart shall muse: the Godly are addressing one another.

xxxiv. 1. A further climax: in the spirit of the whole book (above, page 1567) we have prophetic pictures of destruction covering the whole world, and an equally universal restoration. [The context shows that Edom is mentioned only as a typical foe: compare Joel (chapter iii. 19), where Egypt and Edom are similarly mentioned in what is obviously a universal destruction.] — The two pictures are linked by corresponding passages, each a parenthetic quintet, interrupting the pictorial description, which is afterwards resumed, with words emphasising the prophecy as a whole: Seek ye out of the book of the LORD and read [how all these woes shall come to pass]. . . . Strengthen ye the weak hands [with these glorious promises].

Book VI

xxxviii. 10. Hezekiah's Song. The structure of this song is interesting. It is a variety of antistrophic structure, by which six couplets (of despair) are balanced by six triplets (of triumph): there is the further peculiarity of a parenthetic refrain (outside the structure) augmenting gradually from I said until it reaches complete couplets:

Like a swallow or a crane, so did I chatter,
I did mourn as a dove.

For the augmenting refrain, compare David's Lament over Jonathan (pages 281, 1556).

Notes on the Rhapsody of Zion Redeemed

For the general idea of this poem, and of the 'rhapsody' as a form of literature, see Introduction, pages 1395–8, 1392–3.

For the seven divisions of this rhapsody see page 513. These seven parts are not successive in time like the acts of a drama (compare note on Isaiah xxiv–xxvii), but each is complete in itself. On the whole, the best name for them seems to be 'Visions': compare the use of this word in the general title for the Book of Isaiah, page 471.

Prelude

This Prelude, like the overture of many modern musical compositions, is a lyric anticipation or foreshadowing of the whole work. A word of comfort for Jerusalem is spoken by God, and voices are heard carrying the glad tidings on the way towards Jerusalem. The Voice in the desert suggests the return of the exiles across the desert which is the theme of the first Vision. The second and third Voices foreshadow the despondency of Zion and her relief which occur in the second Vision. The fourth Voice directly suggests the Awakening of Zion at the close of Vision three. And the structure of the fifth song is an epitome of the alternation between Jehovah's work of Judgment and Salvation with which the rhapsody closes.

Vision I

This lengthy Vision is an elaborate forensic scene, in which the Nations of the earth on the one hand, and Israel on the other side, are summoned before the bar of Jehovah to hear his 'counsel' in the matter of the triumphant career of Cyrus. Realistic touches keep the scene vividly before us all through. There is no personal speaker except Jehovah, but the dramatic effect is produced by alternating monologue: Jehovah turning alternately to the Nations and to Israel, with a total change of tone as he addresses the one or the other. [The divisions of the speeches are clear: but of course each party is addressed in the presence of the other, and hence there are in the middle of the speeches momentary turnings from the one to the other.] The monologue is interrupted at intervals by lyric outbursts of joy at the Divine tidings: these seem to be impersonal hymns, and not the words of any speaker (except the triumph song on page 521). The pendulum-like alternation is seven times repeated (compare above, page 1533): and each section has an individuality of its own.

Introduction. As the Prelude dramatically foreshadows the whole rhapsody, so we have here a prefatory discourse which is a summary of the spirit of Vision I. It has two paragraphs analogous to the alternating sections of the Vision: the one exalts Jehovah as against the idolatrous Nations, the other comforts desponding Israel.

Section i. The first section is occupied with the summons of the Nations and Israel to meet Jehovah in judgment. There is a brief suggestion of the panic of the assembling idolaters; and in contradistinction to this the way of approach for Israel will be smoothed by their God.

Keep silence: suggestive of a proclamation before a potentate (compare Habakkuk, chapter ii. 20; Psalm xlvi. 10).

O islands: the Grecian chain of islands is often used to express the extremity of the prophetic world.

Whom he calleth in righteousness to his foot. It is extremely important in studying prophetic literature to remember the double meaning in prophecy of the word righteousness: (1) our modern meaning, doing right; (2) the prophetic meaning, setting right, vindication, almost the equivalent of salvation. Here the word is used in the second sense. Compare (xli. 26): Who hath declared it . . . beforetime, that we may say; He is righteous (that is, vindicated by the event); again (page xlv. 8), Let the skies pour down righteousness, let the earth . . . bring forth salvation; (li. 5) My righteousness is near, my salvation is gone forth. There is a play upon the two meanings of the word in (lvi. 1): Keep ye judgement, and do righteousness: for my salvation is near to come, and my righteousness to be revealed.

The isles saw and feared, etc. (xli. 5) Very rarely in these rhapsodies a portion of the movement is described or announced, instead of being brought out in discourse and dialogue. Such passages are analogous to what in theatrical dramas are 'stage-directions' [these in modern dramas (e.g. those of Victor Hugo, Ibsen) include considerable pieces of action]. For other examples compare pages 505, 506, 534. The reader will note that such announcements of the action are printed in italic type (indented) when they are the words of Scripture; where they are explanations of my own they are marked off by square brackets.

Section ii. The two parties being now assembled, Jehovah challenges the Nations and their idols to produce their cause. The challenge is twice made without response: the idols are declared therefore to be vanity. — It is important to note that the point of Jehovah's challenge is not (as sometimes interpreted) the power to predict the triumph of Cyrus. Shew us things for to come is regularly combined with declare ye the former things, and what Jehovah claims for himself is a providential government of history: the career of Cyrus is the final touch that reveals the counsel of Jehovah from the beginning to the end of history. [What this is appears in the next speech.]

Jehovah turns to Israel. (1) He proclaims Israel to the Nations as Jehovah's Servant; (2) that his service is to bring judgment to the Nations, but without violence. [The application of A bruised reed shall he not break to Christ by St. Matthew is a secondary or mystic interpretation (compare above, page 1568): at this point of the rhapsody the 'Servant of Jehovah' is undoubtedly the nation of Israel.] (3) In the development of Jehovah's counsel as to his Servant a new wonder is to be told [here comes the outburst of joyful expectation]: the Servant of Jehovah is blind and deaf and hidden in prison houses, not understanding that this imprisonment among the nations is for his sins against his God; but these nations have gone beyond their intended purpose and been 'robbers'; now therefore the Maker of Israel will be his Redeemer, giving nations [Cyrus's conquests] as his price; the prison houses shall yield up the 'blind people that have eyes.'

Section iii. The third section is, to the Nations, an emphatic repetition of the former challenge. To Israel is promised a way of return [suggestive of the deliverance from Egypt: 'rivers in the wilderness'], and a moral analogy to this [compare I will pour my spirit upon thy seed . . . and they shall spring up among the grass, as willows by the watercourses].

Section iv. The fourth section is occupied with the authority of him who promises. The scorn of idols is interwoven with the antithesis between formed gods, and Jehovah the former of Israel, who is the promiser of this redemption.

Section v. In the fifth section not only the Nations in general but Cyrus in particular is addressed. Another idea appears (chapter xlv. 22), that Jehovah is the saviour of the ends of the earth as well as Israel. Another antithesis is made prominent, between the idols who are carried in procession [Bel boweth down over one beast, Nebo stoopeth over another], and Jehovah who carries his people from infancy to hoar hairs.

Section vi. This section opens with Israel's triumph over Babylon: then Jehovah addresses the Nations and in particular the Babylon that is to be overthrown. — The address to Israel is to the half-hearted of the nation, who will be 'refined, but not as silver.'

Section vii. The final section contains a brief summary of the commission to Cyrus to deliver Israel from Babylon, and the voice of Cyrus is heard responding. There is a brief address to Israel, followed by the cry to go forth from Babylon. With this this first Vision closes.

Page 523. There is no peace, saith the LORD, unto the wicked. In the case of this much-disputed sentence I am wholly unable to see any connection with the context. I have treated it as a pious ejaculation used to separate the sections of a long work: compare the doxologies separating the five books of Psalms.

Vision II

This Vision is wholly occupied by the 'Servant of Jehovah.' At the commencement this Servant of Jehovah is explicitly the nation Israel; though there may be an approach to idealisation in the fact that it is (the true) Israel rousing the (false) Israel to the Divine commission. At the close of Vision II there is such an approach to personality in the Servant of Jehovah as is implied in the conception of a suffering martyr.

The Vision seems to fall into three sections. — Section i. Jehovah's Servant meditates on his twofold mission (as given in the previous Vision): to the tribes of Jacob and to the Gentiles. — Section ii. Then clearly follows the ministry to Zion in the form of a dialogue of consolation. [Who hath begotten me these, etc.: the text of the R.V. actually reads, Then shalt thou say in thine heart, Who hath begotten me these. But as the spirit of the whole passage is a dialogue of consolation I have thought it within the scope of the mode of presenting here used to replace these words by the title Zion as speaker; compare such cases as Job took up his parable and said.] — Section iii. The third section I have headed as the Ministry to the Gentiles: though this is not quite clear. The strong emphasis in the first section on the double mission, and the clear confinement of ii to Zion, suggest that we should expect an appeal to the Gentiles here; and the words Who is among you that feareth the LORD fall in well with such an explanation. It comes as a confirmation of this that four times in this section we find the form of the name Jehovah represented in the R.V. by GOD [as distinguished from the LORD]: and there appears a tendency in the rhapsody as a whole to use this form of the Divine name in connection with outsiders, as LORD is the special name with God's own people. [The usage is clear in the examples in chapters xl. 10; xlviii. 16; xlix. 22; lii. 4; lvi. 8; lxv. 13, 15: less clear in those in chapters lxi. 1, 11: see note on these last passages, under Section v, page 1578.]

Vision III

This is made up of (i) Appeals of Jehovah, seconded by the Celestial Hosts, to Zion to awake. No response is made until (ii) the end: the Awakening of Zion, as the Watchmen of Zion [compare above, page 1571] catch the tidings of the Messengers [compare the Prologue], and waken slumbering Jerusalem. — Ye that bear the vessels of the Lord: for the prominence of this idea in Israelite conceptions of the Return from Exile compare Ezra viii. 24–36.

Vision IV

The Servant of Jehovah now appears as exalted: the exaltation consists in the recognition at last by the Chorus of Nations of a humiliation they had misinterpreted. There seems now a mystic personality attaching to 'Jehovah's Servant'; and the words of the choral song distinctly associate with that personality the idea of vicarious sufferings, a soul making an offering for sin, bearing the sins of many.

Vision V

Three Songs of Zion Exalted. The order of the Visions is noticeable: The Servant of Jehovah Awakened, Zion Awakened; the Servant of Jehovah Exalted, Zion Exalted. — i. Song of Zion as the Bride of Jehovah. For its structure compare above, page 1532. — ii. Zion the city of Beauty and Peace. Both these are apostrophes to Zion; in iii Zion is the speaker: for its structure compare above, page 1532. — And I will make an everlasting covenant with you, even the sure mercies of David: Zion is speaking, exercising her new authority to admit the Nations into the covenant of Jehovah's people with their God. In the words that immediately follow Jehovah recognises Zion as thus a witness to the peoples. — For my thoughts are not your thoughts, etc.: see above, page 1532.

Vision VI

This is the most difficult portion of the rhapsody. Its general subject is clear: Redemption at work in Zion. It must be remembered that the seven Visions are not to be regarded as successive in time. Each is complete in itself; in the present case redemption is fully presented from its earliest stage; nor is there any limitation to particular epochs of history. There is only a logical sequence in the successive Visions: Deliverance — Awakening — Redemption [spiritual purification in preparation for] — Judgment (the final separation of Good and Evil). The movement of this sixth Vision again is not difficult to follow. The main obscurity is the question, who is the leading speaker. This will best be considered in the successive sections of which the Vision is made up.

Introduction. As in Vision I, we have a prefatory discourse before the dramatic movement begins. The body of Vision VI being occupied with redemption in Zion, this Introduction is careful to premise that outsiders — strangers and eunuchs (excluded by the old Law) — may by 'righteousness' be subjects of the 'righteousness' which is to be revealed. [For the word righteousness, compare note to Section i, page 1575.]

Section i. The first stage of the movement is a Struggle with Sin and Error. Who is the speaker here? — (1) Not Jehovah: two of the cries of encouragement that come to the speaker (page 533) are from Him. — (2) Is it the 'Servant of Jehovah,' who has held such a leading position in Visions II and IV? It is noticeable that the term never occurs after Vision IV [of course the plural 'servants' occurs often, but in no special sense]. It may be open to theology to argue on independent grounds for the identity of the speaker of this section with the Servant, but the primary and literary interpretation does not give sufficient indication of this. — (3) Is the speaker the same as in section v of this Vision, to whom I have given the title 'The Redeemer'? The words of section iii seem distinctly a turning point in the movement of the Vision, and they promise a Redeemer to Zion; moreover, the opening of section v reads like a person announcing himself: there seems then great difficulty in understanding such a personage to be present in this earlier stage. — (4) It seems then that the Presence here struggling for the redemption of Zion is something left obscure and undefined; and I have therefore fallen back upon the 'Voice of Prophecy,' that appears speaking on behalf of God so often in dramatic prophecies.

Chapter lvii. 9. And thou wentest to the king with ointment. . . . thou wast wearied with the length of thy way, etc. Three things are denounced: open sin — then (in this passage) the seeking other refuge than Jehovah, in pursuit of which the people maintained hope amid weariness, whereas of Jehovah they despaired without a struggle — thirdly (from lviii. 2) formalism.

Section ii. At last an effect is produced: and the appeal is answered by Repentant Israel (a common speaker in the dialogues of Jeremiah and Hosea).

Section iii. Following upon this repentance we have the interposition of Jehovah as a turning point to the Vision: the redemption is begun, and a Redeemer shall come to Zion. — For the direct announcement of the movement here, compare above, note to xli. 5: there is a similar case at the centre of the Rhapsody of Joel (chapter ii. 18).

Section iv. An elaborate lyric Song, celebrating Zion in its complete redemption. — The successive stages of the song commence with couplets introducing a thought expanded in quatrains (or sextets occasionally). (1) Dawn out of darkness. (2) Nations flocking to the light, bringing the exiles to their Zion. (3) Ships like doves flocking to their windows bring the wealth of the nations as tribute. (4) The City of the LORD. (5) There is a climax in the conception of a light that never sets.

Section v. The last section introduces the presence of the Redeemer in Zion. Here again there seems insufficient evidence as to the personality, whether to be identified with the 'Servant of Jehovah' in another stage of idealisation, or some independent presence. In the literary interpretation the name must be left undefined. — The spirit of the Lord GOD is upon me. Compare above, note to section iii of Vision I on page 1576. It is not easy to see why this form of the Divine name appears here and again on the following page. It may be observed, however, that in both cases the two names LORD and GOD are used in close association: perhaps this is a reflection of the spirit of the whole Vision, which includes strangers with the original people of God in the redemption worked in Zion.

Chapter lxii. 10. Prepare ye the way of the people . . . lift up an ensign for the peoples. The close of this Vision is the immediate expectation of the promised return of exiles and gathering in of the Nations. The watchmen are smoothing the road for the inhabitants of Zion to go forth and meet their guests, and setting up waymarks to guide the newcomers to their destination.

Vision VII

The main thought of Hebrew wisdom and prophecy is judgment: the vindication of good and fall of evil. This is here presented in two pictures: A Vision of Judgment on the Nations; a Dramatic Scene of Judgment in Zion. — It will be noticed that this and the preceding Vision are independent of one another: the situation at the close of VI is not the situation at the beginning of VII: each Vision is complete in itself.

Section i. The use made of the 'Chorus of Watchmen' here is precisely that made of the Prophetic Watchman in chapter xxi. As Seir appears there for the border region nigh the prophetic watch-tower, so here Edom and Bozrah are similarly used. — The close of this section evidently echoes the language of section iii of the previous Vision: this implies that it is Jehovah himself who descends in judgment.

Section ii. For the pendulum-like alternation between Judgment and Salvation, see above, pages 1533–4.

Chapter lxvi. 1. What manner of house will ye build unto me? The relevance of this passage is best explained by comparing the words of Repentant Israel (lxiv. 11) as to the destruction of the holy and beautiful house. Jehovah proclaims that his dwelling is alike in heaven and in the humble heart.

Page 541. Confused cries, etc. There is clearly an interruption here to the alternating monologue. It seems to consist of cries wrung out by the wonders of destruction and salvation; the first are merely irregular cries, the others regular stanzas of glad surprise that the mighty promises of a restored nation should be fulfilled at a stroke.

Notes to Jeremiah

For the book as a whole see Introduction, pages 1398–1402.

Book I

i. 18. The last paragraph is of the nature of an epilogue: it recurs in general substance (though very much varied in details) at the end of other prophecies, at vi. 27 and xv. 20.

Chapters ii – vi

This is the most elaborate of the literary compositions of Jeremiah. I have entitled it The Prophet's Manifesto: as containing his prophetic message in all its fulness. In form it is a rhapsody, or spiritual drama [compare note above, pages 1392–3], but while all literary forms are fused together in a rhapsody, the form of discourse has greater preponderance in this than in other rhapsodies. The whole falls into seven sections. — I. The first is made up wholly of God's pleadings with unfaithful Judah: artistically, it is made remarkable by a tour de force of imagery [see note below]. — II. The second section holds up to Judah the example of Israel [that is, northern Israel: Jeremiah's usage of 'Israel' applies it sometimes to the northern kingdom only, at other times to the chosen people as a whole, now represented by Judah alone]. The close of the section dramatically presents this backsliding Israel repentant and accepted. — III. All the remaining sections are made up of the Divine word of remonstrance to Judah, and the judgment on Judah which with each section advances nearer. In this third section we have merely warnings: the Divine threats are in the future tense, and the scene dramatically presented is that of voices from a distance giving information of a coming foe, or panic terror at some unknown future. — IV. We now have a description of total destruction, but it is in a vision only: between the fragments of the poet's vision God is applying the judgment to the erring people. — V. At the last moment there is such an arrest of judgment as Abraham obtained for Sodom, arrest conditional upon finding one just man: the prophet seeks in vain. — VI. With the sixth section the command is given to the enemy to go up, but not make a full end: take away her branches. This moment's respite is used for fresh remonstrances from God. The panic of the people now suggests an enemy drawing nearer and nearer: they have started at noon, by dusk they are just upon the city. Yet the last word of the section is a cry Be thou instructed. — VII. In the last section all arrest of judgment is abandoned: the very remnant is to be gleaned, and the panic-struck people find the sword of the enemy in every way. — The Epilogue is personal to the prophet: compare i. 18 and xv. 20.

ii. 13. For my people have committed two evils, etc. From this point there is a remarkable heaping together of the most widely sundered images, for the purpose of expressing the unfaithfulness or misery of the chosen people: cisterns (and broken cisterns) as contrasted with living fountains — the born slave as contrasted with the free son — destruction by the lions [of Egypt] — the trained beast breaking the yoke — the wife playing harlot on every green hill — the noble vine degenerated into wildness — the vain washing with soap — the dromedary traversing her ways [flinging herself hither and thither in her heat as contrasted with going straight for her destination] — the wilderness ass refusing the tamer — the ass scenting after her mates [instead of waiting to be approached] — the rutting season. — Withhold thy foot from being unshod: cease bringing thyself into disgrace. As the voluntary removing of the shoe was a sign of reverence, so its forcible removal by others was the deepest disgrace: compare Deuteronomy, chapter xxv. 9.

ii. 34. I have not found it at the place of breaking in: blood found in the close neighbourhood of a broken wall was understood as shed in resisting the thief. Compare Exodus, chapter xxii. 2.

iii. 19. But I said, How shall I put thee among the children? The Divine speaker goes back to the time of calling Israel as his chosen nation: the call was conditional.

Book II

viii. 4. Discourse merging in rhapsodic dialogue: other examples in Book II. The dialogue presents a vain repentance: a voice heard from the far land of captivity. — Is there no balm in Gilead? Compare xxii. 6 for the use of Gilead as a type of fertility.

ix. 23–x. 16. These are prophetic 'sentences,' or epigrams: short utterances, complete in themselves, and suitable for passing from mouth to mouth. Many of these would belong to the great floating literature of oral prophecy, and would be used by prophetic authors in connection with their own compositions. (Compare page 1567, note on Isaiah ii. 1.) Hence the recurrence of the same 'sentence,' more or less varied, in different writings of the same or of different prophets. The first sentence on idolatry is worked up into more than one section of the Rhapsody of Zion Redeemed. Clusters of such sentences are found in connection with longer prophecies, just as in the Wisdom books strings of isolated sayings separate longer essays. Compare Ecclesiasticus and Ecclesiastes in various places.— He hath made the earth by his power, etc. This sentence recurs in the Doom of Babylon (li. 15, page 604). There I have presented it as verse, here as prose: in each case the parallelism is made harmonious with the parallelism of the context. [For the principles of such arrangement see Note on Prose and Verse, page 1530.]

Book III

This group of discourses is unified by the idea of a Missionary Journey, to preach 'the Covenant' in the cities of Judah. It must be remembered that the discovery of the roll of the law in Josiah's reign took place some five years after the date of Jeremiah's call to the prophetic office. The Deuteronomic matter that was the whole or part of this newly discovered roll profoundly affected the devout of Israel, both immediately and ever afterwards. It is this Deuteronomic Covenant that Jeremiah sets out to preach. The sections of this third book put successively: first, the commission to preach the Covenant in the cities; secondly, Judah's rejection of it; thirdly, the persecution of the preacher in his own city of Anathoth, with the reflections that this gives rise to; fourthly, sentences, epigrammatically conveying the hopeless state of the Lord's heritage; then (finally), the causes of this national unfaithfulness are found in the infection of surrounding idolatrous nations, and the general pride of people and rulers.

xii. 9. Is mine heritage unto me as a speckled bird of prey? The idea is of a carrion bird sick herself, and other carrion birds waiting around to devour: the whole suggestive of corrupt Judah surrounded by corrupt idolatrous peoples.

xii. 9. Go ye, assemble all the beasts of the field: evidently the same sentence of floating prophecy (above, note to ix. 23) underlies this and Vision VI of Zion Redeemed (Isaiah lvi. 9).

xiii. 6. Go to Euphrates. It seems to me an impossibility to understand this (as many commentators do) of the river Euphrates: such a journey is obviously incompatible with the Emblem prophecy described. Either there was some village so called near at hand, or some marshy part of Jerusalem nicknamed Euphrates; or else some less important name has been attracted into the well-known name of the great river. [Several places have been suggested, in which the change of letters or pointing would be slight.]

xiv–xv. A Rhapsody of the Drought. This portion of Jeremiah (chapters xiv and xv) is usually interpreted as a Dialogue of Intercession, with no speakers except God and the Prophet. No explanation of the chapters is entirely without difficulty; but the form adopted in the text seems to me the least difficult, and by far the most beautiful interpretation. (1) A great objection to other views is the conclusion: it seems impossible, without straining, to make the prophet guilty of any fault (mistrust, etc., is suggested) of which he should be invited to repent. Nor is it easy to see why the Prophet should speak the words, O Lord, thou knowest: remember me, etc. (chapter xv. 15–18), after the full assurance given him just before: Verily I will strengthen thee for good (xv. 11). Further, the Divine reply, If thou return, then will I bring thee again . . . and if thou take forth the precious from the vile, etc. (chapter xv. 19), seems a natural reference to the 'purged remnant' which throughout prophetic literature is the only portion of the nation to be saved. No doubt verses 20, 21 of chapter xv refer to Jeremiah; but they are outside the rhapsody, being an epilogue added to this as to other important prophecies (compare i. 18 and vi. 27). (2) In the two first speeches which I assign to the Repentant People (chapter xiv. 7–9, 19–22) the plural is uniformly used: and the descriptive passage opening the rhapsody has prepared us to hear Judah mourning. It is true that in the third speech assigned to the People (chapter xv. 15–18) the singular is used; but that speech immediately follows a speech of God (verses 12–14) in which the singular is used, and which undoubtedly is addressed to the People and not to the Prophet. (3) The ordinary view ignores the marked distinction between "The LORD said unto me" in chapter xiv. 11 (contrast verse 10) and chapter xiv. 14 (compare 17) and chapter xv. 1, as compared with the usual formula, "The LORD said," in chapter xv. 11 (and 19). This suggests a beautiful dramatic effect [brought out in the text by the indications of the speakers]: God refuses at first so much as to answer the sinful People, but speaks only through the Prophet; at last he answers the People directly, but only to threaten; finally he shows mercy to the repentant remnant.

xvi. 16. I will send for many fishers, etc. On the whole, the order of sentences favours the idea that the images of fishing and hunting are to be understood of the salvation of Israel, the bringing the exiles out of the obscure regions in which they have been scattered. The Lord goes on to say that he is equally diligent to inquire after their sins: and the recompence of iniquity shall come first.

xvii. 3. O my mountain in the field: compare a similar expression applied in xviii. 14 to Lebanon: the idea seems to be that of standing out from what is adjacent.

xviii. 14. Shall the snow of Lebanon fail, etc. These are images for the unnatural conduct of Israel: snow may be expected to melt from the field, but not from the rock [Lebanon is the 'white mountain']; the short summer streams may dry up, but not the long rivers.

xx. 7. Two meditations to exemplify opposite frames of mind in the midst of persecution. The first has the dramatic change so common in the psalms. The resemblance of the second to the Curse in Job suggests that both are founded on some wail of floating poetry.

Book VI

xxii. 10–29. For the structure compare the Doom Songs (see note to Book X).

xxiii. 33–40. Apparently the word Burden is specialised to the actual Divine message, as distinct from the hortatory matter of the prophet in which it would be merged.

Book VII

xxv. 1. The Cup of the LORD's Fury. This prophecy is suggestive of an introduction to the Dooms of the Nations: and the Septuagint accordingly places these (Book X of the present, or Hebrew, arrangement) immediately after this section. On the whole, the order of the Hebrew version seems the more probable. The enumeration of the nations has no conformity with the contents of Book X. These are introduced here for a different purpose; the peoples are imagined as hesitating to drink; they are reminded, I begin to work evil at the city which is called by my name, and should ye be utterly unpunished? This indirect mode of emphasising the destruction of Jerusalem is rhetorically very powerful.

xxv. 26. The king of Sheshach shall drink after them. I transcribe Mr. Streane's note: "Sheshach is rather = Babel (Babylon) in accordance with a secret (Kabalistic) system of writing dating from an unknown antiquity among the Jews. This system took different forms, of which this (called Atbash) consists in substituting the last letter of the Heb. alphabet for the first, the last but one for the second and so on. Sh Sh Ch will, on this principle, take the places of B B L. This is confirmed by li. 41, where the Heb. (Le B Ka Ma Y) for 'the midst of them that rise up against me' becomes, when thus transmuted, Ca S D I M = Chaldeans, which is the actual rendering of the Septuagint. They however omit the whole clause in the present passage, and the word Sheshach in li. 41. If that word be intended to be significant in itself as well and not to be merely a transmutation of Babel, it will mean either (i) a mass of people or buildings, or (ii) a sinking, downfall, in which case li. 64 will contain an allusion to this name."

Book VIII

Preface. I understand this as a preface only to Book VIII — the Restoration Prophecies. They are made into a special book to stand as a witness for Jeremiah when the restoration shall take place. Jeremiah is fond of this conception of the 'sign of the prophet'*: compare xliii. 8 and xliv. 29.

xxx. 5. This prophecy is in the 'pendulum form': the paragraphs alternately treat judgment and restoration. (Compare above, page 1533.)

xxxi. 15. A voice is heard in Ramah. God is the speaker to the end: the form is that of the alternating monologue.

xxxi. 22. A woman shall encompass a man. The only point in this expression is the reversal of what is natural.

* On the 'sign of the prophet' compare my Literary Study of the Bible, page 378.

xxxi. 26. I awaked and beheld, and my sleep was sweet unto me. This does not mean that the prophet received the message in his sleep, and that when he awoke that sleep seemed to sweet to him; but that in his dream he seemed to awake to a vision, and at the sight of that vision he felt pleasure, even in his sleep. For a similar expression compare Zechariah, chapter iv. 1.

Book X

The structure of these Dooms for the most part follows the form already discussed fully in the notes to Isaiah, pages 1531–2. The actual Divine word of denunciation or threat has a form here represented by prose: this is accompanied or interrupted by (impersonal) lyrics, celebrating, or realising, or in some way dwelling upon the matter of the Divine word.

xlvi. 2. This is different from most of the Doom Songs. It is a Ballad on the Battle of Carchemish: one of the 'decisive battles' of history, by which the question of supremacy between the two empires in which the Israelitish world terminated — Babylon and Egypt — was finally determined in favour of Babylon. [Its structure is that of triplet stanzas with duplications.]

xlvi. 16. Arise, and let us go again to our own people: it is the mercenary troops of Egypt who speak. — Pharaoh king of Egypt is but a noise, etc.: he has ceased to be anything but a name, his fated time is passed. — Like Tabor among the mountains, and like Carmel by the sea, so shall he come. The he is the he with which the preceding stanza commenced. The prominence of mountains amid their surroundings is made an image for the certainty of this event as compared with other events.

xlviii. 1. For the whole compare Isaiah xv. 1, and for the latter part the ballads quoted in Numbers (pages 140, 141). This comparison makes an excellent study for the floating Doom poetry worked up by different poets in different forms.

xlviii. 47. Yet will I bring again the captivity of Moab. For similar postscripts compare Isaiah, pages 490, 495, 497; and in Jeremiah, pages 598, 600.

xlix. 7. Compare Obadiah: here again is a good example of floating Doom poetry worked up by different poets.

xlix. 23. The effect here is the realistic vision of overthrow preceding the cause of that overthrow in Jehovah's coming to judge [at the words How is the city of praise not forsaken?]. Compare the Watchman prophecies of Isaiah (xxi. 1), and notes on pages 1571 and 1532.

xlix. 28. Here again we have a resemblance to the Watchman prophecies of Isaiah (see previous note): Divine cries of onset alternate with prophetic description.

l-li: Doom of Babylon

This Doom of Babylon is the most elaborate of all Doom Prophecies. It has the usual structure of alternation between [prose] Divine word of denunciation and lyric songs of realisation. But it has in addition to this a sectional structure: seven distinct sections, the middle or climax section having itself a sevenfold structure by distinct images applied to Babylon and elaborated. The spirit of the whole is purely lyric, there being no dramatic progression of movement; thus the realistic lyrics bring forward the theme of the attack on Babylon and its fall with wonderful variety, but not in any temporal order of incident. [One of these lyrics exalts God as against the idols; another is a wailing dialogue of suffering Zion and Jerusalem; a third presents the delivered exiles remembering their wrongs.] There is in place of dramatic movement a parallelism and correspondence of sections, thus:

I. Judgment on Bel — Israel just delivered and inquiring the way to Zion.	V. Judgment on Bel — the bringing out of the lion's mouth that he hath swallowed up.
II. God's people as sheep devoured by the nations.	VI. The people of Israel delivered and remembering their wrongs.
III. The idea of recompence.	VII. The idea of recompence.

IV. Sevenfold image: the Sword — the Drought — the Destroying Wind — the Cankerworm — the Battleaxe — the Destroying Mountain — the Threshing Floor.

li. 1 and 41. Leb-kamai, Sheshach. See note on xxv. 26.

Appendix

This is shown to be an appendix by the words that precede: Thus far are the words of Jeremiah. It is identical with the corresponding portions of the Book of Kings, and deals with the fall of the kings of Judah, not with the personal history of Jeremiah.

Notes to Ezekiel

For the book as a whole see Introduction, page 1402.

Book I

i–iii. For the Vision of Ezekiel, and the threefold commission of his Call, see Introduction, pages 1409–11.

iii. 22. The Opening of the Mouth. The interpretation of this followed above (Introduction, page 1411) is different from that usually given (e.g. by Davidson, Driver).

The usual view is that the 'dumbness' is a restraint of prophecy, such as confinement to the prophet's house, the result of failure through the rebellious spirit of the people; and the 'opening of the mouth' is the cessation of that restraint upon the fall of Jerusalem and its confirmation of Ezekiel's position. It must be observed that (1) there is not a word of support in the text for the idea that Ezekiel exercised his ministry before the divine word of this section iii; (2) no difference in kind can be traced between his mode of ministry before and after the fall of the city. This interpretation would never be suggested except in view of two passages cited below.

The interpretation here followed is that alike the 'dumbness' and the 'opening of the mouth' attach to Ezekiel's ministry throughout, and are not distinctive of different periods. He is in this, the third phase of his Call, commanded to forego the public life of the popular prophets — > shut thyself within thine house . . . behold, they shall lay bands upon thee, and shall bind thee with them, and thou shalt not go out among them — and wait in his house for the people who are in earnest to visit him there; and even then he is to wait as one dumb for a moment of inspiration — > and I will make thy tongue cleave to the roof of thy mouth, that thou shalt be dumb . . . but when I speak with thee, I will open thy mouth, and thou shalt say unto them, etc.

This is in accordance with all that appears in the record: we repeatedly find deputations of the people thus waiting in the prophet's house for the inspiration to come. [Compare viii. 1, xiv. 1, xx. 1. The words in xxiv. 18 —

> So I spake unto the people in the morning, and at even my wife died: and I did in the morning as I was commanded — suggest strongly that such deputations would visit the prophet's house every morning; and again the words of xxxiii. 31 —

> And they [the children of thy people] come unto thee as the people cometh, etc. —

suggest habitual gatherings.] On the other hand, there is no trace of Ezekiel exercising his office in public like the other prophets. [For the single apparent exception see note to xii. 1.]

The two passages which have lent support to the other interpretation are as follows.

> And thou, son of man, shall it not be in the day when I take from them their strength, the joy of their glory, the desire of their eyes, and that whereupon they set their heart, their sons and their daughters, that in that day he that escapeth shall come unto thee, to cause thee to hear it with thine ears? In that day shall thy mouth be open to him which is escaped, and thou shalt speak, and be no more dumb: so shalt thou be a sign unto them. (xxiv. 25.)

The other passage belongs to what really succeeds immediately, though Book VI (of the Dooms of the Nations) interposes.

> And it came to pass in the twelfth year of our captivity, in the tenth month, in the fifth day of the month, that one that had escaped out of Jerusalem came unto me, saying, The city is smitten. Now the hand of the LORD had been upon me in the evening, afore he that escaped came; and he had opened my mouth, until he came to me in the morning; and my mouth was opened, and I was no more dumb. (xxxiii. 21.)

The point of these two passages has been understood to be that this fall of Jerusalem, and its announcement to Ezekiel, was to be the occasion of removing a 'dumbness' that had lasted for the period of the preceding prophecies. The sense is rather that this, like all other occasions of Ezekiel's ministry, had the regular characteristics of a 'dumbness,' or period of waiting for the inspiration, and an 'opening of the mouth' when the inspiration came. The 'dumbness' in this case took the form of mourning in silence (the whole subject of this prophecy, "Woe beyond mourning"); and free speech followed with the confirmation of the event. The first of the two passages promises that the tidings shall come to Ezekiel himself; the second records, not only their arrival, but also how the prophet divined their coming and broke out with inspired speech hours before the arrival of the messenger. As confirmation of this interpretation compare the similar expression (xxix. 21): In that day [a reference to a prophecy against Egypt] . . . I will give thee the opening of the mouth in the midst of them. Compare also the concluding words of the first passage, So shalt thou be a sign unto them: which clearly refer to the previous words (xxiv. 24), Thus shall Ezekiel be unto you a sign: this absolutely connects the opening of the mouth, etc., of this passage with the particular emblem of the prophecy xxiv. 15–27, the silent grief and the change to speech.

iv. 1. For the emblematic action see Introduction, pages 1403–4.

vii. 10. The rod hath blossomed: in the sense of the English colloquialism, 'Hemp has been sown for thee.'

vii. 20. As for the beauty of his ornament, he set it in majesty: the general sense of the passage is: silver and gold have been made beautiful for the service of the temple, but they have been abused, etc. Compare Hosea, chapter ii. 8. — Make the chain: the expression is abrupt, but the only meaning can be a threat of captivity.

viii. 1. Compare Introduction, pages 1405, 1411.

viii. 17. They put the branch to their nose: either (1) veil their faces as part of the ceremony, or (2) a proverb of mockery. The LXX understands the latter.

xi. 3. This city is the caldron, and we be the flesh. Compare Introduction, page 1407.

Book II

xii. 1. Compare Introduction, page 1404. The emblematic action of this prophecy raises a difficulty. At first sight it appears an exception to all the indications in the rest of Ezekiel, that his prophecies were delivered only in his own house. (Compare note to iii. 22.) But careful study will show that this prophecy is no exception.

The general notion of the whole is clear: Ezekiel is to handle household stuff as if he were one of the besieged intending to quit Jerusalem, and then, as if in an accession of panic, to symbolise stealing away by night. No difficulty arises about the expression, I digged through the wall with mine hand. This is obviously a mere symbolic action, which could just as well be performed within doors as without. The suggestion that the prophet was actually seen making a hole through the wall of his house, and coming outside, is not only discredited by the phrase with my hand, but further lacks symbolic point: the exiles would dig through the walls of the city, not of their own houses. The difficulty rather lies in these words: —

> In the even I digged through the wall with mine hand; I brought it forth in the dark . . . and in the morning came the word of the LORD unto me, etc.

Certainly this seems at first sight to suggest some action outside the house at night which attracts attention, and which is explained in the morning. All the same, I believe a careful study of the whole passage by one familiar with Ezekiel's mode of speech will lead to the view that the whole is within the emblematic action of the usual morning prophecy in Ezekiel's own house. That there is nothing improbable in the suggestion that the 'night' and 'morning' are parts of the graphically suggested scene will be granted by those who have noted how intimately Ezekiel mingles the language of the outer symbol with that of reality (compare xliii. 3: the vision which I saw when I came to destroy the city). That this is not only possible, but the necessary interpretation, appears from such expressions as these: — > carry it forth in the dark; thou shalt cover thy face that thou see not the ground: for I have set thee for a sign unto the house of Israel.

No meaning can be attached to the covering of the face except that it is a conventional symbol to suggest that the action is to be understood as taking place by night: the removing of the covering would suggest the end of the night of panic, and symbol there gives place to speech. This interpretation is further confirmed by the application of the parable: —

> And the prince . . . shall bear upon his shoulder in the dark . . . he shall cover his face, because he shall not see the ground with his eyes.

So closely are intermixed the emblematic and the reality signified: he [the prophet personating the fugitive prince] shall cover his face, because he [the real prince] shall [because of night] not see the ground with his eyes.

xii. 17. For this and two following prophecies compare Introduction, page 1411.

xiii–xiv. Compare Introduction, page 1411.

xiii. 4. Like foxes in the waste places; so many busy vermin swarming over a ruined state. There is probably some proverbial expression connecting foxes with ruins, hence Tobiah's saying (Nehemiah, chapter iv. 3).

xiii. 18. Sew pillows upon all elbows: evidently body charms, the exact details of which are not known.

Book III

For each of the prophecies of this book compare Introduction, pages 1411–2.

xvi. 3. Thy birth and thy nativity is of the land of the Canaanite: though this might be construed literally of the city Jerusalem, yet the words would better be made part of the parable: Thou wast on a par with the heathen until I called thee. Compare the naming of Samaria and Sodom as elder and younger sisters in the following prophecy.

xvii. 1. Introduction, page 1405. Of course, an element entering into the allegory is that Babylon and Egypt, the eagles in question, are represented by rivers, Euphrates and Nile: hence the detail of the cedar that its branches turned toward him and the roots thereof were under him; and again: shot forth its branches toward him, from the beds of its plantation, that he might water it. The representation of political proclivities by roots feeling their way toward the waters is a powerful image.

xix. Compare Introduction, page 1412. The well-marked wailing rhythm of Hebrew verse has not been attempted by the Revisers; Davidson traces it only about half through the first of the two prophecies. This is only what might be expected: the rhythm was extemporised as part of the emblematic accessories in the oral delivery: the written record need do no more than suggest it. Compare the end of the chapter: this is a lamentation, and shall be for a lamentation (i.e. in its oral form).

Book IV

For the book as a whole see Introduction, page 1412.

xx. 25. Moreover also I gave them statutes that were not good, etc. The structure of this discourse is regular: in successive phases God is represented as 'lifting up his hand' to punish, but relaxing into a milder punishment. The sentence preceding the above words opens: Moreover I lifted up mine hand unto them in the wilderness, that I would scatter them among the nations, etc.; this purpose has not been carried out, except thus far, that they have been left to adopt evil statutes and customs that would eventuate in slavery to the nations. I gave them, etc., is an expression of the same order as the Lord hardening Pharaoh's heart: all that omnipotence permits is spoken of as being done by omnipotence. Compare Story of Micaiah, page 1380.

Book V

xxi. This is fully explained in Introduction, pages 1405–7.

xxi. 23. It shall be unto them as a vain divination in their sight, which have sworn oaths unto them. The inhabitants of Jerusalem are confident they shall escape because of their treaty with Babylon: forgetting, until the advent of the conqueror reminds them, how they have treacherously violated that treaty.

xxi. 30. Cause it to return into its sheath. The words are addressed by God to the prophet in reference to the sword used as emblem. Compare Introduction, pages 1406–7.

xxii–xxiii. Compare Introduction, page 1412.

xxiii. 14. She saw men pourtrayed upon the wall . . . and as soon as she saw them she doted upon them. Travellers saw the wall pictures of the Chaldeans and brought the rumour of them to Jerusalem: she loved upon rumour.

xxiv. 1. This is fully discussed in Introduction, page 1407.

Book VI

xxv. 1. The parallelism of the four paragraphs makes this a single prophecy — a cluster of Dooms.

xxvi, xxvii. Compare Introduction, pages 1412–3.

xxviii. 1. Though the detailed language is full of difficulties, owing to disorder of the original text, yet the general sense is not difficult. The underlying image is that of a Guardian Cherub of Eden: and the whole is founded upon some (lost) tradition of the fall of such a Guardian Spirit. The idea is of obvious application to the prince or guardian of the fairest of all cities.

xxviii. 12. Thou sealest up the sum: thou art the sealer up or guardian of that [Tyre] which is the sum of all wisdom and beauty. — Every precious stone was thy covering: as the word translated covering does not occur elsewhere, its meaning must be largely determined by the context. The previous expression sealest up the sum suggests as the meaning for covering (namely, what thou coverest) the contents of Eden (or Tyre). — The workmanship of thy tabrets and of thy pipes was in thee: this is enumerated as part of the riches [of Tyre] guarded by the prince. — Thou wast the anointed cherub that covereth: the immediate context, I set thee . . . upon the holy mountain of God, favours the view that this still relates to the covering or guardian cherub of Eden, not to the cherubs covering the ark. — In the midst of the stones of fire: either (1) the precious stones before enumerated as the treasure guarded, as if the cherub-prince walked in a realm of brilliance; or (2) there is some allusion to the sword [of fire] which turned every way to guard the Tree of Life in the Story of Eden, stones in this case being a metaphorical expression for flash or glitter. — I brought forth a fire from the midst of thee, it hath devoured thee: a fiery being [a general O.T. conception for supernatural personages] consumed by his own fire

xxix. 21. I will give thee the opening of the mouth in the midst of them: see above, page 1583.

xxxii. 1. The Dragon of the Seas. As to the primitive conception of the sea monster and its connection with eclipses see page 1662. Apparently, however, the words when I shall distinguish thee are addressed to the land of Egypt, though in the parable Egypt should be the dragon which extinguishes the lights. The popular fancies simply serve as links between the one set of images and the other.

xxxii. 17. A wail for Egypt. By common consent the text of Ezekiel at this point is in confusion. There is just enough to enable us to catch the principle of this weird dirge, though the details continually conflict with it. It is a mingling of recitative and rhythmic short lines, the former enumerating the inhabitants of the underworld, the latter serving as a sort of refrain. Apparently, in spite of the date introduction, the concluding lines of the preceding prophecy lead up to this (xxxii. 16): the recitative may be supposed to be spoken by the prophet, the refrain chanted by the 'daughters of the nations.' — Wail for the multitude of Egypt and cast them down: i.e. celebrate their going down.

Book VII

xxxiii. 1. Compare Introduction, page 1413.

xxxiii. 31. And they come unto thee as the people cometh: see note above, page 1583.

xxxiv–xxxvii. For each prophecy compare Introduction page 1413.

xxxviii. 1. Introduction, pages 1405 and 1413. Though attempts have been made to identify all the various peoples enumerated, yet the suggestion is simply that they are typical of a very distant power, outside even the world of which Babylon is the dominant force. The typical commercial nations (Sheba, Dedan, Tarshish) accompany as camp followers.

xxxix. 15. Till the buriers have buried it in the valley of Hamon-gog. And Hamonah shall also be the name of a city. As if to say, Valleys and cities shall be named from this overthrow (Hamon-gog is Multitude of Gog).

xl–xlviii. Introduction, pages 1405 and 1413. The main point of this elaborate prophecy is that it is a revelation of the New Jerusalem and its land, analogous to the older revelation in the mount to Moses. Hence both the minuteness of the details for the Temple, like those of Moses for the Tabernacle, and also the prominence of the divine glory as part of the vision. An analysis of this would hardly be within the scope of this work: it is very clearly given in Dr. Davidson's edition (Cambridge Bible for Schools).

Notes to Daniel

For the book as a whole, and its structure, see Introduction, page 1416.

v. 25. And this is the writing that was inscribed. I have followed an ancient tradition that Daniel, in solving the mystery of the writing on the wall, read downward instead of across. [Or better: down, up, down: that is, boustrophedon.] This much increases the realisability of the scene. It is plain that Daniel not only explains the enigmatical expressions, but also deciphers what the rest have failed to decipher. If this failure was due to some unknown alphabet, the interpreter must have said so, or else why is his interpretation instantly accepted? If, however, it be supposed that the mystic hand moved down, up, and down, then the writing visible at the end to the company of guests would seem to form a succession of words, which, read in the ordinary way from left to right, or right to left, would be unintelligible. (See page 672.) The prophet first reads the inscription the right way; and thus has a vantage ground from which to enforce its meaning.

x. 13. But the prince of the kingdom of Persia withstood me one and twenty days. The reference in this and similar passages is to the idea that the 'holy ones' or 'sons of God' or angels were guardian spirits of particular races or nations: Michael is named on the same page as the guardian spirit of Israel. A similar idea underlies Psalms lviii and lxxxii: for this, and the variation of the idea in Job, see notes to Job, page 1661.

Notes to Hosea

i–iii: Gomer: An Emblem

This discourse presents the prophet's relations with an unfaithful wife as an emblem of Jehovah's relations with Israel. The great question in this part of Hosea is whether we are to understand a literal narrative of events, or a parable, like Ezekiel's Parable of the Foundling, or of Oholah and Oholibah. A still closer parallel to this second alternative would be the portion of the biblical Zechariah here presented as 'The Withdrawal of the Divine Shepherd' (page 739).

If the literal interpretation be taken, it is best to suppose (with Kirkpatrick) that Gomer became unfaithful after marriage, and that the prophet, meditating upon his unhappy lot, perceived a divine voice in the impulse which had led him to marry her. G. A. Smith calls the whole the Story of the Prodigal Wife.

Though the great majority of modern commentators with whom I should wish to agree unite in accepting the literal meaning, I find myself compelled to support the other view. The two main objections urged against this other interpretation seem to me deficient in weight. (1) It is said that if the whole be a parable we should find the name of the wife significant like the other names. This is at most a negative argument: etymology might at this distance of time fail to suggest an evil connotation of the name which usage might make clear to contemporaries. But is it certain that there is no etymological significance in the name? Cheyne says, "Gomer may plausibly be interpreted, 'perfection' (i.e. consummate in wickedness), and Diblaim 'cakes of figs' (i.e. the sweetness of sin)." To express what the parable requires — the adulterous attraction born of excessive luxury — what can be better than 'Perfection daughter of Fig-cake,' more especially in view of the passage (iii. 1): as the LORD loveth the children of Israel, though they turn unto other gods, and love cakes of raisins? (2) How, it is asked, could the prophet think of applying the idea of wedlock to the relation between God and his people except by some such experience? But this idea, so common in later prophets like Ezekiel, must have a commencement in some one mind: it is not for us to say how such ideas should be first inspired. On the other hand, the whole drift of the detailed language favours the idea that we are reading a parable: the application entirely overweights the personal details. It is moreover self-contained, as a parabolic discourse would be: no hint of such an experience in the prophet's life appears in subsequent parts of the book. Again, the discourse is in pendulum form: are we to suppose that with the change to hope in the second paragraph the actual names of the prophet's children are to be changed? [The analogy of Isaiah's children and their significant names breaks down in this respect.] In spite of the pathetic character of the literal interpretation, woven by Plumptre into a beautiful poem, the indications seem to me strongly in favour of understanding a parable.

The discourse is in pendulum form: successive paragraphs alternate between judgment and hope of restoration.

1. Israel's backsliding is presented under the emblem of the adulterous wife: the children of the adulterous wife symbolise successive stages of divorce from God. — Emblem reversed: a glorious restoration. — The original emblem resumed, and carried out to its furthest details. — The reverse of the emblem expanded: allurement to repentance, until the symbols of sin (Joshua vii. 24) become signs of hope, and the mutual intercourse is restored of a praying Jezreel and a God answering with blessings of nature.

2. A further application of the emblem: instead of allurement, forcing to repentance.

iv. 1–vi. 11

A prophetic discourse, culminating in dramatic dialogue: Heavy Corruption and Light Repentance. The paragraph divisions are only faintly marked.

Utter corruption and utter distress. — No place for mutual recriminations: alike are priest, prophet, and the nation which is the mother of them all. — They are left to their transgressions, the triple chain of indulgence, folly, idolatry. — At least let Judah hold back: Ephraim is committed, already caught in the swirl of judgment. — Priests and kings [the natural refuge of the people] are but a fresh snare: everything waits but for the new moon of judgment. — Cries of judgment begun: Ephraim is crushed. [The discourse becomes dramatic.] God will wait for affliction to do its work — and accordingly Ephraim speaks in tones of penitence. — But how trust such transitory penitence? Israel is hopelessly defiled, and there is a harvest for Judah to reap.

vi. 11–viii. 7

Another prophetic discourse, realistic at one point: Reaping the Whirlwind. It will be observed that verse 11 of chapter vi is here divided between this and the preceding discourse. So Cheyne and others (Cambridge Bible for Schools).

When the Lord would heal, corruption appears in its full heat (see below). Signs of decay visible, but Ephraim will not see them. — Or if he sees, he goes to the wrong source for healing. — Sound the trump of judgment: now they repent too late.

vii. 4. They are as an oven heated by the baker, etc. The imagery of the oven running through this paragraph rests on the idea that when once the oven is heated to its full heat the baker may leave it all night; it will do its work unattended. So corruption has reached the point where it will do its deadly work of itself. — Ephraim is a cake not turned: baking supplies one more image: the nation hurries from one alliance to another before the first is fully formed.

viii. 5. He hath cast off thy calf, O Samaria: in the numerous references to the calves it must be remembered that these were not rival gods to Jehovah, but compromises between the worship of Jehovah and the idolatries of the neighbouring peoples, consisting in the representation of God by a visible symbol.

viii. 7–14. This section is a string of disconnected prophetic 'sentences.' From the time of St. Jerome downwards the 'sententious' style of Hosea has been noted. But such groups of sentences are found in other prophets (compare notes to Isaiah xix. 1; Jeremiah ix. 23). Each sentence will have some epigrammatic point: often this is obvious, sometimes it is difficult to state.

He hath no standing corn, etc. This has an epigrammatic form of which Hosea is fond: reserves of hope successively frustrated. No blade: if there be blade, not fruit: if there be fruit, it shall be for strangers. Compare ix. 11 and 16. — Israel is swallowed up, etc.: they have spent in buying alliances all that makes them worth bidding for. — Like a wild ass alone: an obstinate beast that has shaken off guidance. — Though they hire among the nations, now will I gather them: the gather is antithetical to the idea of dispersion implied in among the nations: the scattering of their bribes shall make them feel the pinch of contracted resources. — Ephraim hath multiplied altars — to sin, etc. I have followed the felicitous punctuation of G. A. Smith. The altars multiplied only for purposes of sin shall in the hour of need serve only for sin, not for repentance and forgiveness.

ix. 1. A brief prophetic discourse, inspired by the sight of harvest festivals, which, though nominally for the worship of Jehovah, were rapidly assimilating themselves to the sensuous and exciting orgies of idolatrous nature worship.

The conversion of harvest joy into an excited heathen orgy [exultation] is as bad as the substitution of hired harlotry for the service of a faithful wife. The judgment will be realised in an exile which takes away all feasts of Jehovah, and leaves no use for bread but to satisfy hunger.

ix. 7–x. Another string of epigrammatic sentences: more particularly threatening a judgment to come.

The prophet is a fool, etc.: God has withdrawn his spirit, leaving prophecy no more than what its outward form appears, mere raving. — Ephraim was a watchman, etc.: once, the mountains of Ephraim were the watch-towers of Jehovah (Jeremiah xxxi. 6), now his prophets are encountered with treachery and hostility. — As in the days of Gibeah: Judges, chapter xix: all the life of northern Israel is of a piece with the original scandal. Compare x. 9. — I found Israel like grapes in the wilderness: the disappointment of watching the first promise of spring change into rotten fruit. — Give them, O LORD: what wilt thou give? The speaker sets out to invoke a blessing, and breaks off with the reflection that the greatest blessing for Israel now would be no more children to suffer in the judgment. — They speak vain words, swearing falsely in making covenants: their covenants with the nations are so much perjury against Jehovah. — When they are yoked to their two transgressions: apparently, their revolt against God and Judah (so iii. 5: seek the LORD their God and David their king). — Ephraim is an heifer that is taught: a contrast between the pleasant task of treading the corn and the laborious task of drawing the plough. — As Shalman spoiled Beth-arbel: nothing is known of this allusion.

xi–xiv The Yearning of God

This is an elaborate dramatic presentation of the Divine Father yearning over his rebellious Ephraim (Judah being occasionally included with Ephraim). It is drama of a peculiar kind: the greater part of it is alternating monologue, the Divine Being represented as swaying in alternate moods, between tender reminiscences of Israel's youth and his own loving mercies and outbursts of righteous indignation and threatening. (Compare note to Vision I of Zion Redeemed (above, page 1575): in that case, however, there are two parties present to be alternately addressed). At the end Repentant Israel or Ephraim enters into the drama, and monologue changes to dialogue. When once the principle is caught, and the paragraphs arranged, further analysis is unnecessary: two passages of some difficulty are explained in their place.

xi. 2. As they [e.g. prophets] called them [the people], so they [the people] went from them [the prophets].

xi. 10. They shall walk after the LORD, who shall roar like a lion: the context shows this means a lion roaring to call his young ones.

xii. 3. In the womb he took his brother by the heel, etc. This and the similar verse passage on the following page are of recognised difficulty, which has led some commentators to proclaim them spurious, or out of place. In the arrangement of alternating monologue here adopted they fall into their places as part of the tender reminiscences of Deity. The pronouns in the latter part of this first passage suggest a quotation supposed to be made by God from some source where Israel is speaking of himself: He [Jehovah] found him [Israel] at Beth-el, and there he [Jehovah] spake with us [Israel]. I believe the whole that I have printed as six lines of verse to be a quotation from prophetic hymns of Israelitish history; I have argued at length for the existence of such hymns and for quotations from them in Ecclesiasticus (see General Notes, page 1543). This passage and that on the following page are entirely in keeping with the marked character of those couplet hymns; and the theory of quotation explains the abrupt introduction of the passage, which all commentators note. The connection with the general argument is clear: reminiscences of youthful Israel's power with God, of God's promises to him at Beth-el: therefore, cries God, turn thou, etc. — I will yet again make thee to dwell in tents, etc.: Cheyne aptly compares (ii. 14), I will allure her, and bring her into the wilderness, thus making the words a threat, but a threat with a tinge of promise.

xii. 12. And Jacob fled into the field of Aram, etc.: see previous note. The reminiscences are continued: how youthful Israel endured exile and service rather than enter into adulterating intercourse with the people of the land (Genesis, chapter xxviii. 1); how God on his part granted a wonder-working prophet to deliver Israel from Egypt.

xiv. 9. Who is wise, etc.: an epilogue to the whole book.

Notes to Joel

The whole Book of Joel is a single piece of prophetic literature. It is not a discourse, or series of discourses, but a continuous dramatic presentation. See Introduction, page 1419.

A Rhapsody of the Locust Plague

(For the 'rhapsody,' or spiritual drama, see pages 1392–3.) Its subject is the regular prophetic idea of the Day of the Lord, with its twofold conception of judgment: (1) judgment upon God's people, in this case converted by penitence into purification; and (2) final judgment between the purified people and the hostile nations. Its outer form rests upon two ideas: (1) a locust plague, possibly real, idealised into mystic forces of destruction; and (2) similarly, a real place, the Valley of Jehoshaphat [' Jehovah judges '] idealised into a scene of final contest between the hosts of God and the hosts of Evil. The seven acts or 'visions' into which the rhapsody divides are successive in time and continuous.

I. Dramatic picture of the Land mourning under a great Desolation. [This is brought out, as in oratorio form, by choruses of Old Men, Revellers, Priests, Husbandmen, lamenting to one another (in free verse) over the destruction special to each: as a climax, the Whole People (in recitative prose) summon an assembly and (in stanza verse) present their supplication.] — II. In vain: the mystic judgment advances to its climax. [This is brought out by verse passages presenting an objective picture of what is seen and heard, alternating with passages of recitative prose which add fresh terrors by seeking to analyse what is seen.] — III. A surprise: when the dreaded Voice of the Lord sounds it is a call to repentance; motions of repentance stir among the people, and culminate in a supplication of the Whole People, led by the Priests. — IV. The turning-point is conveyed by a single clause of direct statement (for similar breaks in dramatic form, compare pages 505, 506, 534). Then [in monologue of God] is brought out the removal of the mystic foe,* and the restoration of all that had been destroyed. — V. The next stage [still by monologue of Deity] brings out subsequent spiritualisation of God's people, and preparation for contest with the hostile nations. — VI. The sixth stage [in dramatic dialogue] presents the advance of the nations and the hosts of God to the conflict in the 'Valley of Decision.' The climax [described by 'the Prophetic Spectator'] is all earthquake and darkness. — VII. Darkness has rolled away and discloses [by Divine monologue] the Holy Mountain and the Eternal Peace of God's people.

Notes to Amos

The Book of Amos as here arranged is made up of (1) a single prophetic 'sentence,' and (2) an elaborate prophecy of the type I call 'rhapsody.' (Above, pages 1392–3.) For the book as a whole compare Introduction, page 1421.

Oracle of the Earthquake

These four lines might possibly be included in the composition that follows, as an introductory note of judgment: in that connection however they have not much relevancy or definite point. The main criterion is the question whether verse 1 is (a) a title-page to the whole book, as in the case of Hosea and Joel, or (b) a date of a particular prophecy, of the kind found in Haggai and Zechariah. The words two years before the earthquake seem to me decisive. There is no example of so specific a date for a general prophecy. But to the brief oracle the date gives special point: Amos, an obscure herdsman, outside prophetic circles altogether, rises to prominence by his prediction, two years beforehand, of a famous convulsion of nature, — 'the earthquake in the days of Uzziah' (Zechariah, chapter xiv. 5); this is the starting-point of a prophetic career.

The first two lines are a general prophetic formula of judgment (compare Joel, chapter iii. 16; Jeremiah xxv. 30; and imagery of Psalm lxxvi. 2, 4, taking the marginal readings of R.V.); the last two suggest a convulsion spreading from Jerusalem as centre to the outskirts of heath or mountain.

A Rhapsody of the Judgement to come

The literary form is a rhapsody, presenting the coming judgment on Israel, not (like that of Joel) as a continuous dramatic movement, but (compare page 1393) in a series of stages making a logical rather than a temporal sequence First, by a rhetorical figure of surprise, Israel is included among the doomed nations; then the corruption is denounced as ripe for judgment; finally the judgment is in vision seen to advance by steps.

Structural elaboration makes a greater part of the total literary effect in Amos than in any other writer. Three structural features may be noted. One may be called the Parallel Climax structure: a series of parallel sentences (or stanzas) as a basis for one more parallel of climax. (Marked examples are Vision i, and the parenthetic passages [here printed in italics] of pages 700 and 701.) The structure of Visions ii and iii presents a less formal example of Parallels with Climax; and the number seven prevails throughout (See analysis below.)

The third structural peculiarity is less obvious, but is very important for clear exegesis. It may be termed the Parenthetic Preface, or Prefatory Interruption. I have already noted as a feature in the style of Isaiah (see page 1533) the tendency to place a prefatory explanation after or in the middle of what it prefaces or explains: such passages may be called 'prefatory' because there is a change from the message to matters personal to the messenger, such as a modern writer would deal with in his preface. With the general tendency of Amos to regularity of form, such interruptions become a structural element of the whole prophecy: I have felt justified in distinguishing them by italic type and the parenthetic form. We thus get a complex structure made up of a sustained denunciation of sin and threatening of judgment interrupted by parenthetic appeals to the opponents of prophecy: such opposition being partly open antagonism, and partly the ignoring of divine warnings by those who are absorbed in empty ritual or selfish pursuits. There are no less that six repetitions of this complex structure. — (a) In Vision ii, as soon as the first note of judgment has been sounded, the prophet breaks off (page 700) to work out, in a progression of seven clauses, the thought, Who that has received a prophetic message can fail to prophesy? — (b) Then three proclamations of judgment are uttered, and the speaker again breaks off in a protest (sevenfold in structure) against those who trust to ritual and are blind to clear signs of doom (page 701). — (c) The fourth section is a wail over fallen Israel: it is interrupted by snatches of appeal to the same opponents. This last case is less clear than the others, but seems clear enough. The first clause (see page 702) might be read as part of the denunciation; the second and third are certainly better understood as citations of objections. Moreover, the general drift of the argument points the same way: the Forasmuch therefore, Seek good, Therefore thus saith the LORD, are replies to the objections involved in the supposed interruptions. — (d) In Vision iii we have advancing stages of judgment and the Divine Being speaking doom: just where judgment has been advanced to the point from which there is no retreat we get (page 704) the interrupting notice of open conflict between prophecy and authority. Here no doubt an historic incident is reflected: it appears at this point, either because in the oral ministry upon which the rhapsody is founded the incident took place where this particular emblem of judgment had been spoken (the then would in this view be temporal), or because this is its logical connection with the theme (then causal). — (e) Section 4 of this Vision gives a specially clear case (page 704): the Divine speech in the first person is interrupted and resumed: the interruption is the prophet's appeal, Hear this, O ye that, etc. — (f) Similarly in the next section the Divine speaker brings out a further stage of judgment and the prophet resumes his interrupting appeal, For the LORD, etc. (page 705): the two appeals of the prophet being further bound together by the repeated image of the inundating River. — Each example must stand on its merits: but the case becomes all the clearer when the whole argument and succession of interruptions are considered together. [See analysis below.]

Vision I

A series of nations denounced and threatened in parallel stanzas: as a climax of surprise comes a final stanza (parallel, but freer in detail) denouncing Judah and Israel. [The stanzas are compounded of rhythmical formulæ only varied by the names (expressing the sin and the doom) and recitative prose (expressing actual offences and details of punishment).]

Vision II

Denunciation (in sevenfold structure) of Corruption ripe for Judgment — with parenthetic interruptions of Appeals to Opponents of prophecy.

Introduction: Central idea of the whole rhapsody: Because Israel is God's chosen nation, therefore it shall be visited with judgment.

Appeal (with sevenfold structure) to Opponents: The inevitableness of prophecy.

i, ii, iii (in Proclamation form: 'Hear ye'): Three evils denounced: luxury with oppression — empty ritual with oppression — feminine luxury with oppression.

Appeal (in sevenfold structure) to Opponents: Trusting to elaborate ritual and ignoring plain judgments.

iv (in Wail form): Israel fallen to rise no more! Seek the Lord if it be not too late!

Snatches of parenthetic appeal to Opponents: hatred of open reproof — prudential silence — weak trust that all may turn out well.

v (in Woe form): Desiring the 'Day of the Lord' and not seeing that it will be against them.

vi (in Woe form): Putting off the evil day by those who shall be the first to suffer.

vii (the irrevocable Oath of Deity): Destruction shall be utter: Jacob an abhorrence.

Vision III

Vision of Judgment Advancing upon Israel (in seven emblematic stages) — with parenthetic interruptions of Appeals to Opponents of prophecy.

i, ii. Vision Emblems of Locusts, Fire: stages of judgment threatening, yet restrained in its course.

iii. Vision Emblem of the Plumbline: * the exact point at which safety is lost.

Parenthetic Protest: Open conflict between prophecy and (royal and priestly) authority.

iv. Vision Emblem of Summer Fruit: Israel ripe for the judgment.

The Divine speech interrupted by Appeal to Opponents, in their avarice impatient of sacred festivals while the inundation of judgment is at hand.

Divine speech continued: A material and spiritual famine, the strongest [youths, etc.] to fall first.

v. Vision Emblem of Smiting the chapiters: the Judgment begun. (The imagery of the bowing wall has developed to actual pulling down.)

Preceding Appeal to Opponents continued: It is Jehovah who brings this inundation of judgment.

vi. Emblem or Image of the Ethiopians, etc.: The Judgment consummated: Israel on a par with the heathen peoples. — Turning point of Judgment. It shall be a sifting, no true corn shall perish: compare chapter iii. 12.

vii. Thus Final Vision of Restored Israel. [Emblematic form dropped.]

Notes to Obadiah

This is the briefest of the prophetic books. A calamity falling upon Israel has been aggravated by the malignant rejoicing of her neighbour foe, Edom. Israel is comforted in the thought of a future in which Edom will suffer judgment in her turn, and the kingdom will be the Lord's.

The prophecy is in the common 'doom form' [page 1531]: a Divine speech of doom, with lyric celebration of the theme. (In the lyric portion, the double quotation marks indicate the tidings from the LORD. The ambassador's message does not extend beyond line 3. The rest is exultation over the coming destruction.)

Notes to Jonah

This is in literary form a prophetic story, like the Story of Elijah in Kings, or the earlier part of the Book of Daniel. Its interpretation must therefore be based upon the action of the prophet, what he fails to do as well as what he does. It falls into three sections. (See Introduction, pages 1423–4.)

I, III. The first section rests upon the old conception of deity as a local power [compare I Kings, chapter xx. 23]. Jonah to escape an unwelcome commission flees to the far west: the storm that overtakes him reminds him that Jehovah's power extends beyond the holy land. — Similarly in III it is brought home to him how the mercy of Jehovah extends beyond the chosen nation. Jonah's preaching awakens a repentance which averts the judgment on Nineveh. Jonah's feeling must not be understood as sullenness; nor does he need to be informed of the mercy of God, for he expressly makes this the basis of his former evasion of the ministry to Nineveh. But he is possessed with righteous indignation at Jehovah's extending this mercy outside his own people. God deals with this mood by enlisting his sympathy, first with a tender and beautiful thing of nature, and then with the mass of humanity and dumb nature represented in Nineveh.

* Compare the imagery of the bowing wall in Isaiah chapter xxx. 13, and Psalms lxii. 3. — The plumbline is the symbol of exactness in building operations. Thus in Zechariah, chapter iv. 10: the temple built without flaw — Isaiah xxviii. 17: all outside the exact line of righteousness shall perish — II Kings xxi. 13: Jerusalem shall suffer exactly as Samaria.

II. Between these comes Jonah's Prayer or Thanksgiving at his escape from the sea [compare such Songs of Thanksgiving as Psalm xviii]. The reference to the great fish prepared to swallow Jonah is in literary form a footnote exegetical of the expression in the song, Out of the belly of hell; similarly the vomiting out Jonah is a footnote attached to the last line. These particular footnotes have every appearance of being a gloss or later addition. They are absolutely incompatible with the words of the prayer itself, which distinctly celebrate a deliverance from immersion in the sea: compare The deep was round about me; the weeds were wrapped about my head, etc.

Notes to Micah

This book is made up of an elaborate prophetic discourse followed by two prophecies in dramatic form. See Introduction, page 1424.

i–v

This is an elaborate Discourse of Judgment and Salvation, with the usual sevenfold structure: the middle section being a parenthetic protest [compare Amos] against the opponents of faithful prophecy.

I. A Threat of Judgment upon the sin of Israel. — II. Rhapsodical realisation of the judgment falling on the land.* — III. Special denunciation of social oppression. — IV. Here the prophet breaks off to attack those who would restrain his plain-speaking prophecy in the interest of oppressing rulers. He imitates the glowing promises of the popular prophets. Judgment shall descend on the oppressing rulers, and a night of no vision on the false prophets. But he is strengthened by God to declare the sin of Israel. [For the difficulties of this section see below.] — V. Denunciation is resumed of the national corruption which will destroy Zion and Jerusalem. — VI. But then will come a restoration in which Zion will be exalted, and the nations will flow to her. — VII. The final section is an appeal, on the basis of what precedes, for hopefulness under trouble. Three pictures follow of trouble and relief: there is the anguish of exile, even as far as distant Babylon, and yet the rescue comes — again, nations are assembled against Zion, only as sheaves are brought to the threshing floor to be trodden — yet again, trooping enemies are about to strike the final blow, but One from little Bethlehem becomes a mighty power against the Assyrian, and the diminished nation is as irresistible as the dew, as mighty as the lion: all is purity and salvation.

ii. 12. I will surely assemble, O Jacob, all of thee. In this difficult passage I have followed Ewald's view that we have here a mocking specimen of the promises of the flattering prophets. The objections urged against this interpretation are two: (1) the passage is too much in the style of the genuine prophecy to be a mere citation of what is false prophecy; (2) in particular, the remnant of Israel is the last phrase such a false prophet would use. But (1) Micah's objection is not to the glorious promises of his rivals, but to their putting these forth without the condition precedent of judgment on sin. (2) The word remnant need not have the special association which belongs to prophecy nearer the overthrow of Judah: it seems to be regularly applied to a race scattered in small numbers in the midst of another race [Joshua chapter xxiii. 12; II Samuel xxi. 2]. The false prophets thus declare that all Israel, down to the remotest exiles carried captive in war, will be assembled again for Israel's victory; whereas Micah declares (in section 7) that only the remains of the people left after the judgment has destroyed the rest will share in the glory. In favour of the arrangement I have adopted is the general coherency of section 4; and especially the words, And I said, Hear, I pray you, which are just suited for the words of one resuming after quoting an adversary.

vi. 1–8

This exquisite dramatic morsel puts in forensic form Jehovah's attitude of controversy against his sinful people. He himself arraigns: Balaam is cited as the great witness from without as to Jehovah's goodness to Israel. — The defendant People tremble to appear. — The Mountains as judges pronounce the foundation truths of judgment.

vi. 9–vii

This dramatic presentation of judgment and salvation announces itself in its title [The voice of the Lord crieth to the city, etc.] as addressed to the City; and prepares us to expect the Man of Wisdom [the faithful in the midst of the wicked] as an addition to the dramatis personæ. [Similar explanatory titles are found in Isaiah, pages 505 and 506; but there only for portions of the drama.]

The Lord announces the rod of judgment on a corruption ripe for it. — The sinful People speak their despair, awaking to their corruption too late. — But the Man of Wisdom receives with hopefulness this judgment which treads down his oppressing foe. — The city being thus purified shall be built up, and the exiles shall flock to it. But in the land outside desolation shall still punish sin. — The Man of Wisdom intercedes for those of the flock that are scattered through the wilds of the land. — The Lord responds with a deliverance as complete as that from Egypt. — The Man of Wisdom exults at the glorious deliverance, and celebrates the pardoning God.

Notes to Nahum

This splendid prophetic celebration of the Doom of Nineveh is best classified as a 'rhapsodic discourse.' It has a general resemblance to the 'doom form' [page 1531], especially Jeremiah's Doom of Babylon [pages 600–7, and note page 1582], but is more varied in its parts. See Introduction, pages 1426–7.

I, II. The first two sections are prophetic discourse in pendulum form, the paragraphs swaying between the ideas of judgment and mercy. — III. Doom form: divine tidings of deliverance alternating with lyric presentation of the overthrow of Nineveh. — IV. Brief lyric meditation on Nineveh desolate. — V. Doom form resumed: divine word of judgment alternating with lyric presentation of the city in its guilt. — VI. Taunt Song [compare Isaiah's Doom of Bablyon, page 487]. — VII. Brief lyric meditation on Nineveh desolate.

Notes to Habakkuk

This book of prophecy is here presented as a single literary composition which may be entitled A Rhapsody of the Chaldeans. See Introduction, page 1425.

The literary form is a perfect type of the 'rhapsody.' (Pages 1392–3.) The working out of this is best conveyed by detailed analysis.

I

The Prophet, in dialogue with God, touches the mystery of sin unpunished and judgment withheld. — God announces a marvel: the Chaldeans as a conquering power, godless and irresistible. — The Prophet finds his mystery intensified by this answer: how can righteousness use godlessness as an instrument to punish evil that is less than its own?

II

This full statement of the problem is emphasised by the Prophet's retiring to his watch-tower [compare Isaiah xxi. 6 and note on page 1571] to await the Divine answer. — This solution is conveyed under the gradually elaborated image of intoxication: the haughty bearing of the Chaldean is no more than the reeling of the drunkard that goes before his fall. (See note on page 1536.) This coming fall is suddenly presented in the Doom or Taunt Song of the delivered peoples.

Doom of the Chaldeans [in five lyric woes alternating with Divine word of denunciation: compare note to Isaiah xiii. 1 on page 1570].

The first four stanzas express the overthrow of the haughty Chaldeans under four different images. (See note on page 1536.) — 1. This unchecked career of the conqueror is a rolling up of usury: the exactor shall come. — 2. It is building a house of refuge from evil, only to find shame built into wall and beam. — 3. It is building a city by iniquity only to make a bigger bonfire to blaze abroad the avenging God. —4. It is making a neighbour drunk and enjoying his shame only to receive the drink of shame from God. — 5. The last woe is addressed to the foundation of all: trusting in dumb idols, whereas the living Jehovah is the World's Teacher.

III

A Vision Ode of Jehovah come to Judgment. The structure of the ode is a prelude and a postlude embodying the feelings of the Prophet as he beholds, while the body of the ode contains the vision itself. [Compare the structure of Psalm xxix.] The body of the ode consists of Strophe: All nature convulsed with advancing Deity.

Antistrophe: Is it against nature that this advance is directed?

Epode: Nay, it is for the salvation of his people that God comes. [Compare Psalm cxiv.]

[Strophe and antistrophe, each sixteen lines; epode, eight lines; prelude, four lines; postlude, sixteen lines.]

iii. 2 and 16. I have heard the report of thee and am afraid. . . . I heard, and . . . my lips quivered at the voice. The report, voice, refer to the voice speaking what makes the body of the ode. What exactly is this voice? Not (a) that of God, or the Celestial Hosts, or such voices as speak the passages of celebration in doom songs, because of the line, They came as a whirlwind to scatter me. (b) Nor is the ode spoken by the congregation of Israel (so Farrar), which would make actuality and not vision, and leave no place for the uncertainty of the postlude. (c) The voice seems to be that of Israel in vision. This makes possible the mixed feelings of the postlude. The intervention of Deity is only in vision, yet thus made so realistically certain that the Prophet, in the postlude, trembles with faith: that he should feel at rest waiting for the invading Chaldean [when he that shall invade . . . cometh up, etc.]: at rest, because, though the fig tree shall not blossom, etc., the Prophet [through this vision] can exult in his God. — Revive thy work in the midst of the years: a reference to the though it tarry wait for it of ii: the Prophet prays God to intervene before it be too late.

Page 724, footnote. Set to Shigionoth: A musical direction, the meaning of which is lost.

Notes to Zephaniah

This is the simplest and most typical example of the 'doom form' of prophecy, presenting the familiar topic, the Day of the Lord, in a Divine word of denunciation and threatening [here presented as prose] interrupted at intervals by lyric passages seconding, celebrating, or otherwise dwelling upon successive points in the speech of Deity. [Compare page 1531.] The prose passages are in the first person, and may be read together as a unity apart from the interrupting lyrics. See Introduction, page 1426.

The whole is continuous, but as regards subject-matter falls into three natural divisions.

1. Judgment beginning at Jerusalem and sweeping over the different quarters of the city (The Mortar, etc.). — 2. Judgment spreading outside to the nations, from the Philistines to Nineveh as a climax. — 3. Beyond the judgment a restoration: the nations fearing Jehovah, Israel with its restored exiles a blessing among the peoples.

Notes to Haggai and Zechariah

It is natural to consider Haggai and Zechariah together. [That is, Zechariah chapters i–viii of the biblical arrangement.] They are fellow workers in the great work of rebuilding the Temple after the Return from exile. Their prophecies make a series arranged in the same methodical way, each with an exact date and introduction. See Introduction, pages 1426–8.

Haggai

The book is a series of four Prophecies to the Builders of the Temple: each exactly dated.

I. The hard times suffered by the community connected with their caring for their own houses before giving themselves to the building of the Temple. — II. Depression at the sight of the restored Temple combated: the latter glory shall be greater than the former. — III. An analogy: the touch of pollution defiles, the touch of holiness does not make holy: their two months' zeal has not yet brought the blessing, but it shall come. — IV. Zerubbabel shall be the signet of God [the position forfeited by Jehoiachin (or Jeconiah): Jeremiah, chapter xxii. 24–30].

Zechariah *

i. 1–6

A brief Prophetic Manifesto: putting the new prophecy in the position of the prophecy before the exile.

i. 7–vi: The Sevenfold Vision

This Sevenfold Vision is in form the most elaborate of all vision prophecies. The form consists in (1) what may be called an Enveloping Vision [of horsemen, or horses and chariots, who move to and fro in the earth (Job, chapter i. 7) as ministers of God's will]: this is brought into prominence at the opening and the close, but also remains throughout in the background. (2) Against this background of powers for carrying out what Jehovah ordains we have, like dissolving views, a succession of seven Emblem Visions, foreshadowing the great things God has in store for recovered Israel.

For the detailed exegesis of the prophecy, care must be taken to keep distinct the different 'angels' who appear.

(a) The Interpreting Angel: always denominated the angel that talked with me. Note that he is the speaker at the close of the vision: And the boy went forth, and sought to go that they might walk to and fro through the earth: and he [the Lord] said, Get you hence, walk to and fro through the earth. So they walked to and fro through the earth. Then cried he [the Lord] upon me [the Interpreting Angel] . . . Behold, they that go toward the north country have quieted my spirit [satisfied the Lord's vengeance: compare Ezekiel, chapter v. 13] in the north country.

(b) The Angel Horseman (also called, the man . . . among the myrtle trees), and his band of angelic horsemen, who are the ministers of the Lord's will. In the Opening of the Vision his band report to him; he passes on the report to the Lord; the Lord's answer comes to the Interpreting Angel.

(c) The Angel of the Mission in section 2. He is called another angel, and speaks to the end of the section, describing the mission on which he has been sent to comfort Jerusalem. Sometimes he uses oratio obliqua, at other times the actual words of Deity: the latter I indicate by double quotation marks.

(d) The Angel of the Lord in section 3, who presides throughout the trial of Joshua. With the usual avoidance of giving form to Deity, the vision introduces this as the nearest visible approach to Deity itself: hence he is once referred to as The Lord.

* That is, the biblical Zechariah i–viii. See page 1414.

When once the form has been caught, the successive emblems are not difficult to interpret. An appendix describes the crowning of Joshua by Zechariah in the spirit of the revelation thus made concerning him.

Opening of the Vision. Angelic horsemen are at hand as ministers of Jehovah's will upon earth. They report the whole earth quiet. Appeal is made to the Lord to delay no longer his mercy upon Jerusalem: a favourable answer is returned. — First sign: Horns symbolise the oppressors of Israel, Smiths the power that shall put them down. — Second sign: A Measuring Line to measure Jerusalem: but the Angel of the Mission tells how Jerusalem shall grow beyond all measuring. — Third sign: The High Priest Joshua on trial before the Court of Heaven: his adversary [Job, chapter i. 6] is rebuked, and Joshua clothed with rich [? priestly] apparel; a crown is added, and he is granted the [priestly] place of access. Finally he is made a sign of the 'Branch' of prophecy. [So the epilogue interprets.] — Fourth sign: the Golden Candlestick, and promises to Zerubbabel that this supreme element of Temple ritual shall be completed by him. — Fifth sign: Olive trees and Spouts feeding the golden candlestick: interpreted of the Sons of Oil that stand by the Lord of the whole earth. [From the position of this sign following the two preceding ones the interpretation will naturally be that the eternal sources of divine inspiration are granted to High Priest and Prince: they are thus joined together by the epilogue.] — Sixth sign: The Flying Roll or Curse purging wickedness out of the land. — Seventh Sign: the Ephah and the Talent: Measures and Weights as symbol of the traffic that is considered as the anti-devotional spirit: compare such passages as Zechariah, chapter xiv. 21; Zephaniah i. 11 (margins in both cases). These pass out of the holy land and are enthroned in Babylon as their natural home. [Beginning of the idea of Babylon as symbol for the 'world' in opposition to the 'church.'] — Close of the Vision. The ministering horsemen, with the addition now of chariots, carry out the divine mandates. — Epilogue: The Vision being over, Zechariah acts upon it in solemnly crowning the High Priest Joshua as of co-ordinate rank with the prince Zerubbabel in the new dispensation. He is proclaimed 'the Branch.'

vii–viii

This prophecy is of the form that may be denominated the 'inquiry and response.' A deputation has raised the question whether certain fasts ordained in memory of the calamities of the siege [Jeremiah, chapter xli. 1–3; lii. 4, 6, 12] need be observed now that the exiles are restored. The prophet's elaborate response falls into four sections. [Note Zechariah's tendency to connect the new prophecy with the historic stream of prophecy; and compare throughout Isaiah, chapter lviii.]

I. The prophet emphasises the moral principle underlying the ceremonial: it is not the fasting itself which is the Divine element in such institutions. — II. He appeals to the former prophets in Judah's time of prosperity: citing an oracle that exalted judgment and mercy: neglect of these was what brought the doom. — III. He appeals to the prophets which were in the day when the foundation of the house of the LORD of hosts was laid: he cites five of their oracles of salvation and enlarges upon the theme. — IV. Then only does he give his own formal prophetic response to the question raised. The fasts commemorating the troublous times shall be feasts of gladness: love truth and peace. Two more oracles are added of glories to come for the people.

[NOTE. A characteristic of all this era of prophecy is multiplied repetitions of such formulæ as The word of the Lord came to me, etc. These are parenthetic, and must not be allowed to disturb the argument. I have distinguished by double quotation marks the actual oracles quoted from the comment.]

Notes to Anonymous Prophecies

The reasons for so classifying the remaining prophecies have been given in the Introduction, page 1414.

The King of Peace

See Introduction, page 1428. This is in the 'doom form': a divine speech of promise and threat, interrupted at intervals by lyric passages celebrating the theme. [Compare page 1531.]

1. Peace against external foes: hostile nations smitten, the king entering in peaceful triumph: he is garrison to his people, and the glorified people are the weapons of his war. — 2. Peace within: no false gods or false shepherds, but all strength and deliverance is from him; the oppression of the violent is at an end.

ix. 13. I will stir up thy sons, O Zion, against thy sons, O Greece. Great difficulties have been felt in reference to this passage, as implying a prominence of Greece which would point to a totally different age from what the rest of the prophecy would suggest. There seems great probability that the words against thy sons, O Greece, are a later gloss. In particular, Professor Kirkpatrick points out how they obscure the image in the word stir up, which is regularly used of brandishing a weapon: he makes the passage read thus:

For I bend Me Judah for a bow,
Lay Ephraim on it for an arrow;
Wield thy sons, O Zion, for a spear,
And make them as a hero's sword.

xi. 1. Open thy doors, O Lebanon. This is one of the lyric interruptions. It must not be understood as a poetic description of an invader's progress, but as poetic imagery for the idea of violence overthrown. The shepherds are the shepherds of x. 3 [Mine anger is kindled against the shepherds, etc.]: there is no connection with the Shepherd prophecy that follows.

The Withdrawal of the Divine Shepherd

This prophecy has been variously interpreted. The key to the exegesis seems to me this: in the command Feed the flock of slaughter the expression flock of slaughter is proleptic. Thus the meaning is not that Israel is described as a flock of slaughter, and the prophet commanded to feed them, which commission he executes in what here appears as II. The meaning is rather that God hereby pronounces Israel a flock of slaughter, which shepherd and buyer devote to that purpose without compunction. The prophet accepts the Divine decree with the words, So I fed the flock of slaughter: verily the most miserable of sheep. (Compare Jeremiah xxv. 17.) II is a distinct emblem.

As so understood, the whole makes a Threefold Emblem, the emblems symbolising in different ways the Withdrawal of the Divine Shepherd. See the summary in Introduction, page 1428.

I. The Flock of Slaughter.
II. Graciousness and Union.
III. The Foolish Shepherd.

I. God pronounces Israel a flock for slaughter: the Prophet accepts it as such with contemptuous pity. — II. The Prophet [representing God] seeks to feed the flock of Israel with Graciousness and Union as symbols of his mode of shepherding. In vain: he breaks both these staves, and withdraws from his task, receiving for hire the price of a common slave [Exodus chapter xxi. 32]. — III. The Prophet assumes the position of the worthless shepherd who preys upon the sheep. He is thus a symbol of the worthless rulers to whom Israel is left now their Divine Shepherd has withdrawn. Compare I Samuel viii. 11.

xi. 8. And I cut off the three shepherds in one month. In the absence of clear date marks to this prophecy it becomes impossible to suggest any satisfactory explanation for this historic allusion. — So they weighed for my hire: Who are the they? In the condensed thought of an Emblem this is left vague: the general idea seems to be as if God negotiated with the rest of the world to keep one nation for his own peculiar people. — And I took the thirty pieces of silver, and cast them unto the potter, in the house of the LORD. Compare xiv. 20: The pots in the LORD'S house shall be like the bowls before the altar: the two passages seem to suggest some receptacle for rubbish made of common potter's ware. a Temple wastepaper basket, so to speak.

Three Prophecies of the Siege

I have so classified this prophecy, although it is true that its second division contains no specific mention of the siege of Jerusalem. But this designation is justified by several considerations: (a) the position of II between I and III with neither of which however it is sufficiently connected to form a unity; (b) the detail, two parts therein shall be cut off and die, but the third part shall be left therein, in comparison with the detail of III, half of the city shall go forth into captivity, and the residue . . . shall not be cut off, neither of which expressions must be understood literally; (c) by the general thought of all three, judgment, deliverance, purification. (d) It is true that this section II speaks of a land and not a city; but the association of Judah with Jerusalem in the references to the siege is a distinctive mark of I and III. For the spirit of the whole see Introduction, page 1429.

I. The Fountain for the House of David.
II. The Smiting of the Shepherd and the Scattering of the Sheep.
III. The Judgement and the Age of Holiness.

I. Wonderful deliverance of Judah and Jerusalem from the foe: associated with a penitential return to the Lord, and a wonderful spiritual deliverance, extending as a climax even to the false prophets. — II. Judgment on the Shepherd: the sheep are scattered, the remnant purified. — III. Once more, judgment of the siege, deliverance, and restoration to holiness.

xiv. 4. The mount of Olives shall cleave in the midst thereof, etc. The idea seems to be a deliverance recalling the marvels of past deliverances: the cleaving of the Mt. of Olives to afford escape in the last extremity is like the dividing of the Red Sea under the Egyptian pursuit; so the expressions not day, and not night; at evening time there shall be light; one day which is known unto the LORD, recall the staying of the sun and moon for Joshua.

My Messenger (or Malachi)

For the matter and general spirit of the whole see Introduction, page 1430.

Malachi is cast in a dialectic form almost peculiar to itself: brief discourses on texts which appear as interruptions from a supposed adversary, and which therefore come not at the beginning but in the course of the argument. [The interrupting words I distinguish by italics.] The whole falls into the usual seven sections: six of these discourses with interrogatory texts and a conclusion. The conclusion and the middle section are prophetic pledges of the Messenger to come.

I. A message to God's chosen people. They doubt his love: what better proof could he give than his original choice of them? — II. A message to priests. These, who should be the Lord's messengers, pollute his altar by offering contemptible gifts such as they would never present to the governor; it is the Gentiles who hold Jehovah in honour. The message [commandment] is that God curses their blessings [Joel, chapter i. 14]; and in so doing God is keeping, not breaking, his covenant with Levi. — III. A message to Judah. Judah has betrayed the wife of his youth in marrying the daughter of a strange God. [The meaning is not that Jewish wives were divorced to make these foreign marriages; but that marrying within the nation was like a wife provided by God himself for each Israelite: to marry abroad was thus a sort of adultery.] — IV. A message to the people: they weary God with their impatience for the judgment: the Messenger of the Lord shall indeed come suddenly, but who may abide the judgment he brings? — V. A message to the whole nation: they are robbers of their God. Let them bring the whole tithe, and see whether this will not bring a blessing such as they will be unable to contain. — VI. A message to the people: they are stout murmurers against God, crying that there is no profit in serving God, and that it is the wicked who are happy. But a Book of Remembrance is kept, and a day shall dawn which shall discern between the righteous and the wicked. — VII. Conclusion. The original message of Moses [Deuteronomy, chapter xviii. 15] shall be fulfilled: Elijah the Prophet shall be sent to heal national disunion before the great and terrible day comes.

i. 11. For from the rising of the sun even unto the going down of the same my name is great among the Gentiles, etc. Compare such passages as Daniel, chapter iii. 29; iv. 1–3, etc.

ii. 15. And not one hath done so who had a residue of the spirit. As the returned exiles are denominated 'the remnant' (Haggai, chapter i. 12, 14), so the spirit of the restored religious nationality may be called 'the residue of the spirit.'

iii. 16. Then they that feared the LORD spake one with another. The connection is probably this: the words in quotation marks are the desponding thoughts of the righteous which led them to condole with one another; and the Lord hearkened to this complaint, etc. Another interpretation makes the speaking one with another a protest against what has preceded; but the first is more in accord with the general drift.

i

Prefatory Psalms. There are suggestions of a design on the part of the compilers of the Book of Psalms to introduce important sections of it by prefatory Meditations. The prelude to the whole collection is a beatitude for the life of meditation on the Law. The so-called Egyptian Hallel (cxiii–cxviii) is preceded by two acrostic psalms (cxi, cxii) of identical structure, celebrating the one the works of the LORD and his goodness to his people, the other the blessedness of him who lives in the fear of God. The final Hallelujah Anthem (cxlvi–cl) is similarly preceded by an acrostic meditation upon Jehovah's glory and graciousness. It might almost seem that the most elaborate of all alphabetical poems, psalm cxix, was intended in the same way as preface to the lengthy collection of 'Songs of Ascents' (cxx–cxxxiv). But this is such a colossal product of devout ingenuity that I have not ventured to treat it as other than an independent psalm.

Psalm i celebrates the contemplative life, occupied in meditation upon Divine law, in contrast with the worldly life that lays itself open to influences of evil. The theme is developed by an exquisite piece of contrasted imagery: the rooted tree, passing through its ordered course of foliage and fruitage, and the empty chaff carried round and round by forces outside itself. [Strophic Structure: 2, 3, 2 in strains.]

ii

The motive of psalms ii and cx is Jehovah's King, mystically anointed to subdue and reign over the kingdoms of the whole earth. Of a similar spirit is psalm lxxxvii, which celebrates Zion as the mother of the nations, who seek to be enrolled in her records of citizenship. This contrasts with the other conception of kingship, for which psalms lxxxix and cxxxii are the chief expression: here the king, though exalted in the eyes of the external world, is still the king of Israel only. Between these two conceptions of kingship possibly a link may be found in psalm lxxii, which seems to celebrate not so much an individual monarch, as a 'dynasty of righteousness,' king and king's son succeeding one another to the end of time. The rise from the idea of monarchy over Israel to that of universal or Messianic rule is parallel with the widening in the conception of Jehovah: first (compare cxiv) as specially the God of Israel, finally as creator and ruler of the universe. The latter is the special point of the Festal Hymns (xxxiii, xlvii, xciii) and Anthems (xcv–c, cxlv–cl).

Psalm ii first applies antistrophic form to the contrast between the busy schemes of the earth kings, uttering words of defiance, and Jehovah's distant scorn, with the fiat establishing HIS KING. Then, in a quieter rhythm, this Anointed King speaks the decree of his appointment (strophe), and (antistrophe) advises submission while there is time. [Structure: Antistrophic Alternation: 4a2b; 4a2b; 8, 8.]

iii

Dramatic Monologues. The essence of dramatic movement is a change of outward circumstances: as when an opening state of splendour is converted by the plot into tragic ruin, or a developed perplexity of external conditions resolves into a happy ending. Such a dramatic change may be conveyed within the compass of the briefest lyric poem. This may be appreciated by reading together three such psalms as lxxvii, cxliii, and vi. In all three we have trouble finding relief. The situation is identical in the first two: a sufferer finds support by thoughts of God's great works in the past. But in lxxvii the story is told, not presented: And I said, This is my infirmity, etc. In cxliii the situation is presented in the cries of the sufferer; here, however, there is no change suggested in outward circumstances, the speaker only comforts himself with thoughts of God. But in psalm vi, after two stanzas of complaining distress, there is a change of tone which implies that the situation of trouble has been converted into deliverance: the monologue makes a complete dramatic movement. Such dramatic psalms make an important division of the psalter: as examples the reader may study together iii, vi, xii, xxii, xxviii, liv, lvi, lvii, lix, lxix, lxxi, cxxxix. Sometimes the dramatic break is brought out with startling suddenness; in xxii, lvii, the change is made in the middle of a sentence. In cxxxix the transition is gradual: the burden of Divine omnipresence has filled the first half of the poem, culminating in the thought of its extending back in time to infancy: with this recollection of the protection that hovered about the helpless embryo there isa turn in the feeling of the speaker, which gathers strength, until at last the protest of the opening lines has been converted into ardent aspiration. In psalm xxxi the transition from trouble to deliverance is twice presented, with beautiful variations of detail. Another instructive comparison for the dramatic monologues is psalm lxxiii: there is here a trial of faith which almost broke down and yet was saved at the last, but the story is narrated, not presented.

In psalm iii the presentation of trouble resolving into peace is applied to the daily drama of Night succeeded by Morning. To the devout soul the approach of night may well bring weariness and oppression, only softened by sweet sense of protection and the thought of leaving all to God. With morning comes sudden accession of vigour, feelings of triumph, and faith to encounter once more the struggle of life. [Structure: antistrophic in strains: 4, 4.]

iv. This is an Evening Prayer. The poet addresses himself to prayer in memory of the past — he takes sides with God against the men of vanity — he would purify his heart with silent devotion, expressed in ordered sacrifice — the depression of night calms into joyful trust. [Strophic structure in strains: 1, 2, 2, 3.]

v. A Morning Prayer. Morning brings energy for renewing the struggle of life: to the biblical poet this struggle of life embodies itself in contest with visible foes; devotion takes sides with God, and makes appeal for the overthrow of the evil. [Antistrophic interlacing in strains: 3, 4; 3, 4.]

vi. A dramatic psalm: see on iii. The dramatic break presents a sudden Answer to Prayer. [Stanzas of strains.]

vii. A Vision of Judgment: the theme developed in elaborate antistrophic form. There is a strophe of appeal, followed by a second strophe protesting innocence; the first antistrophe carries the appeal forward to a vision of Jehovah descending to judge the nations, the second antistrophe renews the protest of innocence before this visionary tribunal. Then, in a calmer rhythm, we have a celebration of the judging God, answered by a description of the judged sinner. A doxology concludes. [Antistrophic interlacing (in strains): 2, 3; 2, 3 — followed by simple antistrophy (in couplets): 3, 3 — with conclusion.]

viii. The interpretation of this psalm has already been discussed in the note on the Envelope Figure (page 1523), and again in the note on Direct Metaphor (page 1534). — The thought is of Man as God's Viceroy over the Universe (Genesis, chapter i. 26–28): the Architect of the mighty heavens has appointed Man, a mere babe in comparison with the world over which he is set, to be his representative, governing God's creation and subduing his adversaries. The marvel can find relief only in fresh adoration. [Enveloping couplet and four quatrains.]

ix–x

Acrostic Psalms. A certain number of the psalms (ix–x, xxv, xxxiv, xxxvii, cxi, cxii, cxix, cxlv) are termed 'Acrostic,' because there is traceable in them an alphabetical succession in initial letters of verses. It is a great omission on the part of the Revisers that this alphabetical structure is not kept up in the translation, as it is (for example) in the translation of the Golden Treasury psalter. As a rough substitute, I have in the text of this edition inserted English initial letters in the margin, to keep the reader (so to speak) in an acrostic frame of mind while he follows the movement of the psalm. There is nothing in such acrostic structure that is inconsistent with the highest poetry. As a river flows with stronger current between confined banks, so powerful emotion may express itself in the most artificially restricted forms: this is obviously the case in early lyrics, in which dance evolutions reflect themselves in confining metrical symmetries, and a similar effect may be produced to a purely reading age by the alphabetical arrangement. — In psalms xxv, xxxiv there is a departure from the usual order of the Hebrew alphabet (suggested in my initial letters), the variation being identical in the two psalms. Possibly the order of the Hebrew alphabet may have been less fixed than is the case with our own; more probably, the variation is intentional, and is a sort of author's signature. — In the case of ix–x the irregularity (see in text above) is so great that some commentators suppose an insertion from another poem, or that we have only a first sketch, not completely worked up into final alphabetical shape. Some of the lesser irregularities may be due to corrupt text; but the main peculiarity is suggestive. It consists in the fact that a number of stanzas (see pages 752–3) are without the proper initials, while the alphabetical succession, when it resumes, is found to have omitted the middle letters of the alphabet. But this corresponds with the structure and thought of the poem: the acrostic effect disappears where the psalm passes into sextets and remonstrance, and is resumed where it returns to quatrains and triumph.

Dramatic Anthems. Under this technical description I include a group of psalms, few in number (ix–x, xxvii, lxxxv, cxliv, and perhaps cviii), but of great interest to the student of literary morphology. They exhibit a peculiar combination of dramatic movement with the lyric form of anthem. They are so far dramatic that they present a dramatic transition from trouble to relief. But they differ from the dramatic psalms (see on iii) in an important particular. In the nature of things, dramatic movement, which actually presents and not merely describes, can never go backward in time: yet these poems commence with the deliverance, then deal with trouble, and then again with deliverance. The explanation is the combination with dramatic movement of the lyric form of 'anthem': I use the term as a further elaboration of the 'hymn,' the purpose of which is to celebrate. These poems, then, commence with a lyric celebration of a deliverance; as one item in this celebration they then pass to a dramatic presentation of the trouble from which the speaker has been delivered, such, for example, as his actual prayer in his distress (hence the quotation marks); then the dramatic change of movement is made by a sudden return to the first tone of celebration. The triple structure is thus:

Lyric triumph of deliverance from trouble
The trouble dramatically recalled
The Triumph resumed.

In all cases the changes in structure are reflected in changes of rhythm. This type of structure is especially clear in psalm xxvii. After [antistrophic] monody of triumph the speaker passes to the presentation of his past trouble [stanzas with lead]: this dramatic recalling of the past is kept up until the effort becomes insupportable, and the singer returns to the opening tone [and rhythm] of triumph with the words, I had fainted unless, etc. — In lxxxv the nation celebrates [stanza with lead] return from captivity; then passes to dramatic presentation of that captivity in the form of prayer for deliverance [sextets]; then resumes triumph [stanzas with lead]. — In cxliv the Anthem form is in keeping with the 'mosaic' character of the poem. The stages are clear: triumph [quatrain with lead], the trouble presented in prayer for help [triplets with refrain], the triumph resumed in a new song [quatrains], the old refrain interrupting. The peculiarity of this example — that the refrain of the dramatic portion invades the final triumph, making a momentary return to the past trouble — renders it a link between the other cases and that of ix–x, which is a complete duplication of the structure:

Triumph of Judgment
The oppression dramatically recalled Triumph resumed
Oppression again recalled in different dramatic mode Triumph finally resumed.

[Compare the way in which psalm xxxi duplicates the structure of the dramatic psalms: note on iii.]

ix–x. An Acrostic Anthem of Judgment: the essential structure has just been described in the general note. More particularly: Triumph in the general judgment of God is celebrated [in acrostic quatrains] — dramatic presentation of the oppression [sextet] in the sufferer's cry, changing in the last line to sudden relief — triumph [and acrostic quatrains] resumed — return to presentation of oppression [sextets, with acrostic structure dropped] in general remonstrance under trouble and appeal — triumph [and acrostic quatrains] resumed, at first in a more expectant appeal (Arise, O God), and at last in full celebration.

xi. In this Song of Trust a simple stanza of confidence in God interrupts itself at the end of a single line to rehearse indignantly the threats of the unbelieving: these threats are answered, rhythm for rhythm, with the thought expressed by a modern poet in the lines:

God's in his heaven,
All's right with the world.

The stanza of simple trust is then calmly resumed and concluded. [The form is Suspension: see page 1524.]

xii. Upon the sufferer's prayer against the men of vanity there breaks a Divine word of judgment: the blessedness of this Divine word is felt to be in itself a deliverance, and thus the poem may be reckoned among the dramatic psalms (see on iii). [Quatrains.]

xiii. A simple prayer in trouble: appeal and trust. [Quatrains.]

xiv. A rhapsodic picture of judgment. A world is displayed as totally corrupt; a stanza expresses the Divine astonishment at the blindness of the wicked; in the next stanza this very thought in the bosom of Deity is seen to reveal itself as panic spreading among the wicked on earth. A final stanza resolves the whole poem into a fancy picture, with a sigh that it might become a reality! Or this last stanza may be a postscript: compare li, cxxx, cxxxi. [Triplet stanzas.]

xv. This is a variant on the first part of psalm xxiv (see note), enlarging into a meditation what is there an anthem. [Structure: modified envelopment: see page 1523.]

xvi

The simple couplet of introduction opens the two elements of the thought:

Preserve me, O God:
For in thee do I put my trust.

A strophe develops the idea of trust in a solemn consecration to the cause of God and his saints; the antistrophe expresses confidence and joy in the sense of a preservation that shall extend beyond Sheol itself. [Antistrophic in strains (5, 5), with introduction.]

The great difficulty of the psalm is the question whether its concluding lines are to be read as implying an immortal life beyond the grave. A strong presumption against such interpretation is the doubt about the very existence of such a conception in the poetry of the Old Testament; only a few ambiguous or obscure passages are claimed for it, while the constant trend of Hebrew thought is to look to long life in this world, and again to life renewed in posterity, as the supreme blessings. In the other two notable passages of the psalms where the topic is approached I have decided for myself against an allusion to immortality (see notes on xlix and lxxiii). In the present case it is less easy to come to a decision: if a future life is not implied, what can the meaning be? for the suggestion of mere preservation from death seems obviously insufficient. It must be remembered, however, that 'life after death' covers two very different conceptions. One is the modern conception of a new spiritual existence commencing with the death of the body; this is so fundamental and revolutionary a faith that it is difficult to believe any people could hold it without its being prominent in their literature. But the phrase covers another conception which was almost universal in early ages — the idea that our present existence does not come entirely to an end with death; as the dead body takes time to crumble into dust, so the soul passed into lower stages of consciousness, as to the end of which imagination seldom explored. This conception often appears in Job; and one passage of this poem may be placed side by side with psalm xvi for the sake of contrast:

And thou destroyest the hope of man;
Thou prevailest for ever against him, and he passeth;
Thou changest his countenance and sendest him away;
His sons come to honour, and he knoweth it not;
And they are brought low, but he perceiveth it not of them;
Only for himself his flesh hath pain,
And for himself his soul mourneth.

With this picture of half existence and blind misery for the prevailing conception of the grave, we can appreciate the poet of the present psalm, and his faith that with God at his right hand he will descend without terror into corruption itself, confident in the paradox that even thence will be found a path of life, — nay, the presence of God in that region is itself sufficient to make pleasures for evermore. — Compare Job's struggles at times for a similar faith (Introduction, page 1494).

xvii

This Prayer [in quatrains] combines personal consecration to the cause of righteousness with a cry for the vindication of this cause against its enemies, the connecting link being a purifying visitation of God, in virtue of which the psalmist dares to appeal on the ground of equity for his vindication. — I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with thy likeness. A modern reader must be very cautious not to put into such expressions as this the New Testament conception of the resurrection from death. (On the general subject compare note to the previous psalm.) I understand the clause when I awake as an example of Direct Metaphor, though of a kind less distinct than those enumerated in the note on that subject (page 1534). It may be compared with another phrase of frequent occurrence in biblical poetry, in the morning: both rest upon the concealed imagery of night changing to day to express a sense of trouble and its passing away in deliverance. In its fullest expression the image may be seen in such passages as these:

Weeping may tarry for the night, but joy cometh in the morning (Psalm xxx. 5)
At eventide behold terror, and before the morning they are not: this is the portion of them that spoil us, etc. (Isaiah, chapter xvii. 14) and the whole spirit of Isaiah, chapters viii, ix: the people who walked in darkness seeing great light. In the more subdued form of metaphor, it may be traced in these passages:

The upright shall have dominion over them in the morning — (i.e. when the doom is fallen, and the crisis is past: Psalm xlix. 14)
I will sing aloud of thy mercy in the morning — cause me to hear thy lovingkindness in the morning (Psalms lix. 16 and cxliii. 8). Compare psalm xc. 14.

How entirely the idea of night and morning can be identified with the crisis of doom is seen in such passages as these:

At daybreak shall the king of Israel be utterly cut off (Hosea, chapter x. 15)
If they speak not according to this word, surely there is no morning for them (Isaiah, chapter viii. 20)
The morning is come on thee (A.V. rendering of Ezekiel, chapter vii. 7).

With this accepted metaphor of morning for the interposition of providence and assertion of the cause of right, we may paraphrase the last two lines of psalm xvi: I shall yet again trace the hand of God in the vindication of right; I shall be satisfied, when I have passed through the cloud of trouble, with a resemblance of Divine order in the course of events. The antithesis of the last stanza is not between the end of the wicked and the end of the righteous; but between the secular ideals of the enemy (mirth of life, and treasure to leave their children when they die), and the psalmist's spiritual ideal, the vindication of right.

xviii. This is a magnificent ode [in strophic structure : introduction, conclusion, and three unequal strophes]. After the introductory ejaculations of triumph, the first strophe pictures the deliverance: at the prayer of the afflicted one all nature is convulsed as the Almighty rushes to the rescue. The second meditates on the principle involved: with the deliverance of the speaker the whole cause of the righteous has triumphed. The third extends this triumph and the confidence it produces to the whole past and future.

xix. Antistrophic form is here applied to the antithesis (it might almost be called an apposition) between the revelation of God in the Heavens above and in the Law within. The question whether the author of this poem in its present form incorporated a lyric of an earlier age cannot affect the literary unity of the whole. The union of the two ideas has impressed the most diverse thinkers of diverse ages. Zoroaster has it (Yasna, xxxi. 9):

> He who first planned that these skies should be clothed with lights,
> He by his wisdom is creator of Righteousness, wherewith to support the best mind.

It was a saying of the German Kant that the starry heavens above and the moral law within him were the perpetual wonders to his soul. So Wordsworth, addressing Duty:

> Thou dost preserve the stars from wrong;
> And the most ancient heavens through thee are fresh and strong.

In a modified form the same combination inspires the companion psalms ciii, civ, which celebrate the God of the world within and the world without. For the device of setting two contrasted thoughts side by side without any connecting words, compare psalms xxxvi and cxxvii. — More in detail: we have first the general revelation of the heavens, wordless but extending their sphere (image of the measuring line) over the whole earth; then this specialises to the sun as the chief figure in this world-wide revelation; again, there is general celebration of the Law of the Lord, and recognition of its special function to warn against sin: a conclusion dedicates the whole meditation to God. [Antistrophic interlacing (in lines): 8, 6; 8, 6: with conclusion.]

xx–xxi. An Antiphonal War Anthem: compare psalms lx and cviii. The first part gives the prayers of King and People before the battle [Strophic structure in strains]: the second the thanksgivings after the victory [Antistrophic in couplets: 7, 7].

xxii. One of the most magnificent of the dramatic psalms: compare note to iii [Three stanzas of eleven strains each.] 'Forsaken of God' is the starting point: the first stanza contrasts the holy God, enthroned upon the praises of past deliverances, and the sufferer, a mere worm, whose forsaken lot increases the scorn of his foes; yet the same God has been his protector from his helpless infancy. — With the second stanza the trouble intensifies: the thought alternates between external foes (with a massing of imagery from wild beasts and robbers) and internal trouble (all expressions of bodily collapse massed together): the stanza quickens to a cry in the very agony of crisis, and then in the middle of a sentence the shout of deliverance is heard. — The third stanza calls for universal rejoicing: from the psalmist himself, from the meek, the seekers after the Lord, the kindreds of the nations, those in the vigour of life, the dying, the very shades, and the succession of these on earth to all generations. — They pierced my hands and my feet. Cheyne understands of dogs biting. Or it may be of robbers binding their victim; so in cv: his feet they hurt with fetters.

xxiii. In this most popular of sacred lyrics the thought of Jehovah's protection is developed, first by the single image of the shepherd and his flock, expanded in detail; then by a rapid succession of images: the plentiful supply of food in spite of a blockading enemy, the hospitable feast with its wine and anointing, and (perhaps) the stream of goodness following the singer through the desert of life. [Structure: modified envelopment, see page 1523.]

Anthems for the Inauguration of Jerusalem. Five anthems may be traced in the psalms as fitting into the historic account of the Inauguration by King David of the newly captured fortress of Jerusalem. Compare in II Samuel, chapter vi, the description of the military and choral procession.

> And David went and brought up the ark of God from the house of Obed-Edom into the city of David with joy. And it was so, that when they that bare the ark of the LORD had gone six paces, he sacrificed an ox and a fatling. And David danced before the LORD with all his might; and David was girded with a linen ephod.
> Anthem: Psalm xxx.
> So David and all the house of Israel brought UP the ark of the LORD with shouting, and with the sound of the trumpet.
> Anthem at the foot of the hill: Psalm xxiv. 1–6.
> Anthem before the gates of the city: Psalm xxiv. 7–10.
> . . . And they brought in the ark of the LORD, and set it in its place, in the midst of the tent that David had pitched for it: and David offered burnt offerings and peace offerings before the LORD.
> Anthem: Psalm cxxxii. 1–9.
> . . . So all the people departed every one to his house. Then David returned to bless his household.
> Anthem: Psalm ci.

The institution of a sacrifice and a sacred dance of unusual exuberance at the point where the procession had only moved six paces from the start is explained by the incident of Uzzah's violent death, which had made a tragic ending to the attempt three months previously to bring the ark to Jerusalem. In the interim David had made diligent inquiry as to the prescribed ritual for the escort of the ark (I Chronicles, chapter xiii. 12 and xv): yet commenced this second attempt with keen anxiety. The six paces were sufficient to signify that the ban was removed: hence the ritual of thanksgiving and vehement rejoicing. An exact anthem for such an occasion is afforded by psalm xxx: a sense of sudden deliverance and escape from impending death, and this just when feelings of immovable prosperity (through the capture of the impregnable Jerusalem) had been quenched by sudden withdrawal of the Divine favour (the matter of Uzzah's death). This identification finds some support in the traditional title of the psalm: A Song at the Dedication of the House; a Psalm of David.

The first part of psalm xxiv makes a suitable anthem to be sung on this occasion at the foot of the hill on which Jerusalem stands (compare: brought up the ark). The entrance of the ark was about to make the heathen stronghold the hill of Jehovah: the procession pauses to ask, Who is worthy to take part in this sacred inauguration? This identification is assisted by psalm xv, which is a variant to this second anthem. Both poems ask the same question: but psalm xv, a general meditation, phrases it in general terms, Who shall sojourn . . . dwell? whereas the anthem sung for this particular occasion at the foot of the hill has the natural expression, Who shall ascend? The independent meditation, moreover, naturally expands in fuller terms the answering description of moral purity as preparation for worship.

The central ceremony of this day of inauguration would be the anthem in front of the gates, and for this purpose the second part of psalm xxiv seems eminently suitable. The whole is a combination of military and religious ceremonial. The suggested anthem is constructed on a military basis (1) of a city summoned to receive a conqueror, and (2) of the phrase The Lord of Hosts as a watchword. For the latter note the prominence of the phrase in II Samuel, chapter vi (the ark . . . which is called by the Name, even the Name of the LORD of Hosts . . . David blessed the people in the Name of the LORD of Hosts). Part of the priestly host represent the Wardens within the city: the rest of the choir, with the army, call upon the ancient fortress to receive the King of Glory, and are answered from within by the challenge, Who is the King of Glory? They answer (avoiding the great Name) with other titles of Jehovah. The watchword has not been spoken, and the gates refuse to open. The summons is repeated, and the same challenge from within is heard: at last the watchword of The LORD of Hosts is shouted, and the ancient gates open, to receive the ark of Jehovah. The Jebusite city has thus become the City of Jehovah. It is sometimes urged that this anthem would suit any conquering expedition returning to Jerusalem. It would be appropriate enough for subsequent occasions as a repetition of the city's Inaugural Hymn: but for its first production no occasion could have such adequateness as this which constituted 'the City of David' as Jehovah's City.

Next, the history describes the bearing of the ark into the tabernacle temporarily provided for it by the king: here again there is an offering, and an anthem seems required. Nothing can be more suitable than the first part of psalm cxxxii: indeed it is difficult to imagine any other occasion to fit the words of that psalm. There is first the recital of David's anxious care and vows in reference to preparing a tabernacle for his God; then is suggested a search for the ark and the finding of it in the field of the wood (a translation of Kiriath-jearim: compare I Chronicles, chapter xiii. 5). Then follows a variant of the Levitical formula (compare Numbers, x. 36 and 33) for the journeys of the ark, a verse which appears in Solomon's Dedication of the Temple (II Chronicles, chapter vi. 41). Thus far is the anthem for David's Tabernacle: what follows is the addition made to it when the Tabernacle of David gives place to the Temple of Solomon. The second part of psalm cxxxii, like the first, consists of quatrain stanzas with a triplet lead; its matter follows II Samuel, chapter vii. 12–17, which associates the building of the Temple of Solomon with the promise made to him and his seed.

When the more public ceremonial is completed and the army dismissed, then, the history says, David returned to bless his household. A suitable form of blessing for the king's household on this day of inauguration is psalm ci: vows of purity are made by the king for himself, for his immediate circle, and for his administration of justice. Though the matter of the song would suit other rulers, yet the final line up to which the rest works as a climax — could never have such appropriateness as for the day on which the Jebusite fortress had been inaugurated as Jehovah's own metropolis. Another link is: Oh when wilt thou come unto me? compare II Samuel, vi. 9: David . . . said, How shall the ark of the LORD come unto me? and Exodus, chapter xx. 24: In every place where I record my name I will come unto thee and I will bless thee. The reception of the ark had just made David's city a place where God recorded his name, in the sense of the passage of Exodus.

These suggested identifications mutually support one another. The objection that the matter of these psalms is in advance of the spiritual character of David's age seems to me an argument of very uncertain force. We have first to assign to David's age its literary products before we can determine its spiritual tone; and in received methods of such historical inquiry there has been, in the opinion of the present editor, far too little attention given to arguments based on literary form and structure.

xxiv. The two Anthems which make up this psalm have just been fully discussed. It may be added that those who object to the identification with the Inauguration of Jerusalem are burdened with the difficulty of explaining how such different lyrics come to be included in the same poem. Blunders of copyists must not be made the scapegoat too often. [The structure of I is antiphonal and antistrophic in strains: 3, 3. That of II is also antiphonal, and has antistrophic interlacing: summons, challenge and answer; summons, challenge and answer; each a single strain.]

xxv

Liturgies. A large number of the psalms are 'liturgical,' that is, associated with 'Divine Service': but four may be classified as complete Liturgies (xxv, xl, lxv, lxxxvi). The essence of a liturgy is that it combines different moods of devotion. In a modern religious service of the simplest kind a congregation of worshippers will stand to sing praise, will kneel in prayer, will sit to hear exhortation: three different moods of worship, reflected in different postures of the worshippers, succeed one another without connecting links, and the whole is considered to constitute a single act of worship. In the same way the psalms enumerated above lack the unity of thought which runs through other poems; but are found to convey in succession supplication, praise, confession of faith, and similar devotional acts: each psalm is a complete liturgy in itself.

The great type of the class is lxv. Here we find brief ejaculations of praise, of prayer, of penitence, in successive couplets. Then there is a larger space given to devout aspiration: the devotion which, in the middle ages, found satisfaction in a monastic life, expresses itself in the psalter in longing to dwell in the house of God. A larger group of verses meditates upon the answer in righteousness: one expression for the Hebrew 'judgment,' our providence: the rule of God over the universe and its peoples. This constitutes an act of faith: counterpart to the creed of a modern liturgy. The psalm passes then into its final mood of adoration, celebrating the work of God in nature and the changing year, from the preparing of the soil to the crowning harvest and rejoicing pastures.

Psalm lxxxvi presents four moods of devotion: supplication with penitence, faith, praise, and again supplication. — Psalm xl has the three divisions of thanksgiving, faith, and supplication. (See note to this psalm for further discussion.) — Psalm xxv has the four divisions of supplication, penitence, confession of faith, and again supplication.

xxv. An Acrostic Liturgy, as described above. [Strophic structure in strains: 5, 6, 3, 7, and a final strain which may be a postscript.] -- For Acrostic psalms, see note to ix–x.

xxvi. In interpreting this psalm account must be taken of the envelope figure (see page 1523) on which it is constructed: thus the three stanzas must be read in the light of the opening and close. The psalmist appeals to the Searcher of hearts: not in spiritual vainglory, but (as the last line makes clear) by way of preparation for public worship. Before the Divine examiner he is able to claim in the past and present his standing aside from evil, and he prays for the future. This makes a washing of the hands in innocency, by which he feels prepared for the service of God's altar. — Compare psalms xv, xvii, and cxxxix. [Structure: modified envelopment and three sextets.]

xxvii. This has been discussed in the note on ix–x and Dramatic Anthems. [Structure: the Triumph, antistrophic in couplets (6, 6) — the Trouble recalled, quatrains with couplet lead — the Triumph resumed in a brief echo of the first rhythm.]

xxviii. A simple example of the dramatic psalm: see note on iii. Personal trouble with cries for judgment on the wicked finds sudden relief. [Quatrains.]

xxix. This Song of the Thunderstorm is constructed upon the envelope figure: the opening and closing quatrains are subjective, conveying the feelings of the poet observer, first, as the signs of the coming storm move him to thoughts of the grandeur of God; then at the close, when he feels himself enveloped in the peace of God's protection. The intervening triplets are objective, and realise a thunderstorm, rising out of the waters, sweeping through the forests, dying away over the wilderness, and leaving a freshness which makes nature seem like a temple where all things are crying Glory. The voice of the LORD has made a crashing refrain for this body of the poem, seven times repeated. — The LORD sat as king at the flood: although the expression in the original is peculiar to the Genesis account of the Deluge, yet it seems impossible to see in this place an allusion to an historic event. The flood is either the waters from which the tempest arose; or it is an expression suggesting the fountains of the deep broken up, and the opening of the windows of heaven, which were an element in the description of the Deluge, and which threaten to recur in every furious tempest.

xxx. This has been discussed as one among the Anthems for the Inauguration of Jerusalem: see note on xxiv. [Structure: antistrophic alternation (in lines): 6, 6; 3, 3; 4, 4.] xxxi. This has been noted amongst the dramatic psalms (see on iii) as a variation by which the usual transition from trouble to relief is twice presented. It is thus a 'Twice-told Deliverance'; and there is a pendulum-like swaying between two thoughts which is a marked characteristic of Hebrew poetry. At first [in three quatrains] we have reiterated expressions of trust in trouble, with imagery from the rock, the house of defence, the fortress, the net; the relief [a single quatrain] appears as a setting in a large place. The rhythm then changes to triplets, and the trouble is expressed in an intensified form; the pendulum spirit of the whole extends to the swaying to and fro between suggestions of internal wasting and of external foes. With the burst of relief there is a return to quatrain rhythm [varied: aabb instead of abbb]; the imagery is that of the pavilion of peace and the strong city.

xxxii. Simple form [quatrains] conveys a simple experience of sin, confession, forgiveness. The close is a joyous trust: a Divine word of guidance is heard, and the psalmist bids listen submissively.

Festal Hymns. The distinctiveness of the hymn as a lyric type may be expressed by this formula: Given a certain mood of devotion, to find for it matter. Festal Hymns voice the mood proper to any high feast day; I have so classified xxxiii, xlvii; with these may be read the Festal Anthems xcv–c, cxlv–cl, and the Festal Response lxvii. The characteristic form running through these is some alternation between words of praise and matter upon which the praise is to be founded. Thus in the present case there is an opening and closing stanza of praise; the intervening parts are antistrophic — the strophe celebrating Jehovah as God of the whole world, the antistrophe Israel as his chosen people. [Opening and closing sextets, enveloping a strophe and antistrophe of four quatrains each.]

xxxiv

Votive Hymns. The Votive Hymns of the Bible have all the same character: a personal is merged in a general thanksgiving. This is the character of the traditional Votive Hymns preserved in the historical books (e.g. of Hannah, I Samuel, chapter ii; of Mary and Zacharias, Luke, chapter i); the amount of matter these contain irrelevant to the special circumstances, which is often made an objection against their genuineness, is thus a regular feature of Hebrew thanksgiving. In the Book of Psalms the Votive Hymns are xxxiv, lxvi, xcii; and the succession (cxiii–cxviii) which makes the so called Egyptian Hallel, a sort of Votive Hymn-book. — In xxxiv the union of personal and general is effected in the simplest manner, by an antiphony between Solo and Chorus. After an introduction, the Solo leads off with personal mercies (I sought the Lord, this and that man cried, etc.): the Chorus generalises to them that fear the Lord. Then the individual experience is widened by the Solo into a lesson for the whole of life; this is generalised by the Chorus. More briefly then personal and general thanksgiving conclude the hymn. [Antiphonal and antistrophic (couplets): 8, 8; 8, 8; 4, 4: with introduction. The psalm is acrostic (see on ix–x) and has the same acrostic peculiarity as xxv; viz. that one letter is omitted, and one repeated at the end.]

xxxv

Litanies. The term 'litany,' which I have used in the titles to psalms xxxv, lv, lxx, cxxix, is not to be pressed as denoting a distinct literary form; but the four poems have a suggestion of liturgical character in the combination of tones they successively exhibit. In all of them there is an interchange between humble prayer and fierce execration of the foe: this is, on the whole, more suggestive of public ceremonial than of private meditation. The movement of xxxv is especially well marked. It has three lengthy stanzas: in each there is a combination of prayer, execration, and vows. The first stanza starts in military imagery with a cry for succour from oppressive foes. This is succeeded by a burst of execration against the oppressor, military imagery blending with that of the wind and chaff, of the hunter caught in his own net. There is then a vow of praise. In the second stanza execration is modified into a picture of the enemy, and how they rewarded evil for good; there is again a brief cry for succour and vow of praise. The third stanza resumes the prayer for succour in oppression, military imagery now blending with ideas of mockery (all this change of imagery assisting the general character of the poem); there is an appeal for a judgment that will clothe the oppressor with shame and set the righteous shouting; another vow of praise makes the conclusion. It will be felt that this recurrent interchange between prayer, execration, and vow favours the description of the psalm as a public litany rather than a private meditation. [Structure: three stanzas of nine strains each.] xxxvi. Here, as in psalm xix, antistrophic form is applied to an antithesis or apposition: in this case between the supreme realisation of evil in the wicked life, and the infinite good of Jehovah. First we have the wicked as he is in essence, and as he realises himself in a life of iniquity. Similarly, the antistrophe celebrates God in his essential attributes, and as the beneficent power of the whole created world. For conclusion, the psalmist looks to God as the source of all, and places himself under his lovingkindness; he separates himself from the wicked, and their judgment. [Antistrophic (in lines): 4 a, 5 b; 4 a, 5 b: with conclusion.] — The transgression of the wicked uttereth its oracle within his heart: a powerful expression, turning of course on the idea of oracles as the utterances of God. There are three stages of moral decline: at first the sinner has to sin in the teeth of the remonstrances of conscience; then conscience is dead and he sins peaceably; there is a lower depth when conscience takes the side of evil, and its secret promptings replace the 'oracles' of God: evil has now become the sinner's good.

There is plausibility in the suggestion that this group of consecutive psalms forms one of the psalters within the psalter: a collection of notable Psalms of Affliction and Deliverance, with the usual acrostic meditation by way of preface — in this case a meditation on the ways of providence in apparently granting prosperity to the wicked, and afflicting the righteous.

xxxvii. A gnomic Meditation, with acrostic structure. [For the latter, see on ix–x.] The doctrine of the insecure prosperity of the wicked, so difficult to faith in view of the facts of life, is supported by a tour de force of gnomic sayings woven together; the meditative poise of mind is kept even by reiteration of similar expressions — images of peace and a quiet mind, the wicked cut down like a tree, uprooted that its place knows it no more, his day is coming, I have seen . . . Where enumeration is so large a part of the thought, the acrostic structure is a distinct assistance: it suggests supporting truths recurring with the regularity of the alphabet. [Acrostic quatrains.]

xxxviii. In this prayer of distress antistrophic form is applied to present separately what in the psalms of trouble are usually mingled together: internal trouble — wounds, corruption, iniquity, burning, groans, throbs, a plague from which all flee — and external foes, before which the speaker is passive from consciousness of sin. He repents of his sin, but the foes pursue him because he is a follower of good. [Antistrophic (in strains): 10, 10.]

xxxix. A struggle with despair. What in the first strophe the psalmist has been struggling to keep down is despair of life, which in a follower of God is equivalent to sin; in the antistrophe the trouble is too strong, and he breaks out: Let me know the worst. (Compare Job's wife: Renounce God and die.) — With a slight change in rhythm and thought, a second strophe places hope in God: the psalmist acknowledges God's righteous stroke, but it is consuming him (his punishment is greater than he can bear). The antistrophe pleads how at best man is but a sojourner, and for a respite before the end. (A very close parallel in Job, section 10.) [Antistrophic alternation (in strains): 4, 4; 3, 3.]

xl. A Liturgy (see on xxv) in three moods: thanksgiving, confession of faith, supplication. In the first strophe deliverance from trouble has put a new song in the psalmist's mouth; the antistrophe contains the new song, which, like the votive hymns, mingles personal and general praise. — We then pass to a confession of faith. Here form becomes very important for interpretation. Antistrophic structure is modified by parenthetic enlargement, which plays so prominent a part in Hezekiah's Song of Thanksgiving (see page 1574). The creed so announced is the supremacy of praise over sacrifice and offering; it is a new faith, generated out of this experience of affliction and relief. Accordingly, while the antistrophic lines are putting the doctrine, the parenthetic clauses are bringing out the newness of the thought: how (by the affliction) the psalmist's ears were opened to a new conception, how he finds it in the law itself, how it has passed as a law into his very heart, how, finally, he cannot refrain his lips from this meed of praise. — The transition into the mood of perfectly general supplication indicates how entirely liturgical is the whole psalm. Here external and internal trouble are combined; a strophe of pleading is balanced by an antistrophe of execration; a refrain (enlarged as repeated) keeps the whole to the tone of supplication. [Antistrophic alternation (in lines): 6, 6; 4, 4 with parenthetic enlargements; 5, 5 with refrain, enlarging.]

xli. The common topic of trouble and relief appears in a new light: integrity of life, shown, for example, in goodness to the poor, brings deliverance even in the midst of punishment for actual transgressions. [Strophic structure (in strains); 3, 7, 2.]

xlii–iii. I have already, in the note on Direct Metaphor (above, page 1535), discussed this poem, and expressed, not without doubt, the opinion that the local expressions at the commencement of the second stanza need not mean the actual exile of the speaker, but may be exile used as an image. The one positive element in the situation is exile from the house of God: the usual Hebrew thought of the devout life here appears on its elegiac side. The poem is made up of three stanzas, with a refrain: the words of the refrain are unaltered, but with the movement of the poem its thought seems to change. [Compare lvii.] The first stanza breathes unbroken despondency: we have trouble and longing, panting, thirsting, tears, and taunts, with memories as a climax. With the opening of the second stanza the despondency deepens: when he would remember his God the psalmist feels himself, as it were, thrust away to an outermost distance; plunged deeper and deeper by some cataract, as the echo of its fall goes down. Just in the centre of the poem there is a faint break in the despondency: we hear of songs in the night, reproaches to the God who forgets the foe that is equally his own foe. From such reproach the third stanza rises to an appeal for judgment against the foes, who are then a nation opposed to God: the nascent hope has strengthened from songs in the night to the breaking out of light, and we regain the leading and pictured procession to the altar of God. The refrain can now be indued with a sense of pure hope. [Three stanzas of five strains each, with refrain.]

xliv. A National Elegy. I have already noted (page 1523) the beautiful effect of Diminution, by which the antistrophic stanzas of this poem diminish from five to four, to three, to two couplets, as a mode of conveying elegiac tone. National trouble is seen in the light of past glory:

The works of our fathers' days.
The song of the fathers.
Present humiliation, from our own side.
The same, as seen by the foes.
Protest that we have not been false to the covenant.
Appeal to the Searcher of hearts.
Awake against the oppressor!
Awake for the afflicted!

[Antistrophic alternation (in couplets): 5, 5; 4, 4; 3, 3; 2, 2.]

xlv. A Royal Marriage Hymn. Antistrophic form is appropriately applied to bridegroom and bride. First, we have the royal bridegroom described: the grace of the warrior and his majestic career in the cause of equity. His procession fills up the rest of the strophe, with suggestions of perfume and music, and, as chief of the suite, the queen-mother and her attendants. (So I understand the Queen in gold of Ophir: compare the prominence of the king's mother in the technical enumerations of Kings; compare also Judges, chapter v. 28.) The antistrophe similarly presents the bride in her wedding apparel, with her suite of virgins, and adds thoughts of wifely submission and offspring. [Antistrophic (in strains): 8, 8: with introduction.]

xlvi

Occasional Hymns, or Hymns for Special Occasions. Besides the Anthems for the Inauguration of Jerusalem (see on xxiv), there is a group of psalms, the whole tenor and form of which suggest the celebration of a special event — the overthrow of Sennacherib's army, and sudden deliverance of Jerusalem. These psalms are xlvi, xlviii, lxxvi: Professor Kirkpatrick would add xlvii, especially in view of its position; but this last follows so exactly the model of the general Festal Hymns (see on xxxiii) that I do not see how it can be specialised to any one occasion. The form of xlvi is a shout of refrain, to which successive stanzas supply matter. [The refrain has been omitted in ordinary versions after the third verse: there have been similar omissions in lxvii and xcix.] The first refrain is parenthetic, the thought of the first stanza running over into the second. We have rocking mountains and swelling seas: in contrast, the quiet of a river, that embraces a city with God in its midst. Again, we have nations and kingdoms rising in storm: a word from God, and the very ground melts under their feet. The third stanza opens with a bold change of thought: Behold God as the desolator: war is desolation, but Jehovah is the destroyer of war! As a climax, God speaks his own exaltation over the nations. [Three stanzas of three strains each, with refrain.]

xlvii. A Festal Hymn (see on xxxiii). Its general purpose will thus be to glorify the God of the whole earth; more specifically, it celebrates him as if ascending from the conquest of the whole world. Ejaculations of praise and triumph alternate with matter for praise: a world subdued, and princes of peoples added to the people of Abraham. [Pendulum structure: see page 1523.]

xlviii. One of the Sennacherib psalms: see on xlvi. Simple joy over the delivered city — description of the enemy's panic — thanksgiving in the temple — sense of freedom in again walking about outside the city, counting the towers, as if to see that all were really safe. [Sextets.]

xlix. An introduction to this poem calls deep attention to a parable and dark saying: the dark saying is then expounded in strophe and antistrophe, emphasised by (varying) refrain, which are to be read, not as mystery and solution, but as two stages in the complete development of a truth. The whole thought is, the Vanity of Splendour in the light of inevitable death. Why fear the wicked? there is no redeeming with all his wealth a single soul: wisdom, folly, wealth, all perish. In the antistrophe there is an emphasis of contrast: but it is not the contrast between the destiny of the wicked and the righteous, nor does it bring this and a future life into antithesis. It is difficult for a modern reader not to understand this last in the lines:

> But God will redeem my soul from the power of Sheol:
> For he shall receive me.

Yet such interpretation is impossible: the conception of a future existence redressing the inequalities of this life is certainly not such a tenet of old Hebrew poets that it could be alluded to here, without statement or discussion. Moreover, if such were the thought, it must surely continue to dominate the rest of the psalm, which on the contrary finds its final climax in the loss by the wicked of their earthly glory. (Compare on xvi; and contrast the elaborate pictures of the wicked and the righteous in The Wisdom of Solomon, where the doctrine of immortality has come in.) The antithesis, as Professor Cheyne points out, is between God redeeming the righteous from death, and the none can redeem himself applied to the wicked. While the prosperous are living in their confidence, they are all the while a flock of sheep being led forward by the shepherd Death; when the crisis of visitation is passed it is the upright who will be seen in exaltation, and the prosperous wicked as their fallen foes [this is the effect of in the morning: compare above, note to xvii]; they will be consuming to nothing in the abyss, while God has redeemed the righteous from the fatal visitation, and left him in life and favour. Hence the variation in the refrain: the strophe puts the inevitable dispensation of death (man in honour abideth not), the antistrophe, by contrast of the righteous saved when the wicked are overtaken, puts meaning into the Divine dispensation (man that is in honour and understandeth not, etc.). [Antistrophic (in lines): 16, 16 with (varying) refrain and introduction. A parenthetic couplet marks strophe and antistrophe, appearing (by 'variation': page 1519) at different places in each.]

l. This magnificent Vision has been fully discussed above, page 1522.

li. This is an appeal for deliverance, not as in most psalms from trouble, but from sense of sin. There is a progression of thought through successive stanzas, if, as in the text, an arrangement in sextets be followed, instead of the usual division into quatrains. The appeal is only to God's mercy: the sin is wholly acknowledged — God is only just; the penitent is nothing but iniquity — purification is claimed to the inward depths — more than this, a restoration that will blot out the past and create new power for the future — restoration will bring joy, and an energy overflowing in bringing back others — summary: it must be God who shall do it all, there is no sacrifice, but the sacrifice of the spirit. — A postscript (in different rhythm) makes fresh application to national ruin and restoration. [Sextet stanzas: postscript, a quatrain; or possibly this should be divided as two strains.]

lii. A typical Song of Judgment: antistrophic form presents the oppressor, and the oppressor overthrown. A doxology concludes. [Antistrophic (in strains): 4, 4: with conclusion.]

liii. This is a duplicate of xiv, with God substituted for The LORD. There is a considerable change in stanza five.

liv. A dramatic psalm (see on iii), presenting trouble and relief. [Strophic structure (in strains): 5, 2.]

lv. This litany (see on xxxv) has been already analysed in the note on Interruption (pages 1523–4). [Stanzas of sextets (the last varied) interrupted by antistrophic structure in couplets): 8, 8.]

lvi. A simple dramatic psalm (see on iii), presenting trouble and relief. In the first strophe the phraseology suggests war, in the second persecution: this may be understood by making the whole a national monologue, or (what is usual in such psalms) the idealising of the trouble. [Strophic structure (in strains): 3 and refrain, 5 and refrain; and, after the dramatic break, 2.] lvii. A very striking example of the antistrophic form applied to the presentation of trouble and relief. As with xlii–iii, there is a refrain which, though unaltered in words, takes a different spirit from the two strophes to which it is attached. The trouble is generalised; and the break comes suddenly (compare xxii), in the middle of the first stanza of the antistrophe. [Antistrophic (in stanzas): 3, 3: with refrain.]

lviii. This Song of Judgment is a vehement remonstrance addressed to 'judges' — a vague O.T. term for ruling powers in general. The form is antistrophic. The strophe apostrophises indignantly the delinquent 'judges' themselves, and then elaborates a picture of moral disorder, with four striking images: exact measurement applied to iniquity, monstrosity (creatures born lying), the serpent whose venom is natural, the adder deaf to softening influences. The antistrophe balances this with a passionate execration, followed by an extended picture of destruction in four images: melting snows, a snail melting into slime as it crawls, an abortion, a boiling pot swept away, fire and all, by the desert whirlwind before the sticks have had time to catch. A conclusion expresses the rejoicing of the righteous. [Antistrophic (in lines): 2a, 7b; 2a, 7b: with conclusion.]

lix. A vigorous War Ballad, somewhat obscure from our want of knowledge of the circumstances referred to. Probably, although the language is not quite clear, it is to be reckoned as a dramatic psalm (see on iii), the dramatic break commencing with the last two stanzas of page 793. The picture is apparently that of a rabble foe: not only do we find the word heathen, but there are suggestions of a barbarous tongue [belch out with their mouth — make a noise like a dog — swords are in their lips: compare cxx], and nomad ways:

They return at evening,
They make a noise like a dog,
And go round about the city.

The recurrence of this stanza is suggestive of swarming by night. — The first strophe [of quatrains] treats the whole as a visitation of God; protests innocence, and invokes God against the heathen. A second strophe, in a rapid triplet metre, pictures the night swarming and the barbarous jargon. The first antistrophe is an imprecation: not death is desired, but that the rabble foe may go swarming on for ever. The second antistrophe is apparently resuming the former picture, when it appears to change, and suggest a deliverance: the enemy seen swarming on, hungry and unsatisfied, while the psalmist rejoices in his Strength, now the crisis has passed away (in the morning, compare note on xvii). [Antistrophic interlacing (in stanzas): four quatrains, four triplets; four quatrains, four triplets.]

lx, cviii

It is clear that psalms lx and cviii are companion poems: they come under the general head of War Anthems (compare xx, xxi). One is a hymn of defeat, the other of victory. There is antiphony as between People and King. Apparently lx is to be considered a dramatic psalm (see on iii), the final couplet of the people implying deliverance, so far as recovered confidence in God. On the other hand, cviii has the more extended form of the Dramatic Anthem (see on ix–x): the opening triumph, the trouble recalled in the King's solo, and the resumption of triumph in the People's chorus. [lx has quatrains, and half quatrain at close, enveloping sextets with couplet lead: antiphonal. — cviii has two quatrains and a half at the commencement, the remaining half quatrain at the close, enveloping sextets with couplet lead: antiphonal.]

lxi, lxiii have been already discussed in the note (page 1536) on Direct Metaphor. [lxi is in quatrains. — lxiii is in triplets and sextets: apparently an example of Duplication (page 1521).]

lxii. This song of Trust is antistrophic in form, with the peculiarity of initial refrains. The refrain opens the chief image of the song, God as a rock: the strophe pictures persecution, using the contrasting image of a tottering wall. The antistrophe reiterates the idea of God as a rock of refuge, adding the image of a balance for the weighing of the foe. The conclusion makes a grand formula of judgment, on its two sides, of power as against the persecutor, and mercy for the oppressed. [Antistrophic (in stanzas), including initial refrains: 3, 3: with gnomic conclusion.]

lxiv. A Conspiracy of Iniquity is pictured: treacherous foes, who fight with words and snares and secret schemes. There is a suggestion of the sudden arrow of God, with the triumph transferred to the righteous. [Quatrains.]

lxv. See analysis in note to xxv, on Liturgies.

lxvi. A Votive Hymn: compare on xxxiv. This is, like xxxiv, a typical example; in this case it is antistrophic form which is used to distinguish the two elements — Israel's blessings, the individual worshipper's vow. [Antistrophic (in strains): 8, 8: with introduction.]

lxvii. This is plainly the Response of the Congregation to the High Priest's blessing (Numbers, vi. 24). It is a 'Festal Response,' in being suitable for any high ceremonial, and it cannot be specialised to harvest or any other particular occasion. [Sextet stanzas, including refrain. This has to be restored for the last stanza: compare xlvi and xcix.]

lxviii

This magnificent lyric is a Processional Hymn. Though no doubt originally composed for some specific occasion, it has nothing to limit it as such; but might be used by the Hebrews in the same way as Christians celebrate triumphs by singing Te Deum. Not only does this ode at one point picture the actual procession of the day, but the idea of procession as concealed imagery is made to run through the whole; until the past, present, and future of Israel's history have appeared as a series of vast processions. — The introduction starts from the traditional formula of procession: the song of the Levites starting with the ark. — Then section I reviews the past. First, the wilderness life of Israel is suggested as a procession of him that rideth through the deserts: the oppressed and solitary prisoners of Egypt have been multiplied into the families of a prosperous land. The people marched through the wilderness, with their God before them, Sinai itself trembling at the presence: a plentiful rain [of manna: compare the prominence of this in the Wilderness Anthem, cxxxvi] was prepared by the good God to strengthen his weary inheritance while they must dwell in the desert. So far strophe: the antistrophe proceeds to the conquest of the land of promise. It is presented with such compressed force, that it becomes a victorious procession from Bashan to Mount Zion. The conquest appears as but two notes: Jehovah giving the word of advance, the women publishing the tidings of victories. What follows is intelligible and forceful as disconnected snatches of war ballads (lines printed in italics): on any other view the words are barely intelligible. The compressed brevity appears again in bringing together Bashan (first stage of conquest) and Zion (the final metropolis): all between vanishes. Here again are snatches of conquest songs, each caught up in triumphant assertion. The whole past of Israel becomes one procession: Sinai is in the sanctuary. — With section II we pass to the present, the rhythm partly changing. God is a God of daily deliverances: he who brought from the Red Sea and from Bashan brought us that we might go on to conquer. Another strophe realises the actual procession of the day: singers, dancers, minstrels, and the tribes in their order. Its antistrophe turns to the future, and again the dominant image appears: the future of Israel is a procession of the peoples (compare lxxxvii), flocking to the temple at Jerusalem [the various peoples are described by symbolic names: the wild beast of the reeds is no doubt Egypt, the rest can only be guessed at], distant Ethiopia bringing up the rear. The antistrophe that remains is a final ascription of praise, but (in an echo from the Blessing of Moses: compare Deuteronomy, chapter xxxiii. 26) is able to keep up the processional imagery: God rideth upon the heavens of heavens. [Structure: compound antistrophe. After the introduction, Section I is antistrophic (in quatrain stanzas): 4, 4. — Section II has antistrophic inversion (in lines): 10, 9; 9, 10.]

lxix. This has been analysed above (page 1524) in the note on Interruption. [Structure: stanzas of four strains each, interrupted (before the close of the sixth stanza) by strophe (seven couplets); after the conclusion of the sixth stanza the antistrophe (seven couplets) is added.]

lxx. A litany (see on xxxv) taken from the liturgy, psalm xl. [As it stands by itself, it has the form of modified envelopment (page 1523), being made up of the two refrains of xl verbally varied, with the antistrophe standing between them.]

lxxi. A dramatic psalm (see on iii): presenting the usual change from trouble to relief. The trouble is generalised to external foes, with the added circumstance of old age that leaves less strength to meet them. The two long stanzas each consist of appeal founded on the past, with the idea of old age at the close; the shorter stanzas are commencing a more hopeful appeal when the change comes. [Stanzas (of strains): 9, 9; 3, 3.] lxxii. See on ii. This psalm has usually been interpreted as an encomium on Solomon, founded on the oracle of his kingship in II Samuel, chapter vii. 16. But (in spite of the court formula, O king live for ever) the words, They shall fear thee while the sun endureth . . . throughout all generations, are against a personal interpretation; and the suggestions of universal dominion rather favour an application to the ideal Messianic king of psalms ii and cx. Against this last, however, the opening couplet has force: Give the king thy judgements . . . and thy righteousness unto the king's son. The title I have affixed to the psalm suggests the idea of a dynasty of righteousness, as a conception intermediate between the original idea of a king, glorious, but ruling Israel only (e.g. xx, xxi, etc.), and the mystic king over the whole world. [Antistrophic (in strains): 9, 9.]

lxxiii. This psalm, though fascinating to the reader, is difficult of interpretation, with the same difficulty that has been already noted in connection with xvi and xlix. The topic is the great mystery of prosperous wickedness; and into the language of the closing verses it is only too easy to read the modern doctrine of a future world in which are redressed the inequalities of this life. Yet it appears to me certain that no such interpretation is possible in the present case. The general consideration applies: this conception of a future life is so revolutionising that, if held at all, it must make itself prominent, and not appear merely as an allusion. Such is found to be the case, not only in (late) works like The Wisdom of Solomon, where immortality is firmly held as a doctrine; but even in Job (see Introduction, page 1494), where the idea is caught at and dismissed: even this brief touch of the doctrine makes itself unmistakable. In the present case we have, not (as might at first appear) a mystery and its sudden solution; but rather a failure of faith in a received doctrine which at the last moment is suddenly strengthened. The psalmist contemplates the prosperity of the wicked, and the scepticism as to a God of judgment which this tends to engender, until he is almost caught in the mist of doubt himself: nothing but loyalty to his faithful brethren hinders him from yielding. In this painful conflict he goes into the sanctuary of God: in a moment his failing faith is confirmed. Faith in what? That this prosperity of the wicked is only a dream: when God awakes he will overthrow them, but keep the pious by his side. Thou shalt guide me with thy counsel all through the night of trouble, and afterward receive me with glory when the visitation is passed, and the righteous are found triumphant. The other view has been much assisted by the next line: Whom have I in heaven but thee? But that this can have no reference to heaven as the sphere of immortal life is sufficiently shown by the parallel line: And there is none upon earth that I desire beside thee. Note again the threefold surely, as a guide to the critical points in the thought of the psalm: the first emphasises the conclusion, God is good to Israel, whatever appearances may suggest; the second marks the nadir point of the psalmist's scepticism, that piety was all vain; the third marks the healing thought, the slippery prosperity of the wicked. — One passage is difficult in its phraseology:

Therefore his people return hither;
And waters of a full cup are wrung out by them.

Assuming the correctness of the text it is best to interpret: God's people from this spectacle of the untouched prosperity of evil men turn round to their own hard life, and wring out bitter tears at the contrast. [The structure has been pointed out above (page 1522): antistrophic inversion: strophe, four sextets (of doubt) with a quatrain climax (of almost yielding) — antistrophe, quatrain (this yielding checked) and four sextets (of restored faith).]

lxxiv. Elegy on the Ruined Sanctuary. Antistrophic inversion makes the first part:

Remonstrance with God Picture of the process of Destruction Destruction extended to the whole land Appeal: How long?

Then, in simple antistrophy: God's wonders of old time, balanced by an appeal to execute judgment. — We see not our signs: either (1) sacred symbols, which have been destroyed.

and heathen symbols (standards) put in their place (compare: the abomination of desolation standing in the holy place); or (2) signs of prophecy or miracle (compare Ecclesiasticus, chapter xxxvi. 6). [Structure: (1) Antistrophic inversion (in lines): 5, 6; 6, 5. — (2) Antistrophic (in couplets): 6, 6.]

lxxv. A simple Song of Judgment. After an introductory couplet, celebrating the near approach of judgment, we have in a strophe the brief trenchant words of Deity; in antistrophe, flowing language of delighted recognition. [Structure: antistrophic (in strains): 4, 4: with introduction.]

lxxvi. One of the Sennacherib psalms: see on xlvi. It simply celebrates the glorious deliverance, using the bold image of the lion leaping out of his lair (compare lion of the tribe of Judah): the overpowering wonder of the destruction of Sennacherib may explain this. — The residue of wrath shalt thou gird upon thee; i.e. shalt thou use as a weapon for achieving thy purpose. The whole couplet implies: Man's rage is forced to work God's praise. Does he yet resist? his resistance shall be a fresh weapon against him.

lxxvii. For the difference between this and the dramatic psalms see note on iii. Trouble is brought forward, and there is relief: not the dramatic relief of the trouble there and then removed, but the psalmist comforts himself with God's wonders in the past. The wonder thus recalled is the passage of the Red Sea: here again God's people were wedged in impassable trouble. Waters gather in tempest, there is lightning and earthquake: all rolls away, and the obstructed path of God is seen stretching through the sea itself, over which Moses and Aaron lead the people as simply as a flock of sheep. [Sextet stanzas of strains.]

National Hymns. Four psalms (lxxviii, cv, cvi, cxxxvi) may be set down as the National Hymns of Israel, corresponding to the 'National Anthems' of modern nations. They are devoted to the history of the relationship between Jehovah and his chosen people: that they are four, and not one, is due to the changes in that relationship.

cxxxvi is the National Hymn of the Wilderness. It has the primitive structure of a Solo and refrain Chorus in alternate lines. The history here goes no further than the history of the wilderness, and never crosses the Jordan. — He giveth food to all flesh: note the prominent position of this line as a reference to the manna; compare opening strophe of lxviii. [Each couplet is made up of antiphonal halves: these aggregate into stanzas of couplets: 4, 5, 6, 7, 4: an example (page 1523) of Augmenting.]

cv. This is the National Hymn of the Promised Land. The history is carried forward just so far as the conquest: He gave them the lands of the nations, etc. Joseph is made prominent as the link between Egypt and Canaan. The hymn is in the simplest style of joyous couplets. [Strophic structure (in couplets): 4, 11, 9, 14, 3, 4.] lxxviii. Very different is the third of these anthems: the National Hymn of the Kingdom of Judah. It celebrates the rejection of the northern tribes, and the fresh call of a chosen people for Jehovah, viz. the house of David and tribe of Judah. The form under which this matter is developed is a magnificent specimen of the pendulum rhythm: swaying of alternate strophes between opposite thoughts — between the Divine energy on behalf of Israel on the one hand, and on the other hand, the human frailty which defeats the Divine purposes. An elaborate introduction prepares the way, and when it reaches the words not stedfast, the pendulum structure begins.

Human frailty: the defection of Ephraim like armed warriors deserting on the field of battle. [See page 1535.]

Divine energy: the wonder of the deliverance from Egypt.

Human frailty in the wilderness: distrust of God and lust after flesh.

Divine energy of punishment: their lust satisfied and turned to a plague.

Human frailty: a long course of sinning and repenting and sinning yet again.

Divine energy of judgment: the marvels of plagues on the Egyptians side by side with marvels of protection for Israel.

Human frailty in the promised land itself: worship in the high places — withering of the people as their God forsakes them.

Final burst of Divine energy: a fresh call: northern Israel rejected, Judah and the house of David become the people of God.

[Pendulum structure, in unequal strophes, with introduction.]

cvi. Finally, we have this Hymn of Judah recast to make a National Hymn of the Captivity. The introduction, though in form an ascription of praise, yet implies the Captivity in the petition to be included in the salvation of the chosen. Then the pendulum structure obtains, but with the history differently distributed.

Frailty of the people in Egypt, and even at the Red Sea.

Divine Energy: the glorious deliverance of the Red Sea.

Frailty: the lusts and envyings of the wilderness.

Divine Energy: the wonder-worker of Egypt turns destruction upon his people, but Moses stands in the breach.

Frailty in faith as to the promised land: with the sin of Baal-peor.

Divine energy shown in punishment: the plague — but Phinehas interposes.

Frailty at Meribah, even Moses giving way — frailty in yielding to the idolatries of Canaan itself.

Divine energy of abhorrence: their God gives them into captivity, yet causes them to be pitied of their captors.

A conclusion briefly prays for deliverance from captivity. [Pendulum structure, in unequal strophes, with introduction and conclusion.]

lxxix. An elegy on fallen Jerusalem, in the form of antistrophic inversion:

A picture of overthrow and desolation, with scorn of bystanders.
How long thine anger on us and not on our destroyers?
Forgive and deliver us.
Let the picture appeal to God: change woe to triumph.

[Antistrophic inversion (in strains): 4, 3; 3, 4.]

lxxx. An elegiac celebration of the desolated land, under a parable of a broken vine. [The vine is the national emblem of Israel.] The form has been explained under the head of Interruption (above, page 1524). [Stanzas (of three strains) with refrains, interrupted by antistrophy (in couplets): 4, 4: the refrain (in modified form) interrupting the antistrophic matter.]

lxxxi. This may be compared with the Festal Hymns (see on xxxiii), as being suitable for any high occasion; it is also a testimony: a sort of lyrical 'covenant.' An introduction is in keeping with the festal occasion, like a flourish of trumpets. The rest is in the words of God: he recites (strophe) his deliverance of his people and his law against strange gods; then (antistrophe) laments the stubborn indifference that hinders the prosperity he longs to send. Compare psalm xcv. [Antistrophic (in couplets): 6, 6: with introduction.]

lxxxii. A brief yet vigorous Vision of Judgment. Professor Cheyne has well suggested that this is directed against high spiritual powers, the 'Sons of God' of the Book of Job: these are held responsible for the wickedness in the world which their rule has failed to prevent. A couplet of introduction calls up the scene of God judging among the 'gods'; a strophe contains the Divine remonstrance with these superhuman world rulers;

the antistrophe pictures their indifference, and the threat of God to reduce them to the ranks of mortal men. The conclusion is equivalent to Amen. [Antistrophic (in strains): 3, 3: with introduction and conclusion.]

lxxxiii. This is a national Song of Judgment. The longer stanzas appeal against hostile races by name, praying that they may be like the foes of ancient times in their fate. The shorter stanzas intensify the appeal, with imagery crowded together of the dust storm, the wind and the chaff, the forest fire, volcanic eruption, tempest; producing confusion, dismay, and a recognition that Jehovah alone is God. [I. Stanzas of four couplets. — II. Stanzas of three couplets.]

lxxxiv. The interpretation of this exquisite lyric has already been discussed, in the note on Interruption (page 1524), and again in the note on Direct Metaphor (page 1535). It is inspired by devotion to the House of God, and by the thought of the sacred pilgrimages to Jerusalem at the festive seasons. The triplet stanzas are subjective, conveying the longings of the psalmist; the antistrophic portion paints an objective picture. The point of the second stanza is that the approach of the seasons of the pilgrimages stirs in the poet's heart longings like those of the birds when the nesting season draws nigh. Then breaks in the picturing of the pilgrimages. Most blest of all, the man who dwells for ever in God's house: next blest is the faithful pilgrim — the way to Zion goes through his heart. Dreary spots on the route are converted for the season into gaiety by the flocking pilgrims, like dry places covered for a while with blessings by the brief spring rains. From stage to stage of the ascent to Zion the pilgrims go on, until all have presented themselves before God. An antistrophe breaks into the Song of the Pilgrims in Zion. It is interrupted in the middle by an interjected triplet stanza, parenthetically repeating the poet's longing: one day of such sacred joy outweighs a thousand days of ordinary life. Then the Song of the Pilgrims is continued to its conclusion. [Structure: mutual interruption. Stanzas of triplets are interrupted by antistrophy (in couplets): 4, 4: the antistrophic part being further interrupted by a triplet stanza.]

lxxxv. This has been treated in the note on ix–x: Dramatic Anthems.

lxxxvi. See note on xxv: Liturgies.

lxxxvii. See note on ii. Zion pictured as the mother of nations: they crowd to be enrolled as her citizens. It seems best to make Zion the speaker throughout: the thee of line 3 merely implies that she is addressing herself. (Compare xci.) The final couplet is difficult through its abruptness. It may be interpreted (1) to suggest a procession of the nations (compare psalm lxviii); or (2) that not nations only but all forms of human excellence have their fount in Zion: no origin is boasted of, except origin out of Zion. [Sextet stanzas.]

lxxxviii. The gloomiest of all the elegies: trouble without the least break or shadow of relief. The picture seems to be of a lifelong severance from human intercourse by incurable disease. I am compelled to agree with Bishop Perowne, as against Professor Cheyne, that the psalm is certainly personal and not national. It is true that the expression sometimes made an objection to the national interpretation, I am ready to die from my youth up, can be paralleled in application to Israel from psalm cxxix; but the total impression is of personal woe, and there seems no reason for interpreting this metaphorically. [Stanzas (of couplets): 10, 10.] lxxxix. This has been fully discussed in the note on Interruption (page 1524).

Book IV

xc, xci

The traditional title to xc, A Prayer of Moses the man of God, is sufficiently explained by the fact that this psalm and the one that follows it seem to be expansions of two lines in the Blessing of Moses (Deuteronomy, chapter xxxiii. 27):

The Eternal God is thy dwelling place,
And underneath are the everlasting arms.

Psalm xc, in its first section, starts with the expression of the first line of that couplet, and expands the contrast between the eternal dwelling place and the passing generations. The second section, still on the gloomy side of the topic, leads with the further thought that the passage of life's moments is the wrath of God upon man's iniquities. Then comes a change in the spirit of the meditation. The third leading couplet connects the numbering of our days with the bringing of wisdom: the past of affliction is as night, let the present moment be the morning of blessing, which shall extend to the whole day of remaining life, a day of established works and reflection of Divine beauty. — xci develops the other line of the couplet, the protection of the everlasting arms. Each strophe starts from the main idea of dwelling place (or its synonym), crowds together expressions of protection, and finds a climax, the first in the reward of the wicked, the second in God's own word of protection for the good. — He shall deliver thee, etc. The psalmist is addressing himself: compare lxxxvii. [Structure: xc has stanzas of five strains, each with a couplet lead. — xci is antistrophic (in strains): 8, 8.]

xcii. A Votive Hymn: see on xxxiv. As in the case of lxvi, the antistrophic form separates the two elements of a Votive hymn — general and personal: the strophe celebrates the ' work ' of God in the overthrow of the wicked; the antistrophe tells how the righteous singer has been exalted, and will continue to flourish. [Antistrophic (in couplets): 6, 6: with introduction.]

xciii. This has been analysed as an example of Suspension: page 1524.

xciv. A Song of Judgment, in the form (see page 1521) of leads and stanzas. After a general introduction, there are three leads of interrogative appeal, each followed by one or more stanzas. The first asks, How long shall the wicked triumph: three stanzas support this, developing the thought (1) of persecution without regard to God; (2) that the Creator must be cognizant of his creation; (3) that the persecution is God's chastening to prepare for the coming triumph. — Another lead asks, Who will be champion for us? the reply is that without God's championship we must have perished. — The third lead is a protest: Shall organised wrong have God on its side? The stanza proceeds, that the wicked are acting in that spirit, but judgment is near. [Three couplet leads, followed, the first by three octet stanzas, the other two by single sextets.]

xcv–c

This is an elaborate Festal Anthem: an approach to the modern oratorio. The separate psalms have been called Accession Hymns: they celebrate Jehovah as creator and ruler of the whole earth, as well as the special God of his people Israel. The working together of the five into a single festal composition is clear. The whole falls into five parts: I, III, and V (that is, the beginning, middle, and end) are of the same pendulum structure, that alternates between praise to Jehovah and motives for that praise. Separating these (II, IV) are songs in other rhythm, dwelling more composedly on the greatness and goodness of God.

I (= psalms xcv–xcvi) alternates ejaculations of praise with such motives as the supremacy of Jehovah over the earth and all gods, Israel the sheep of his pasture (here the tender voice of the Shepherd is heard; compare lxxxi), the coming of judgment.

II (= psalm xcvii), changing from this ecstatic alternating rhythm to the more measured joy of antistrophic structure, puts side by side Jehovah in his own glory and attributes, and the shame of idols and their worshippers.

III Again at the centre (psalm xcviii) we have a new song, and as before the swaying between praise and matter for praise.

IV (= psalm xcix) has the more measured rhythm of antistrophic effect. Jehovah is adored as great and terrible (awe inspires the refrain, Holy is he); Jehovah establishes equity for Israel (refrain of exultation). — In antistrophic balance to these: the faithful among the fathers called and found God an answerer of prayer (refrain of awe); they found him a God of vengeance and forgiveness (refrain of exultation).

V (= psalm c) briefly alternates praise with the leading motives: we are the people of his pasture — his mercy endureth for ever.

[Structure: antiphonal throughout. — I, III, V have pendulum structure. — II is antistrophic (in strains): 6, 6. — IV has antistrophic interlacing in sextets, differentiated by varying refrains.]

ci. See on xxiv; Anthems for the Inauguration of Jerusalem. [Structure: couplet lead and quatrains.]

cii. This has been treated in the note on Interruption (page 1524). [Structure: stanzas of three strains (personal) interrupted in the middle of the elegy by stanzas of four couplets (national).]

ciii–civ

Unified by the ejaculation, Bless the LORD, O my soul, at the beginning, middle, and end, these two psalms make up a glorious ode, celebrating God as the God of the personal, individual life, or the World Within (ciii), and of the external universe, or the World Without (civ). As already pointed out (page 1520), the same rhythmic form obtains in each: stanzas of five strains, changing in the middle of each psalm, with a certain change of thought, into stanzas of four strains.

ciii

[Stanzas of five strains.] Blessings from Jehovah for the personal, individual life: the reference to Israel is a suggestion how Israel from among the nations was brought into a personal relation with God.

[Third and fourth stanzas: of four strains.] The frailty and brief life of man: God's tenderness and contrasting everlastingness.

[Final stanza: of five strains.] From the personal life there is a rise to a climax in the higher personalities of angels and superhuman ministers, all serving Jehovah.

civ

[Stanzas of five strains.] God and the external universe: it constitutes his dwelling place and attendant pomp — his creation — the sphere of his government, and exhibition of his glory and order in all living things.

[Sixth and seventh stanzas: of four strains.] The dependence of all these creatures on Jehovah: as he sends forth or withholds his spirit they flourish or droop.

[Final stanza: of five strains.] The eternal glory of God in nature.

cv, cvi. See on lxxviii.

Book V

cvii. This great Ode of the Redeemed falls in its structure into two parts. 1. Stanzas with double refrains: see page 1521. — 2. Pendulum structure, swaying between the ideas of bringing low and building up. — A wisdom couplet concludes.

cviii. See on lx.

cix. The combination in this psalm of execration with prayerful appeal brings it into connection with the psalms I have called 'litanies.' (See on xxxv.) The expressions of execration are more extended here than anywhere else in the Book of Psalms; it is to be observed, however, that this is a curse denounced upon one who loves cursing. The rhythm changes for these words of execration. [Structure: stanzas of four strains (of appeal), interrupted in the middle of the psalm by stanzas of five strains (of execration).]

cx. A Song of the Ideal or Messianic King, made a conqueror by Jehovah, and made a Priest after the order of Melchizedek. (Compare on ii.) The form of antistrophic interlacing brings out with great force and clearness the two oracles and their glorious fulfilment. — On the mountains of holiness: compare lxxxvii. 1. — From the womb of the morning, thy youth are to thee as the dew. The dew as simile for irresistible numbers is used in Hushai's speech (II Samuel, chapter xvii. 12). From the womb of the morning may either attach itself to this image, or may suggest the dawn of the day of victory. — He shall drink, etc.: continued pursuit, that does not stop for refreshment. Compare Saul and Jonathan. [Antistrophic interlacing (in lines): 3, 4; 3, 4: or, oracle, fulfilment; oracle, fulfilment.]

cxi–cxviii

Psalms cxiii–cxviii constitute in Jewish tradition 'the Hallel,' or 'The Egyptian Hallel' (the latter probably from psalm cxiv), and were the proper anthem for the three Great Feasts, for the Feast of Dedication, and at the New Moons. Whatever subsequent usage may have made it, the structure of this Hallel reveals it as a Votive Anthem: as the Votive Hymn on a smaller scale (see on xxxiv), so this on a larger scale merges a personal thanksgiving for deliverance in a general thanksgiving of the nation. Its various parts combine into a general movement, like the sections of a modern oratorio. The final section up to which the whole leads (psalm cxviii) most clearly presents an individual Worshipper, accompanied by an escort or Chorus of the People, approaching the temple; in the centre of the psalm the temple gates seem to open and reveal a Chorus of Priests. Thus three parties are necessary for this anthem: the individual Worshipper, a Chorus of the People, and a Chorus of Priests. The whole of the Hallel lends itself to antiphony between these three officiants. It may be added that, as in the case of the Festal Hymns, the seven parts of this Hallel alternate between matter for praise and the praise itself.

I (psalms cxi–cxii). By way of Preface to the Hallel we find an Acrostic Meditation, as in the case of other elaborate anthems (see note to psalm i). It is double, both parts having the same structure [quatrains with a final sextet]. The Preface takes the votive colour of the whole, the division between general and individual: the first part celebrating the attributes and works of God, the second part the blessedness of the God-fearing man.

II (psalm cxiii). We here have a General Doxology, but of a kind suitable to the votive spirit: the Chorus of Priests sing the exaltation of Jehovah, the People his condescension in deliverance of the lowly. [Antistrophic (in lines): 8, 8.]

III (psalm cxiv). Matter of praise of a national character is brought forward, and the great deliverance of the Exodus from Egypt is sung. In contrast to the old conception of local deity a God is seen whose dwelling place is his people, He moving as they move: at this marvel all nature is convulsed with excitement. [For the interesting example of antistrophic inversion, see page 1522.]

IV (psalm cxv). Another Doxology: this time the Doxology of Israel. Priests and People answer one another in exalting God above the idols of the nations, and proclaiming his goodness to Israel. [Antiphonal in quintet and couplet stanzas.]

V (psalm cxvi). Matter of praise is now brought forward in the Votive Song of the individual Worshipper, and his personal deliverance is narrated. There are refrains, which no doubt would be joined in or repeated by a Chorus. [Triplet lead, and stanzas of three strains: with refrain, enlarging.]

VI (psalm cxvii). The General Doxology and the Doxology of Israel are here supplemented with a brief Doxology of the Nations, in which they are called upon to laud the God of Israel. [A single quatrain.]

VII (psalm cxviii). We thus reach the climax: already described as a Processional Hymn, in which the Worshipper whose vow is being performed, the Chorus of the People, and (later) a chorus of Priests take part. [Antiphonal: strophic structure.]

cxix. This is a tour de force of artificial structure: (1) gnomic sayings on the subject of the Law of God are strung together with alphabetical connection; and (2) every verse contains some synonym for the word Law. The apparent exception in the ℵ section is explained by regarding the first four lines as a single sentence with the double equivalent, Judgement and Justice. [Stanzas of eight couplets: acrostic.]

cxx–cxxxiv

Fifteen psalms stand together, with the title affixed to each of A Song of Ascents: evidently we have a psalter within the psalter. The significance of the title is a question of great interest. The literal translation of the title is Songs of the goings up. One interpretation of this (by Armfield in his Gradual Psalms) is founded on a Talmudic passage describing a portion of the second temple:

> and there were 15 steps corresponding to the 15 steps in the psalms upon which the Levites said the song:

the suggestion is thus Orchestral Psalms, or Hymns of High Ritual. This, however, has no special relevancy to the matter of the poems. Two other theories have obtained wider acceptance; one connecting these poems with the Pilgrimages to Jerusalem at the Great Feasts, the other with the Return, or going up to Jerusalem from Babylon. There is no difficulty in combining those two theories, especially as some of the psalms are obviously connected with the Captivity and Return, while others with equal clearness associate themselves with the Festal Pilgrimages. And under this last head may be included the family songs (cxxvii, cxxviii, and perhaps cxxxi), such pilgrimages being great family gatherings, as the incident in St. Luke reminds us; also the temple hymns (cxxxii and cxxxiv). It is a striking and beautiful idea to present the return from Babylon as the greatest of pilgrimages to Jerusalem; nothing could be more probable than that, in the festal journeys to the second temple, this mighty deliverance would take its place side by side with the traditional pilgrim songs. A slight confirmation of this combination may be found in the order of the fifteen psalms, though this is not a point on which I should desire to lay much stress. At first the order seems puzzling: the depressed songs of exile are not separated from the joyous pilgrim hymns. But it must be remembered that the compilers of our Book of Psalms are influenced by fivefold structure (compare page 1463): the whole collection is divided by doxologies into five books; the great Anthems xcv–c and cxlvi–cl are really in five divisions, and the Hallel (cxiii–cxviii) admits of such arrangement. If the collection of Songs of Ascents be divided into five divisions of three psalms each, it will be seen that each section combines celebration of the pilgrimage from captivity and the pilgrimages to the feasts in an interesting manner.

cxx. The Exile's Cry
cxxi. A Traveller's Hymn: The LORD thy keeper cxxii. Salutation on arrival at Jerusalem cxxiii. Prayer of the Despised Exile cxxiv. The Exile's Song of Deliverance cxxv. The Pilgrim's Song to Mount Zion

cxxvi. Seedtime or the first glimpse of Deliverance cxxvii. } Family Songs cxxviii. }

cxxix. Litany of Afflicted Israel cxxx. A Cry from the Depths, ending with Hope cxxxi. The Quiet Soul: perhaps a family song cxxxii. Temple Dedication Hymn cxxxiii. Song of Unity: the gathering on Zion cxxxiv. A Recession Hymn from the Temple

Though the point is not to be pressed, there is a suggestion in the order of the several sections of festal pilgrimages contemplated with the Captivity as a starting-point.

cxx. An Exile's Cry for deliverance: the Meshech and Kedar need not be understood literally, but as expressions for infinite distance. — What is the point of lying lips, deceitful tongue? These are not specially relevant to the oppression of an exile's lot. Is it possible that the idea is of foreign language heard all around as an aggravation of exile? This is made a feature of similar circumstances in Isaiah, chapter xxxiii. 19, and Deuteronomy, chapter xxviii. 49. [Quatrains: aabb.]

cxxi. A Traveller's or Pilgrim's Hymn, its effect turning upon reiteration of the word keep. [Quatrains.]

cxxii. Hymn of the Festal Pilgrimages, saluting Jerusalem on arrival. [Quatrains: aabb.]

cxxiii. A Prayer of the Despised, with local colour from exile in regions of oriental slavery. Bishop Perowne quotes from Savary's Letters on Egypt: The slaves stand silent at the bottom of the rooms with their hands crossed over their breasts. With their eyes fixed upon their master, they seek to anticipate every one of his wishes. He also quotes Latin phrases of slaves: oculos in oculis heri habere, oculos nunquam ab oculis dimovere. [Quatrains.]

cxxiv. Antistrophic form applied in the simplest manner to express a sense of deliverance. For the parenthesis outside the rhythm, Now let Israel say, compare Hezekiah's Song (page 510), and above, on xl.

cxxv. The sight of the Holy City on its mountain elevation suggests the foundation principles of God's providence. Compare the antistrophe of psalm xxxvi. [Strophic structure in strains.]

cxxvi. The deliverance from captivity in Babylon came in instalments. The present song expresses the point of view of those left behind when the first company of returning pilgrims has set out: laughter and tears have met for them. But this is but the seedtime of the Return, a glorious harvest will come; and the rivulet of pilgrims will swell like the rivers of the dry south when the winter snows melt. [Antistrophic in stanzas of double quatrains: 2(aabb).]

cxxvii. The exact exegesis of this lyric morsel is difficult: the difficulty centring upon the relation to the context of the words, He giveth unto his beloved sleep. The view I have adopted makes a simple antithesis (compare xix, xxxvi) between the life of anxious toil and the peaceful home life with quiet growth of family. [Antistrophic inversion (in lines): 4, 3; 3, 4: the structure of psalm cx inverted.]

cxxviii. A lyric of the simple life: daily bread, family joys, prosperity of the native city. [Quatrains.]

cxxix. This is a litany (compare on xxxv) in the sense that it combines the mood of denunciation with that of prayer. The psalm is of course national. The foes seem to be factions rather than external foes: the curse denounced compares them to the neglected and withered grass of the housetops that is never garnered: they are to be in Israel, yet no part of its community. [Quatrains: aabb.]

cxxx. This is either (1) personal experience, with a postscript adapting it to the Israel of the exile; or (2) a national prayer, the nation addressing itself in the last stanza. The change of metre for the last stanza favours the former alternative. [Triplet stanzas, with a final quatrain, which is perhaps a postscript.]

cxxxi. This, like the last, can either be personal, with a postscript making it national, or national throughout. Again the change of metre favours the former view. [Triplets, with a final couplet, perhaps a postscript.]

cxxxii. See on xxiv: Inaugural Anthems of Jerusalem.

cxxxiii. A Song of Unity in view of the gatherings from all over the land at the sacred feast; the dew (for this as an image of assembling multitudes compare cx) of Hermon has descended upon Mount Zion. [Couplet lead, and two stanzas of one strain each.]

cxxxiv. A natural close for this collection of pilgrim hymns: the retiring Congregation and the Night-Watch bid one another Good Night. [Antiphonal and strophic.]

cxxxv. This Festal Hallelujah reproduces on a smaller scale the alternating structure of the Festal Anthems (xcv–c, cxlv–cl) and the Votive Hymn (cxi–cxviii); but the alternation is rather between choral and semichoral celebration than between praise and matter for praise.

Full Chorus. General exaltation of Jehovah.
Semichoral Antiphony. His rule over nature and Israel (compare psalm cxxxvi).
Full Chorus. Jehovah exalted above the idols.
Semichoral Antiphony. All ranks unite in his praise.
Full Chorus. Final ejaculation of praise.

[The structure can only be classified under the head of antiphonal: three quatrains, four antiphonal triplets, three quatrains, four antiphonal lines, concluding couplet.]

cxxxvi. A National Hymn: see on lxxviii.

cxxxvii. An Elegy. — 1. Plaintive memories of Zion in Babylon. 2. Passionate recollection of Babylon in restored Jerusalem. [Structure antistrophic (compare page 1522): 1. aabaa, aabaa; 2. aabbb, aabbb.] cxxxviii. A Song of Thanksgiving in general terms: the cause has triumphed in the individual. [Quatrain introduction and triplet stanzas.]

cxxxix. A dramatic psalm, see on iii: its movement and dramatic change in the middle are most impressive. At the opening the sense of Divine omniscience and omnipresence is realised as an oppressive burden; in space there is no escaping it, in time it stretches back to birth itself. This climax is also the turning-point: as the poem passes into its antistrophe the thought of birth has suggested the omnipresence of God watching the helplessness of the unformed body. The new current of ideas gathers strength, until God's countless thoughts on behalf of the psalmist have become to him a joy; in a burst of purity he takes sides against the enemies of God; and finally (by an effect resembling the envelope figure) changes the opening burden into an aspiration. The title, The Searcher of Hearts is thy Maker, gives the proper emphasis to the thought which proved the turning-point. [Antistrophic (in strains): 12, 12. Modified envelopment, page 1523.]

cxl. A Cry for Deliverance, with the usual liturgical denunciation (see on xxxv). [Quatrains, with initial refrains.]

cxli. A prayer of Consecration, not only to God, but also to the cause of the righteous (compare opening of xvi). The psalm is very obscure, and the text is generally believed to be corrupt. As it stands, the best arrangement seems to be to understand triplet stanzas, one of which is duplicated (page 1521): this sextet (as the indenting in this edition shows) being an interweaving of two triplets which separately would read as follows:

For even in their calamities shall my prayers continue,
And they shall hear my words,
For they are sweet.

Their judges are thrown down by the sides of the rock:
As when one ploweth and cleaveth the earth,
Their bones are scattered at the grave's mouth.

(Their judges — the champions of the righteous, who thus unsuccessfully defend them.) The effect of the interweaving of these triplets is to make a vivid picture of the calamities of the saints interrupt the speaker's professions of fidelity to them amid their troubles. It is an effect akin to interruption: the nearest parallel I can find is the mutual interruption of images in Bildad's speech (page 1046–7, compare note on page 1526), by which the image of the rush is in its development interrupted by another image of the spider's web, and then completed. [Quatrain introduction, and triplet stanzas, one duplicated.]

cxlii. A beautiful though simple song of trouble and relief: the four lines of each stanza present trouble, the last two relief. [Sextets.]

cxliii. A general prayer of distress, with no specialisation of the trouble. [Quatrains, varying between aabb, abab, abba.] cxliv. See note on ix–x: Dramatic Anthems.

cxlv–cl

A Festal Anthem: compare on xcv–c and on cxxxv. There is first the prefatory meditation with acrostic structure: see note on i. Then we have alternation between two choruses, the first calling for praise, the second dealing with matter for praise. At the beginning the first chorus speaks little more than ejaculations, while the second chorus has the place of prominence: from about the middle (bottom of page 873) the first chorus, with its calls to all orders of being to unite in doxology, begins to gain upon the first: at the close they answer in equal antiphony, until both unite in the climax —

LET EVERYTHING THAT HATH BREATH PRAISE THE LORD.

[Pendulum structure: antiphonal.]

Notes on Lamentations

The spirit of these poems, and the analysis of their movement, have been conveyed by the Introduction (page 1440) and the arrangement of the text.

ii. 22. Terrors on every side. Mr. Streane (Cambridge Bible for Schools) has this note: "Jeremiah here alludes, as is shown by the Heb. for terrors (wrongly translated neighbouring villages by the Septuagint) to the word Magor-missabib, which had been so constantly in his mouth." Compare Jeremiah, chapter vi. 25; xx. 3.

Notes to the Song of Songs

For the book as a whole, see Introduction (page 1442). For its metrical system see page 1527.

Title

The title here adopted is that of the Revised Version: The Song of Songs which is Solomon's. This is a literal translation of the title in the Vulgate. In the Septuagint it stands: The Song of Songs which is Solomon. However it be read, there is no need to interpret it as implying that Solomon is the author; in the usage of Scripture titles the words might equally refer to the fact that he is the hero of the poem. It is a tempting interpretation to understand Song of Songs as equivalent to liederkräntz: but the phrase is probably a translation of the title in the Hebrew version: The most lovely Song of Solomon.

i. 9. I have compared thee, O my love, to a steed, etc. See Introduction, page 1449.

ii. 17. Be thou like a roe, etc. For this symbol, see Introduction, page 1448.

iii. 10. The midst thereof being inlaid with love from the daughters of Jerusalem. The meaning of this obscure phrase is probably love gifts, draperies worked by the women.

iv. 1. Thy hair is as a flock of goats. For this and the following symbols, see the Introduction, page 1449.

iv. 12. A garden shut up is my sister, etc. Solomon uses this symbol of maidenhood in making his formal proposal of marriage, and the Shulammite keeps it up in her reply.

v. 1. Eat, O friends. Here the poet apostrophises his hero and heroine. See Introduction, page 1445.

v. 11. His head is as the most fine gold. For this and the expressions that follow, see Introduction, page 1448.

vi. 4. Terrible as an army with banners. A symbol expressing the awe which supreme beauty will create in the beholder. It is one of the many symptoms of the purity of the love celebrated in this poem.

vi. 10. Who is she that looketh forth. For the whole of this important passage, see Introduction, pages 1446–7.

vii. 4. Thine eyes as the pools in Heshbon. For all the symbols of this passage, see Introduction, page 1448.

viii. 5. Under the apple tree I awakened thee. The reference is to the royal party coming by surprise upon the maiden, who supposed herself alone in her own family vineyard, as brought out in Idyl V. Awakened need not be taken literally: it may mean, startled out of her reverie.

viii. 8. We have a little sister, etc. The Shulammite is quoting words of her brothers spoken in her hearing when she was a child and unable to comprehend the double entendre. Wall is a symbol for chastity, as contrasted with door for facility or incontinence. She has lived now to understand what it all means. It is hardly necessary to point out how natural such reminiscence is to the occasion, — the visit of a bride to home scenes with her husband.

viii. 11. Solomon had a vineyard, etc. This is a quaint and beautiful figure in which the Shulammite expresses, amid the home surroundings, her loving surrender of herself to her royal husband. Solomon had been the 'landlord' — to use modern phraseology — of her ancestral vineyard, whereas her own family had simply been the vinedressers who rented it from him; Solomon had taken the thousand pieces of silver, where her brothers had only had the labourers' two hundred. So, she says, Solomon is the real owner of her heart; her family's share is like the mere labourer's pittance.

Notes to Proverbs

See Introduction to this book (page 1452), and to Wisdom literature in general (page 1450). See also General Note on Metrical System of Scripture (especially pages 1519–24).

Book I

i. 8. For the structure of this and other epigrams, see Introduction, page 1457.

i. 10. Pendulum structure (1, 1; 9, 9): temptation (left) and resistance (right).

i. 20. Introduction and Monologue, combining antistrophic and stanza structure. Three triplet stanzas (at beginning and end) contain appeal, while the intervening antistrophic mass is made up of threatening. This last has the pendulum structure (5, 5; 1, 1; 1, 1; 4, 4), swaying between the obstinate sinners (right lines) and the retributive wisdom (left lines).

ii. 1. Antistrophic structure in two rhetoric masses. The first, a simple strophe and antistrophe (8, 8), contains the general position that Wisdom delivers from evil; the second mass is an antistrophic inversion (6, 8; 8, 6) enlarging upon this theme.

iii. 1. Free pendulum structure (i.e. not exactly antistrophic): the left hand lines emphasise the commandments, the right hand lines the reward. Compare vi. 1 and xxvii. 23.

iii. 11. Antistrophic inversion (4, 6; 6, 4). The unity of the sonnet is the conception of Wisdom as a prize. The middle strophe and antistrophe describe the richness of this prize; the opening strophe makes 'chastening' the cost at which it is obtained by the individual from the Lord; and the corresponding antistrophe (at the end) explains the reason for this costliness — wisdom was the instrument by which the whole universe was created.

iii. 21. Stanza structure: three similar quatrains.

iii. 27. Strophe and antistrophe, precepts; conclusion, their sanction. The strophe and antistrophe exhibit 'variation' (see above, page 1519).

iv. 1. Introduction, and antistrophic interlacing (a b a'b'). The short lines make a theme, characterising the first strophe and its antistrophe (though, by 'variation,' appearing at different places in the two stanzas). The other strophe and antistrophe emphasise the theme.

iv. 10. Strophe, the way of wisdom: antistrophe, the path of the wicked; conclusion, union of the two in a common image. The emphatic short lines appear, by 'variation,' at different parts of the strophe and antistrophe.

iv. 20. Introduction and couplet stanzas, the last duplicated.

v. 1. Stanza structure. Introduction and conclusion, quatrains; body of the sonnet, four octet stanzas, of which the second is duplicated. (See above, page 1521.)

vi. 1. Free pendulum structure (i.e. not antistrophic): left hand lines describe the negotiation with the neighbour, right hand lines put the idea of suretiship as a snare. Compare iii. 1 and xxvii. 23.

vi. 6. Strophe, the example; antistrophe, the appeal.

vi. 12. A pair of sonnets on the same theme, a further bond being the figure seven common to both. The first is an example of 'interruption' (see above, page 1526). The second is a number sonnet. (Introduction, page 1458.)

vi. 20. A combination of antistrophic and stanza structure. Two masses of antistrophic inversion (4, 3; 3, 4 and 2a, 2b; 2b, 2a) denounce adultery in general terms. Then three similar quatrain stanzas compare this with other forms of sin. The thought is that dishonesty, though it must be severely punished, is at least an intelligible temptation, but adultery is the act of a man void of understanding.

vii–viii

This and the following are the most elaborate and splendid poems in all Wisdom literature; and they illustrate in the highest form the stanza structure and the antistrophic structure respectively.

A characteristic feature of the present poem is the device of Interruption described above (page 1526). The regular flow of stanzas is broken at critical points by single couplets; this has the effect of musical rhythm interrupted by recitative. Or, from section V, these couplets might be compared to words given out by the voice of the priest, which are caught up and carried on by the choir. Again, in the picture of temptation, which makes the second section, the actual speech of the temptress is an irregular mass outside the stanza structure (compare the apolelumena of Greek lyrics), and this has a fine effect.

The whole falls into seven sections. I. General introduction, in a ten line stanza of alternate parallelism; a similar stanza appears at the close. II. The picture of temptation, in sextets (varied), with effects of interruption as described in the last paragraph. III. An octet of alternate lines, putting the general moral. IV. The octet, but with varied parallelism, extends into the first part of Wisdom's monologue. V. But where Wisdom begins to describe the attractions she has to offer, the stanzas lighten into quatrains (broken, as already said, by recitative). VI. As the climax of creative wisdom is reached the metre catches the crescendo, and the stanzas successively augment from 4 to 5, 6, and 7 lines. VII. The poem settles down to a calm conclusion in the metre of its introduction.

ix. 1. This is a supreme example of antistrophic structure. It is an antistrophic inversion (a b b a), of which each strophe is a sonnet complete in itself. I have thus described it as a Sonnet of Sonnets. The opening strophe, and its antistrophe at the end, are complete sonnets, in which Wisdom and Folly are heard to proclaim their blessings under the common image of hospitality. Between these come two other short sonnets, antistrophic to one another, the one dealing with proclaiming (or reproving), the other with blessings, in application to wise and fools. [These short sonnets might also be classed as epigrams, in which case the germ couplet of each (see Introduction, page 1457) would be the lines indented to the extreme right.] Not only is the form of the whole based upon antistrophic inversion, but the middle sonnets repeat the figure, each having two triplets inverted.

Book II

This book contains 375 unit proverbs entirely disconnected. With a very few exceptions they are couplets. Such however as xvii. 15, xix. 23, xxi. 6 can best be arranged as triplets. Others, like x. 26, xi. 22, xvii. 3, hover on the boundary between couplet and triplet, since it is clear that two of the lines (as given in the text) might be made one. But they seem to constitute a special gnomic figure, which appears repeatedly in Book IV as a clear triplet (compare xxv. 11, 12; xxvi. 1, 2; and others).

xix. 7. Many critics have regarded this as corrupt, apparently on the ground that all proverbs in this book should be independent couplets. The previous note has expressed a different view; and the sense of this proverb is clear and valuable.

Book III

The preface seems clearly to constitute this third collection a Wisdom Epistle, entrusted to a messenger to convey to distant correspondents. Solomon is traditionally said to have carried on such correspondence in riddles and dark sayings, with Hiram of Tyre and with the Queen of Sheba.

xxiii. 1, 4, etc. For the metre of these and other Epigrams the reader is referred to the Introduction, page 1457.

xxiii. 29. The structure of this Riddle Sonnet is antistrophic, with inversion and duplication (6, 2; 4, 12). The first strophe (of six) puts the question — the symptoms of intoxication, and the second strophe (of two) gives the answering cause — wine. Then, in reversed order, an antistrophe on wine is duplicated into a quatrain, and the antistrophe on the symptoms of the malady into a stanza of 12 lines (or 6 couplets).

xxiv. 30. Antistrophic structure: strophe, the mystery; antistrophe, the explanation. This sonnet and that commencing vi. 6 are constructed out of the same epigram germ (last five lines).

Book IV

Title. It is best to understand the term ' Proverbs of Solomon ' here, and in the title to Book II, and in the General Title page, to be the description of a kind of proverb: viz. the unit proverb (couplet or triplet), and the simpler epigrams, as distinguished from the sonnets and elaborate poems.

Comparing this book with Book II, we find the former to be an anthology from various sources of which the collection constituting Book II is one: a large number of proverbs are common to the two collections. In this later anthology there is an approach to arrangement, in the ' Proverb Cluster,' by which separate aphorisms (some of them epigrams) are gathered together round a common theme. Compare xxv. 2; xxvi. 3; xxvi. 13; xxvi. 17; xxvii. 23. This poem stands out by itself from all the rest of Wisdom literature. The first four lines would make an ordinary epigram; but the rest is of an entirely different character. It is best to classify the whole, or at all events the latter part, as a Folk Song, embodying the traditional principles of primitive farming. Such a song is the prototype, not so much of literary ' Georgics,' as of practical verse manuals like honest Thomas Tusser's Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry. This accounts for its appearance in a collection of Wisdom literature. — Considered as a single poem it has the free pendulum structure (compare iii. 1 and vi. 1,) swaying between farming operations (left lines) and the profit of these (right lines).

Book V

This portion of Proverbs, like the other portions, I have arranged as a collection of sayings. The old idea that the contents of Book I constituted a continuous poem has been abandoned by most authorities, but some commentators of great weight still look upon the sayings of Agur as constituting a unity, or hold that some of them are rebukes by orthodox scribes to the sceptical tone of Agur's own words. In my own opinion the whole of Book V reads quite naturally as an anthology of disconnected sayings; and the burden of proof must lie with those who would dissociate this portion of Proverbs from the miscellaneous character of all the rest.

xxx. 1. For the spirit of this poem, see Introduction (page 1455). In metre it is an antistrophic inversion (3, 4; 4, 3). If it seems straining to divide the final lines as I have done, I would support my arrangement by psalm viii. 4.

xxx. 7, 15, 18, 21, 24, 29. For the metre of these 'Number Sonnets,' see Introduction, page 1458.

xxx. 7. The Revised Version (and also the Authorised) read: —

Two things have I asked of thee;
Deny me them not before I die.

Though there is no textual authority for the change, I have not hesitated to alter 'them' into 'three.' Without this the sonnet would announce two things in its text, and enumerate three in its explanation. The form —

Two things have I asked of thee;
Deny me not three before I die.

brings the whole into conformity with the form of other Number Sonnets; compare verses 15, 18, 21, 24, 29 of this same chapter.

xxx. 11. A Sonnet in stanza structure, with refrain. The last stanza is duplicated: compare sonnet on page 908.

xxx. 20. This triplet proverb might also be arranged as an epigram: —

So is the way of an adulterous woman:
She eateth,
And wipeth her mouth,
And saith, I have done no wickedness.

xxxi. 1. The title in R.V. xxxi. 1 seems to constitute what follows (2–9) as a single composition: an 'Oracle' for King Lemuel composed by his mother. In form it consists of (1) an introductory exclamation (three lines), (2) a unit proverb, (3) an epigram. The last is the most elaborate in structure of all Biblical epigrams. The germ couplet (see Introduction, page 1457) is made up of the first and third lines; each of these is buttressed by an additional line; then follow two quatrains, the first supporting the first line of the germ proverb, the second supporting the other line of the germ proverb.

xxxi. 10. In the original this is an acrostic: the 22 verses begin with the 22 letters of the Hebrew alphabet.

Notes to Ecclesiasticus

Title: Ecclesiasticus

This is the title in the Vulgate, and seems to have come into use in the fourth century. It is antithetic to 'canonical'; and is thus a book 'for reading in church,' as distinguished from a book of authority in matters of faith. But in long usage the title has been so much identified with the 'Wisdom of Jesus the son of Sirach' as to have become the usual name for it.

Preface by the Translator

This is self-explaining. The materials it affords for determining the date of the original composition are not as decisive as they at first appear, inasmuch as there are two kings bearing the name Euergetes. But there is a fair consensus in favour of a date about 200 B.C.

Textual questions are excluded from this work, which accepts the text of the Revised Version, or its marginal alternatives. A remark, however, may be permitted on the peculiarity of Ecclesiasticus as the representative of a lost Hebrew work through a Greek translation. There are other versions, especially a Syriac Version; and experts are divided on the question whether this Syriac Version is made from the Greek translation or independently from the original Hebrew. The Revisers appear from their results not to have given independent weight to this Syriac Version. I point out in the notes a few passages where difficulties in the English text are simplified if suggestions based on the Syriac Version be accepted.

Author's Preface

On this compare Introduction, page 1462. I called upon the Lord, the father of my Lord, etc. For the suggestion of a verse quotation, see above, page 1539. The expression the father of my Lord seems impossible in a work of this date. The parallel sometimes cited (psalm cx. 1) gives it but little support. The Revised Version has followed the unanimous authority of the Greek manuscripts. But it is pointed out (by Edersheim, in Wace's Commentary, and others) that the Syriac Version would give unto the Lord, my Father, O Lord: suggesting a slight misreading of the Hebrew by the Greek translator. As pointed out above (page 1540), the reading in the English text is slightly less difficult if the passage be part of a hymn than if it be the words of Ben-Sirach.

With regard to the autobiographical matter of this preface, a question arises in connection with the words: Out of the manifold afflictions which I had. Is the author reciting the mercies of a lifetime — deliverance from imprisonment, from fire, from dangerous disease, and the like? Or is he indicating a single terrible crisis from political danger threatening his life, all the other expressions of danger being metaphorical applications to the one? My own impression is that the latter is the true interpretation, and that a single crisis is being suggested with the reserve that characterises this writer in his references to himself. The whole reads exactly like the style of the psalms of deliverance, where the same question arises: see note to psalm xxii (page 1438). If my interpretation is correct, this is another striking example of Metaphor Direct (see page 1534).

Book I

i. 1. This sonnet combines antistrophic and stanza structure (compare Proverbs i. 20 and vi. 20). In the series of stanzas there is the further effect of augmenting (see note, page 1521): from three lines to five lines, six lines; finally there is a return to three lines.

i. 22. For these and other 'maxims,' compare Introduction, page 1460.

i. 28. This passage is variously translated. As rendered by Revised Version, the point of the comment seems to be that hypocritical worship is equivalent to rebellion against the authority of God.

ii. 7. Sonnet with stanza structure: intermixture of two kinds of stanza: triple triplets (strengthened by refrains) and simple quatrains. The triplet stanzas convey exhortation and expostulation; the quatrains, confidence.

iii. 1. Essay in two paragraphs: Honour in general to parents — special consideration for parents in old age.

iv. 20. Be not ashamed concerning thy soul. The context shews the meaning of this to be: do not let shame hinder thee in a matter in which thy soul is concerned.

v. 2. An Epigram. I understand this literary form (compare page 1457) to indicate a unit proverb expanded: two lines of an epigram (not necessarily consecutive) contain the proverb germ, and the rest are for exegesis or emphasis. The germ lines stand out to the left in the printing adopted in this work. In the present case, the first and third lines together would make a proverb couplet.

v. 9. For the Proverb Cluster, compare page 1461; and for examples, Proverbs xxv. 2; xxvi. 3, 13, 17.

The last epigram of this cluster is of a form that occurs only in two other cases (Prov- erbs xxv. 4–5; and below, xxxvi. 18). The comment precedes the text and prepares for it. The present case is difficult, but the last two lines must be the germ proverb. The 'evil name' is the 'great matter,' which incurs hostility; the point of the proverb is that the double tongue is only a smaller case of the same evil.

vi. 2. Assuming the translation of the Revised Version, we must suppose the comment of this maxim to be an enlargement: one image is supported by another. But it must be confessed that the first image — of the bull — is very difficult to catch. Edersheim understands of a bull straying alone. It would be more to the point to compare the blind rush of a bull against a wall to his own destruction. Most commentators emend the Greek: by the smallest of changes (hōs stauros instead of hōs tauros) the reading becomes "as a palm": this directly connects with what follows, and one image is preserved throughout the whole maxim.

vi. 18. An Essay in three paragraphs: Pursuit of wisdom without understanding must fail — with understanding it will be a glorious success — if the means be applied the end must follow.

Stone of trial: compare Zechariah xii. 3. An athletic test: the unwise man will soon drop it. — Wisdom is according to her name: this is one of the recognised difficulties of the book. The natural explanation seems to be a play upon words in the original Hebrew, which, however, no Hebrew experts are now able to discover. Fritzsche, as an alternative possible explanation, understands reputation by 'name': wisdom is as inaccessible as the high reputation in which it is held would lead us to expect.

vii. 4. This difficult passage is best arranged as a maxim. The point of the exegetical comment is that pharisaism is a sort of spiritual ambition.

vii. 19. and viii. 1. Here we find precepts of behaviour so grouped as to make two essays. The second, on adaptation of behaviour to various sorts of men, becomes slightly organic by the middle portion dealing with behaviour to woman.

ix. 17. An Essay. The point of the first sentence, and so of the whole, is that it is wise speech (or instruction) that makes the artist in the art of government.

x. 6 An Essay in three paragraphs: Pride is a disease and source of Divine visitations — no greatness is greater than the fear of the Lord — not outer things but inner qualities make true greatness.

xi. 29. An Essay on the Choice of Company, in five paragraphs: The danger of unknown company in a house — the good only are proper objects of charity — friendship not trustworthy until tested by adversity — the humble can only be defiled by contact with the proud — like will to like, and riches cannot consort with poverty.

xiv. 3. An Essay in two paragraphs: Niggardliness violates duty to self — duty to self emphasised by the shortness of life.

xiv. 20. An Essay in two paragraphs: The pursuit and winning of wisdom — the successful in this are the fearers of the Lord. — Praise is not comely in the mouth of a sinner: compare Introduction, page 1464.

xvi. 1. An Essay in two paragraphs: No safety for sinners in their numbers — as little in their insignificance.

The giants of old time: compare Genesis vi. 1–4 — the people of perdition: as the illustrations follow in chronological order this would seem to refer to the Egyptian army drowned in the Red Sea — the six hundred thousand footmen: compare xlvi. 8 (page 1004). — And there is a tempest which no man shall see: i.e. till it is upon them. — "Who shall declare," etc.: the words in quotation marks are supposed to be spoken by the man wanting in understanding of the following sentence.

xvi. 24. Compare Introduction, page 1465; and for the quotations, see above, page 1540. This is an Essay, amounting to a formal rhetoric creed: a few words of solemn introduction, and four paragraphs: God the Creator of nature — God the Creator of responsible man — responsibility involves frailty and repentance, and the Creator is merciful — the Creator's omnipotence is a measure of his mercy. — The last paragraph is strikingly close to Wisdom xi. 21–6.

He set his eye upon their hearts: i.e. the Creator has given man a portion of the Divine insight into the wonders of nature. Compare Ecclesiastes iii. 11. — For every nation he appointed a ruler: there are two possible interpretations of this passage. (1) It may refer to angelic overseers, such as are recognised in the prologue to Job, and (according to Cheyne) in Psalm lxxxii. Or (2) it may be an assertion of the theocracy of Israel (compare Deuteronomy xxxii. 8, 9). From the small prominence of angelology in this work (if indeed it appears at all), I prefer the latter explanation. — He looketh upon the power, etc.: he is the Sun.

xix. 20. An Essay on Wisdom and its Counterfeits, in six clearly marked paragraphs: Counterfeit knowledge, the knowledge of wickedness — counterfeit subtlety, hypocrisy — counterfeit reproof, violence — counterfeit wise speech, as contrasted with wise silence — counterfeit prosperity and adversity — counterfeit wit.

xxi. 8. Like one that gathereth himself stones against winter. The image is a difficult one, but I can offer no better explanation than that of stones instead of wood. Or perhaps 'stone' is used (as in Luke iv. 3; xi. 11) as antithetic to 'bread.' This passage and Ecclesiastes iii. 5 suggest that 'gathering stones' may have been a proverbial expression, of which the point is now lost. Edersheim (in Wace's Commentary), assuming a misreading of the Hebrew, translates: "stones for the tomb of his burial."

xxi. 25. The lips of strangers will be grieved at these things: the R.V. gives it thus, adding that the Greek text is probably corrupt. If so translated, the words must be part of the preceding maxim; the 'these things' will be the gossip gathered by such eavesdropping.

xxi. 27. Satan: the only reference to Satan in this work. The proverb is too general to throw any light on the conception of this being.

xxii. 16. I have felt considerable difficulty about the division of the text here; on the whole it seems best to make the whole passage an Essay on the Stedfast Friend and the Uncertain. First we have three images of unstedfastness; then two images of irritable behaviour, the last bringing the first mention of friendship as that to which the images are applied. The rest continues the theme of friendship and nagging behaviour. — For the quotation, compare page 1539.

xxii. 27. A Prayer in Sonnet form. It furnishes an interesting application of duplication to antistrophic structure (see page 1521); a quatrain question (strophe 1) has a couplet answer (strophe 2); then the question is duplicated into an octet (antistrophe 1), and the answer is duplicated into a quatrain (antistrophe 2). Strophe and antistrophe 2 have a line of invocation outside their structure.

It is worth while to note how blind to anything like literary structure were those who were originally responsible for the division of chapters. Chapter xxii ends with a question of which the answer belongs to the first verse of the chapter following; although the form of question and answer are emphasised by being repeated. Other examples may be noted at the beginning of chapters vi, xix, xxvii.

xxiii. 16. An Essay in two paragraphs: Uncleanness and adultery in man — in woman. For the number sonnet buried in this essay, see page 1539.

Book II

Preface. On this Preface, with the Monologue it contains, see Introduction, page 1462. The Monologue is in alternate parallelism, with a middle climax in stanzas (three sextets varied: for variation, see page 1519).

That maketh instruction to shine forth as the light, as Gihon in the days of vintage. Most commentators hold that the Greek word translated 'light' was a misreading for another Hebrew word signifying 'the River,' namely the Nile. So 'Gihon,' besides being the name of a place in the vicinity of Jerusalem, is also used for the Nile in the LXX of Jeremiah ii. 18. The run of the whole passage suggests the name of a river in this place; and the Syriac version so interprets it.

xxv. 7. In the last line but one of this number sonnet the R.V. (with the greater part of the Greek MSS.) reads The fear of the Lord. But this leaves the number sonnet without the tenth item promised by its introductory words: which is impossible. The Syriac version introduces (after the tenth line) the clause: Happy is he who is not cast down in poverty, And who in misfortune does not lose courage. But this is evidently the conjecture of one who has not caught the form of the sonnet, in which the nine items are being enumerated in nine lines, and a longer expression is reserved for the climax. The reading The Love of the Lord has the support of one important MS., and makes the form of the sonnet exact.

xxv. 15. The head of a serpent. So the Greek. But it has been pointed out that a Hebrew word has the two meanings of 'head' and 'venom': this was probably the word in the original, and it has been misinterpreted.

xxvii. 25. An Essay in two paragraphs: Vengeance and its retribution — forgiveness.

xxix. 1. An Essay in four paragraphs: Lending and repaying — the ways of debtors — charity as a motive for lending — risks of lending.

xxx. 14. An Essay in two paragraphs: Health the supreme good — cheerfulness a promoter of health.

xxxi. 1. For the verse quotation, see page 1539.

xxxi. 12. An Essay in five paragraphs: Greedy eating — moderate eating and health — hospitality — temperance in wine — behaviour at a feast.

xxxiii. 7. An Essay tracing an analogy, in three paragraphs: One sunshine, yet God has made days sacred and days secular — one origin of man, yet God has exalted some and overthrown others — Good and Life, Evil and Death, these make one of the oppositions that are traced through all nature.

The last paragraph is not an assertion of predestination of individuals (compare xv. 11), but an answer to the question, Why has not God made all men good?

Book III

Preface. See Introduction, page 1462.

xxxiii. 24. An Essay on Servants, in two paragraphs: Work — good treatment.

xxxiv. 13. The structure of this Sonnet gives four similar triplet stanzas, the last 'interrupted' (compare page 1526).

xxxiv. 18. An Essay in five paragraphs: Sacrifice with wrongdoing — sacrifice without rightdoing — liberality in offerings — sacrifice is not bribery — the power of humble prayer.

xxxvi. See above, note to v. 9.

xxxvii. 7. An Essay in two paragraphs: Counsel — different kinds of counsellors.

The second paragraph is obscure; I have elsewhere interpreted it as follows. Man's whole experience for good or evil depends upon the direction of his purposes; and a force continually influencing these purposes is the speech of his fellow-men. Hence the importance of marking the characters of those who counsel. One type has the power of imparting instruction, but no morale to make the instruction worth having: for all his wisdom, he is unprofitable to his own soul. One is false in speech, and so wholly hateful. A third has his wisdom bounded by selfishness; but what he is willing to speak will be worth marking. The truly wise will have not only wisdom, but also the desire to impart it to his fellow-countrymen; his blessedness will be as much beyond that of the other as a nation is wider and more lasting than an individual.

xxxvii. 27. An Essay in three paragraphs: Regimen in health — the physician — regimen in disease.

xxxviii. 16. For the poetic quotation, see page 1540.

xxxviii. 24. An Essay in two paragraphs: Wisdom of the busy — of the man of leisure.

Book IV

Preface with Encomium. It is not without great hesitation that I present this as a rhetoric encomium, and not a hymn. It must be remembered that the simple parallelism (of adjacent lines), as distinguished from high parallelism (between clauses widely separate), is as thoroughly within the scope of rhetoric as of Hebrew versification. On the other hand, there are clauses in this passage which suit prose literature better than verse. The introductory words — Give utterance to his praise with the songs of your lips, and with harps; and thus shall ye say when ye utter his praise — at first, no doubt, suggest a hymn to follow. But a careful study of the whole leaves on me the impression that what is added is intended as the philosophical theory on which praise is to be founded, not the praise itself. Again, the position of this composition in the whole work, in which rhetoric style can be seen to be steadily gaining ground as against poetic and strictly gnomic, favours the classification as an encomium.

The argument is in two paragraphs: All things are good in their seasons — all things (even evil) have their uses. — The whole makes up the Philosophy of Times and Seasons cited and attacked in Ecclesiastes, chapter iii.

xl. 11. A pair of Sonnets: each an enumeration working to a climax in the phrase

'Garden of Blessings.' The first has couplets of alternate parallelism, climaxing in a couplet of similar parallelism; the second has similar triplets climaxing in a quatrain.

xli. 1. Sonnet in antistrophic structure with a conclusion (page 1522).

xli. 14. An Essay in two paragraphs: What to be ashamed of — what not to be ashamed of.

xlii. 9. An Essay in two paragraphs: Trouble from a daughter — from women in general.

Book V

xlii. 15. For the verse quotations, see page 1540.

xliv. 1. On the general matter of this encomium compare Introduction, page 1467. For the verse quotations, see page 1540.

xlvii. 20. And I was grieved for thy folly: see page 1541.

xlviii. 11. Blessed are they that saw thee . . . for we also shall surely live: this important passage is fully discussed above, page 1541.

xlix. 9. He remembered the enemies in storm: for this, and the difficulties of the sentences that follow, see page 1542.

Page 1008 or Epilogue

They that sit upon the mountain of Samaria. So the R.V. and all Greek MSS. The difficulty is that the fifth line, And that foolish people that dwelleth in Sichem, can refer to nothing but the Samaritans. The Syriac and other versions give in the first line, Mount Seir: suggesting that the original Hebrew word was a term for 'mountain country,' which was traditionally used of a region of Edom. — If the R.V. translation be maintained, the only explanation can be a surprise saying, something like the familiar quotation: "The first thing in oratory is action, the second is action, and the third is action." But there is no case resembling this in the biblical epigrams or sonnets.

Prologue

All is Vanity

The totality of things is incomprehensible, and the effort to interpret it is lost labour.
In things of nature there is no movement which is not movement in a circle.
In human inquiry there is no attainment.
In the succession of events there is no advance.
In the succession of human generations there is no continuity.

Essay I

in the form of a Dramatic Monologue

Solomon's Search for Wisdom

The Preacher identifies himself for the moment with King Solomon, as supreme in wealth and wisdom, in order to trace a fancy experiment: the turning reflection on to all kinds of human effort, only to find that they yield nothing to analysis.

1. The accumulation without limit of all pleasures, including follies (but the 'wisdom,' or analysing power, being retained all through): the survey presents nothing that is not illusory.

2. Analysis turned on to wisdom itself [the reflective faculty and its appropriate expression in conduct]: this infinitely superior to its opposite, yet both are involved in the same death.

3. Reflection turned on to 'labour' [i.e. production of goods as distinguished from consumption]: this made hateful by the necessity of leaving to a successor who may be a fool.

4. Is wisdom to be found in appreciating the process [as distinguished from the result] whether of pleasure-making or labour? But such appreciation of life is a gift of God, and is not in the power of the seeker. The survey ends in illusion.

Essay II

The Philosophy of Times and Seasons

A Theory. — The sphere of wisdom does not lie in the Whole, but in the separate Parts: all things have an interest of their own [have their ' seasons ']. — This having been stated (in sonnet form) is met with four objections.

1. The Parts have an inherent interest of their own — but equally inherent in man is the questioning of the universal, which can never be satisfied.

2. The appreciation of this interest of the Parts is a God-given thing — and God acts on fixed principles which the individual cannot influence.

3. The ' seasons ' of things are seen reversed: wickedness in place of judgment.
Objection. — Such facts argue an hereafter for rectification.
Rejoinder. — The facts fit equally with the view that man is not different in his end from the beasts.

4. There are things to which no ' season ' can give an interest: suffering under oppression — skill attained at the price of bitter competition — effort recognising its own purposelessness.

Essay III

The Vanity of Desire

Attainment without satisfaction.
Attainment attended by hurt.
Attainment attended by hurt and followed by failure.
Side by side, a real good: God-given wealth with God-given satisfaction in it — and the worst of evils: God-given wealth and the satisfaction withheld.
Desire prompts effort, only to encounter limitations inherent in humanity.
Knowledge of what to desire belongs to a future which the short life never reaches.

Essay IV

The Search for Wisdom with Notes by the Way

Wisdom [interpretation of the Whole] is unattainable: but tentative approaches may be made, notes on the analysis of things.
Feminine temptation is worse than death.
A wise man is a rarity; a wise woman not yet found.
The Creator's design in man was moral: his own bent is utilitarian.
The wise man's spirit is reflected in his countenance.
Non-resistance a religious duty and a point of wisdom: within its limits there is safety; whereas the wisdom of resistance could only be proved in a future the individual will not live to see.
Sin is encouraged by the spectacle of the oppressor and his innocent victim coming to the same end of death and oblivion: but in spite of such impunity it is not well with the wicked.
The spectacle of the righteous unfortunate and the wicked prosperous brings despair of wisdom: there seems nothing better than enjoyment.
The vastness of the survey of things makes wisdom unattainable. — This alone is more than any can solve: that the fate of the righteous for good or ill is a secret of God; the same death comes to all, and for the dead there is no portion in any thing.
Happiness in life is the sign of God's acceptance: cultivate it before the grave cuts the life short.

Capacity does not secure attainment: time and chance happen to all.
Wisdom achieving where strength failed is yet forgotten because united with poverty.

Essay V

Life as a Joy shadowed by Vanity

Life is a thing of joy — tempered with responsibility — the coming days of vanity a reason for cherishing life while it lasts — the coming years of feebleness a reason for an early recognition of the Creator.

Epilogue

All is Vanity — Fear God

The totality of things is incomprehensible.
The function of wisdom [analytic] is limited: detailed reflections and the working up of these, for the purpose of stimulus [goads] and securing steps of advance [nails] — anything beyond this is lost labour.
The summary of wisdom [practical]: human works within the limits of Divine commandments.

Notes to Ecclesiastes

For the book as a whole, compare Introduction, page 1469. Compare also General Note on Literary Formulæ, page 1536.

Title

Ecclesiastes, or the Preacher. — The Greek word 'Ecclesiastes' was used by the translators of the Septuagint to express a Hebrew word Qoheleth. As the Hebrew word does not occur elsewhere, all that we can learn as to the original title may be summed up under two heads: (1) that it is connected etymologically with the general idea of 'collecting' or 'gathering': (2) that the Seventy thought it represented by the Greek word they used for it. This word, in Classical Greek, means simply a 'Member of Assembly,' and I see no reason why the title of this book need do more than suggest 'One of the Wise'; the word 'Counsellor' is often used in this sense (e.g. Job, chapter xii. 17). The Vulgate, however, interpreted it as the caller of an assembly, and expressed this by the Latin word Concionator; which Luther further altered into Preacher, and this title has unfortunately survived. It is impossible now to alter it; but there is nothing in the book that fits in with it.

The words of the Preacher, the son of David, king in Jerusalem. These words are found in the R.V., but such editorial sub-titles are omitted in the present edition. There is no evidence to show that such titles were part of the original works, or to indicate what authority of tradition they bring. On the other hand they are often out of keeping with the matter to which they are prefixed (e.g. Psalms xxxiv, lii); or at least describe correctly only the beginning, and not the whole, of what they introduce (compare page 1462). In the present case they seem to be based on the opening words of Essay I, the addition of an editor who did not perceive that such words would apply only to that essay. It may be pointed out, moreover, that it was a tendency of antiquity to describe loosely a whole work by what was a prominent part of it. Thus the biblical title to Proverbs uses the expression "The Proverbs of Solomon," etc., although other authorship is recognised in the book itself, and further, the title "The Proverbs of Solomon" is repeated at the point (chapter x) where these actually begin. The title is further explained by the tendency (see page 1471) to speak of all proverb literature by the name of the Solomon who was regarded as its founder. To such an extent does this prevail in ecclesiastical tradition that Clement (of Alexandria) and Cyprian use 'Solomon' even for Ecclesiasticus, although that collection of wisdom has an author who names himself, and is named at the outset by his translator. — It is hardly necessary to add that the words are of no force in the question of the authorship of the book.

Prologue

For the general argument of the prologue, see the Syllabus.

i. 1. Vanity of vanities: for this formula, see page 1536. — Saith the Preacher: for the word Preacher, see above, page 1636. These or similar words constitute a formula that partly takes the place of the My son of other wisdom books. It is significant that the latter is only used in the epilogue. The older type of Men of Wisdom held a firmly established system, and so spoke down to their readers; the present writer has failed to solve life's mystery, and so speaks only as 'One of the Wise' to others his equals. But when he, in the epilogue, is proclaiming this negative attitude as the true wisdom, he falls naturally into the authoritative My son.

i. 7. All the rivers run into the sea, yet the sea is not full; unto the place whither the rivers go, thither they go again. So far as a circle can be said to have a starting-point, this passage makes the sea the fountain for the round of waters: from the sea rises vapour which falls in rain on the land, percolates into rivers, and so runs back to the sea. Similarly Homer:

> The mighty strength of Ocean's fathomless flow,
> Forth out of whom all rivers and all the sea-waves go,
> *And all deep-slumbering wells and fountains sunlight plashing.

The same thought (with a slight difference in the process) is the foundation of one of the most beautiful similes in English poetry (in Sir John Davies's Nosce teipsum).

> And as the moisture, which the thirsty earth
> Sucks from the sea, to fill her empty veins,
> From out her womb at last doth take a birth,
> And runs a lymph along the grassy plains:
>
> Long doth she stay, as loth to leave the land,
> From whose soft side she first did issue make;
> She tastes all places, turns to every hand,
> Her flowery banks unwilling to forsake:
>
> Yet nature so her streams doth lead and carry,
> As that her course doth make no final stay,
> Till she herself unto the ocean marry,
> Within whose watery bosom first she lay:
>
> E'en so the soul, which in this earthly mould
> The spirit of God doth secretly infuse,
> Because at first she doth the earth behold,
> And only this material world she views:
>
> At first her mother earth she holdeth dear,
> And doth embrace the world, and worldly things;
> She flies close by the ground, and hovers here,
> And mounts not up with her celestial wings.
>
> Yet under heaven she cannot light on aught
> That with her heavenly nature doth agree:
> She cannot rest, she cannot fix her thought,
> She cannot in this world contented be.

I have thought it worth while to support this conception at full length, because so omniscient a writer as Lord Macaulay blundered over it, and fastened his own blunder on the author he was reviewing. In the celebrated essay on Robert Montgomery occurs the following passage.

* Iliad, xxi. 19 (Way's translation).

We would not be understood, however, to say, that Mr. Robert Montgomery cannot make similitudes for himself. A very few lines further on, we find one which has every mark of originality, and on which, we will be bound, none of the poets whom he has plundered will ever think of making reprisals:

"The soul, aspiring, pants its source to mount,
As streams meander level with their fount."

We take this to be, on the whole, the worst similitude in the world. In the first place, no stream meanders, or can possibly meander, level with its fount. In the next place, if streams did meander level with their founts, no two motions can be less like each other than that of meandering level and that of mounting upwards.

It is plain that Macaulay thought only of the prosaic fountain of a stream, which must be its highest point; Montgomery, with Homer, and Ecclesiastes and poetry, conceives the sea to be the true and ultimate fountain of the moving water. Again, the reviewer parsed the sentence wrongly, in not seeing that level was 'proleptic': when a maid "scrubs a floor clean" she scrubs it till it is clean, not when it is clean; so streams meander till they are level with their fount, the sea. So far from being original with Robert Montgomery the couplet is a legitimate echo of the much praised simile of Davies; and the whole verse about "tasting all places" and "turning to every hand" is summed up in the suggestive "meander" of the later poet. A poetic conception that trips up Lord Macaulay is one as to which the readers of the present volume will not object to be cautioned.

Essay I

For the argument of the essay, see the Syllabus.

i. 12. I the Preacher was king, etc. The author is here identifying himself with Solomon, for the purpose of describing, in his person, an imaginary experiment. (See Introduction, pages 1471, 1473.)

ii. 3, 9. Mine heart yet guiding me with wisdom . . . also my wisdom remained with me. The experiment included the pleasures that are called follies: he will give himself freely to them, but retain the wise reflecting power that can analyse them. (Compare above, page 1538.) On the idea of thus experimenting in folly see a note on Wisdom Discourse I (below, page 1650).

ii. 10. For my heart rejoiced because of all my labour; and this was my portion from all my labour. The point of this sentence is that the imaginary experiment is successful considered as an experiment, that the goods accumulated do bring their impression of pleasure: but when reflection is turned upon them there is no satisfaction. This element of the argument is necessitated by the fixed idea of the author, which recurs again and again; that a man may possess all objects of happiness, and yet may lack the happiness they ought to bring. (See Introduction, page 1475.)

ii. 18. And I hated all my labour, etc. The Syllabus suggests the difference between this and the second paragraph: in both there is accumulation of good things, but the first experiment was accumulating only to consume: this is the interest of production itself, e.g. moneymaking, as distinct from spending a fortune. (See above, page 1473.) Both are distinct from the following paragraph, which deals with the process (of pleasure or labour) as distinct from the final result: appreciation of life as it flows along, not the achievement of great results in enjoyment.

ii. 24. There is nothing better for a man than that he should eat and drink: for these and similar expressions see above, pages 1537, 1475.

ii. 24. This also I saw, that it is from the hand of God. This is the first appearance of what is one of the two positive ideas of the book — that appreciation of life (or natural happiness) is the gift of God. (See Introduction, page 1473, etc.)

Essay II

For the general argument of this essay see the Syllabus.

In a sonnet a certain theory of life is stated, and in prose this theory is discussed and rejected. The form of the sonnet is combination of stanza and pendulum structure. The latter sways between one side and the other of a number of antitheses or 'oppositions' (see Ecclesiasticus xxxiii. 7–15, and note on page 1633) which are regarded as identical or related:

positive and negative production and destruction joy and sorrow collection and dispersion speech and silence love and hate.

iii. 1. To everything there is a season, and a time to every purpose under the heaven. These important words contain the gist of the theory of life which this essay is to review. Caution is required to prevent the misunderstanding of this epigrammatic statement of it. It is natural to associate, as Plumptre and others have done, the expression 'time and season' with the Greek word kairos, which in a particular phase of ancient thought was as prominent as perhaps the word 'evolution' is in our own day. But I wish to show that 'time and season' in the present passage represent a totally different set of ideas from 'time' associated with other terms in other parts of Ecclesiastes.

The idea underlying the special usage of the Greek word kairos is precisely that embodied in Shakespeare's familiar saying:

There is a tide in the affairs of men
Which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune;
Omitted, all the remnant of their lives
Is bound in shallows and in miseries.

It is part of the fatalism of Greek thought, but represents a favourable aspect of fate; the drift of things is irresistible, but an individual, by watching and adapting himself to it, can make irresistible destiny achieve his purpose. Hence the maxim of Pittacus: "Know the kairos," the opportunity. Hence, at the opening of Sophocles' Electra, Orestes says:

The true, right time is come,
The mightiest master of all works of men.

The idea (in limited sense) has been allegorised by Spenser in his Occasio (Faerie Queene. II. iv): the lame Hag:

Her lockes, that loathly were, and hoarie gray,
Grew all afore, and loosely hong unrold;
But all behinde was bald, and worne away,
That none thereof could ever taken hold: — for of course we must "take time by the forelock."

The same idea seems to underlie the expression 'time and judgement' in one of the most difficult passages of the present work (viii. 5). The whole paragraph (see the Syllabus) seems to lay down the doctrine of passive obedience or non-resistance, and this argument is used:

> Whoso keepeth the commandment shall know no evil thing; and a wise man's heart discerneth time and judgement. For to every purpose there is a time and judgement; because the misery of man is great upon him, for he knoweth not that which shall be. For who can tell him how it shall be? There is no man that hath power over the spirit to retain the spirit; neither hath he power over the day of death; etc.

Within the limits of obedience to authority there is safety. But (the objection seems to occur) is not resistance to evil the part of the wise man? The truly wise man (answers Ecclesiastes) knows that resistance to evil, like every other human action, is limited by its 'time'; and only the hidden future will show by the event whether the resistance is justified by success, or proves a vain struggle against the inevitable. If this interpretation is correct, 'time' here is used in the sense of the Greek kairos, and this is linked with the biblical judgement, the good or evil of a thing demonstrated by the event.

Akin to this is another passage of this work (ix. 11–13), in which 'time' enters into another formula. The argument is that the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong:

> But time and chance happeneth to them all. For man also knoweth not his time: as the fishes that are taken in an evil net, and as the birds that are caught in the snare, even so are the sons of men snared in an evil time, when it falleth suddenly upon them.

This 'time' is the converse of kairos: the moment, not when man may master his fate, but when his fate masters him.

But the 'time and season' of Essay II represent a different thought altogether, for which we have to go back to an important passage of Ecclesiasticus. [That is, if we assume Ecclesiasticus to be the earlier work; if not, the passage is none the less a clear indication of the theory of life which both authors notice, the one to accept and the other to reject it.] In the Preface to Book IV the son of Sirach undertakes to give the principles upon which Divine praise is to be based.

> All the works of the Lord are exceeding good, and every command shall be accomplished in his season. None can say, What is this? wherefore is that? for in his season they shall all be sought out. . . . He beholdeth from everlasting to everlasting, and there is nothing wonderful before him. None can say, What is this? wherefore is that? for all things are created for their uses. . . . His ways are plain unto the holy; so are they stumblingblocks unto the wicked.

Details follow of things — water, fire, iron, salt, etc. — good for the godly, for sinners turned into evil; winds and terrors that shall be ready for vengeance in their 'seasons.'

> Therefore from the beginning I was resolved, and I thought this, and left it in writing: All the works of the Lord are good; and he will supply every need in its season. And none can say, This is worse than that: for they shall all be well approved in their season.

The writer is making a formal reconciliation between the traditional adoration of the works of the Lord, and the growing difficulty of the recognition of evil in the world. His reconciliation is, that there is no absolute good or absolute evil, but that all things have their share of good and of evil. They are not to be looked at in themselves, but to be 'sought out' in God's 'season,' that is, when his use of them has shown them as containing good or containing evil; what he expresses in one place by 'seasons' he expresses in another place by 'uses.' So far does he carry the argument that he will not admit that one thing is 'worse' [or better] than another: it is a question of the 'season' of each.

Whether the allusion be to the work of the son of Sirach or not, this is clearly the theory which Ecclesiastes here reviews: that all things are by their 'seasons' demonstrated to have their part in good. The notion of an absolute good (or summum bonum) has been the thought of Essay I; now he deals with the other view, that good is to be looked for in the 'Parts'; that there are multa bona; that everything has a share of good, and that appreciation of life is to be adjusted to this. The expression 'time and season' is a temporal one; the meaning is not temporal, but is what we should express by the metaphor of place: "there is a place for all things in our estimate of good." Hence the total divergence from the idea of the Greek kairos. The latter implies a 'season' which alone makes a thing good. But the 'seasons' of Ecclesiasticus are God's seasons of approving things — seasons required only to reveal the relation of a thing with good and with evil, which relation belongs to it always. That this is the meaning is abundantly clear, not only from the sonnet-like statement of the theory, but also from the arguments by which it is met: that the interest of the 'Parts' does not exclude the interest of the Whole, that the places of these 'Parts' are seen reversed, that there are 'Parts' which can have no place in a scheme of good.

iii. 11. Also he hath set the world in their hearts. The margin offers the alternative eternity instead of world: either expresses what is required, the antithesis of universal and particular. The work that God hath done, etc.: see above, page 1537. On the whole passage compare Bacon, Advancement of Learning, paragraph 3 of Book I. He quotes this verse and proceeds:

> declaring not obscurely, that God hath framed the mind of man as a mirror or glass, capable of the image of the universal world, and joyful to receive the impression thereof, as the eye joyeth to receive light; and not only delighted in beholding the variety of things and vicissitude of times, but raised also to find out and discern the ordinances and decrees, which throughout all those changes are infallibly observed. And although he doth insinuate that the supreme or summary law of nature, which he calleth The work which God worketh from the beginning to the end, is not possible to be found out by man; yet that doth not derogate from the capacity of the mind, but may be referred to the impediments, as of shortness of life, ill conjunction of labours, ill tradition of knowledge over from hand to hand, and many other inconveniences, whereunto the condition of man is subject.

The latter part of this comment would not have been admitted by Ecclesiastes; nevertheless it is a real answer to his difficulty. The failure of the Preacher to find harmony in the universe is due to his confinement of the inquiry to the short life of a single thinker; the evil of such limitation is pointed out by the literary representative of that Inductive Philosophy which is an organisation of all thinkers, from generation to generation, for the solution of what Ecclesiastes pronounced insoluble.

iii. 17. There is a time there for every purpose: the there is the indefinite future implied in the preceding shall: "God shall judge the righteous and the wicked." The words naturally suggest judgment beyond death. But the important point of the passage is that this is a passing thought, immediately rejected in favour of the other thought, that there is nothing to support such a future for man more than for the brutes. (See the Syllabus; and above, pages 1473–4.) No other passage recognises any future existence: the expression of the final sonnet, And the spirit return unto God who gave it, clearly means that by death man will become what he was before birth. On the contrary, the negative of existence after death is insisted upon in place after place of this book.

iv. 5. The fool foldeth his hands together, etc. I understand these words as the interposition of an imaginary objector, and the words that follow, Better is an handful of quietness, etc., as the rejoinder of Ecclesiastes. Such citation of objections in the words of the supposed objector occurs more than once in Job.

Miscellanea

iv. 13. There is no historical allusion here: it is a maxim of general experience on the Vanity of Kingship. Out of prison he came forth to be king; yea, even in his kingdom he was born poor. I understand by the prison the womb; and for born poor compare: "Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither." (Job i. 21; compare Ecclesiastes v. 15.) The thought of the whole is: In essence, apart from outward trappings, the king is as poor as the poor youth: at birth one was as poor as the other. And what do these outward trappings amount to? When the old king is gone, all the world flocks to his successor; but that successor will be equally forsaken in his turn. — The youth, the second has no necessary reference to the poor and wise youth: the main antithesis of king and poor was merely strengthened by the further antithesis of old and foolish and youth and wise.

v. 1. A maxim founded upon an image (compare Ecclesiasticus vi. 2): pious volubility no better than the talking in sleep of an overworked brain.

v. 8. A maxim with the text in the middle: compare vii. 15; x. 5. [For the maxim in general, compare page 1460.] The saying puts two conceptions of government: one looking upon the people as a field for extortion, the other upon the land as a thing to be developed.

Essay III

For the general argument of this essay see the Syllabus.

v. 20. He shall not much remember the days of his life; because God answereth him in the joy of his heart. Cheyne understands: "he will not think much on the (few) days of his life," and this is a simple explanation. On the whole, however, I prefer a different interpretation. It must be remembered that it is a fixed idea of the book that natural happiness is the direct and special gift of God to the individual. Such an individual will not "take much thought for his life": the happiness comes in answer to his prayers almost before they are offered. This is confirmed by the corresponding passage in Essay IV (ix. 7); especially note the word already:

> Go thy way, eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart; for God hath already accepted thy works.

The picture is one of simple happiness, free from the burden of thought.

vi. 7. All the labour of man is for his mouth: compare Proverbs xvi. 26. The word mouth is a formula for desire or natural wants: compare the similar formulæ above, page 1536.—For what advantage hath the wise man more than the fool, etc.: that is, they both have the same natural necessities.

vi. 10. His name was given him long ago . . . Man. The remark rests upon the ancient idea of a name as a formula of definition. Thus limitation is inherent in a man's humanity.

Miscellanea

vii. 1, vii. 8. These two maxims must be taken together, though the proverb separating them clearly has no connection with them. The thought rests upon a series of 'oppositions' (compare above, page 1639, and Ecclesiasticus xxxiii. 14):

The good name (only established at death)	Ointment, the symbol of the feast (Psalm xxiii. 5)
Mourning and rebuke	Laughter and song
Death (summing up the whole life)	Birth (commences opportunity for feasting)
The end	The beginning
Patience (looking to the end of things)	Anger (the impatience that does not wait to prove things)
The former days (which can be seen as wholes)	The present days (and therefore seen imperfectly)

vii. 12. The excellency of knowledge is that wisdom preserveth the life of him that hath it. Both wisdom and money defend against external attack, but wisdom also affects the life itself — that is eu zēn not zēn only, the life of character.

vii. 14. God hath even made the one [prosperity] side by side with the other [adversity], to the end that man should not find out anything that shall be after him. This is presented as the reflection which is proper for adversity. With it compare:

> There is nothing better than that a man should rejoice in his works; for that is his portion: for who shall bring him back to see what shall be after him? (iii. 22).
> For who knoweth what is good for man in his life, . . . for who can tell a man what shall be after him under the sun? (vi. 12).
> The misery of man is great upon him, for he knoweth not that which shall be. For who can tell him how it shall be? There is no man that hath power over the spirit to retain the spirit; etc. (viii. 6).

These passages read together bring out how the impossibility of man's reading the future is one of the fixed ideas of Ecclesiastes. This seems to give a clew to one of the sources of his intellectual despair. He belongs to a stage of philosophic development which has just grasped the crushing thought of 'law,' or invariable sequence, in nature and human events. To us, such a law seems to imply power of foreseeing the future when the laws of things have been traced. But this would conflict with a more fundamental conception of the Hebrew mind — the inscrutability of the Creator, which plays such an important part in the earlier speeches of Job in answer to the Friends. Accordingly Ecclesiastes seems to recognise an element of the incalculable in Divine providence, sufficient to defea' all efforts to foresee: and thus man has the double 'misery' of perceiving law, and yet being powerless to secure the event by acting on law. So the sense of the present maxim is: If your [wise] action results in prosperity, be glad of it; if notwithstanding all your wisdom adversity comes, remember this is the incalculable dispensation of the Creator, without which man would be able to read into the future.

vii. 15. This is a maxim with the text in the middle (compare v. 8; x. 5): moreover, it is unique in having, not a couplet, but a sextet for text. — Be not righteous over much . . . yea, also from that [wickedness] withdraw not thine hand, etc. Some readers are shocked at this sentiment; others (like Plumptre) would explain away the words by 'gentle irony,' or otherwise. I see no difficulty. Here, as in so many other sayings, Ecclesiastes is simply reading into the form of precepts the mysteries of providential dealings. The fact of providential dispensation that the scrupulously just may yet fail, and the unscrupulous achieve good results, is here made a basis for conduct. The history of Israel has many cases in which treacherous assassination has worked the deliverance of God's people: with such a thought in his mind our author says that even from wickedness the wise man may not be able wholly to withdraw his hand. But he immediately adds the corrective: in this perplexity of providential dispensation "the fear of the Lord" for motive is the safe guide. For the reputation of the Preacher it is fair to put side by side with this the opposite principle in Essay IV (viii. 11–13): in spite of this same providential mystery he clings to the idea that it is well with the righteous and ill with the unpunished sinner.

vii. 19. Wisdom is a strength . . . more than ten rulers which are in a city. It is clear that the word ruler cannot here mean a supreme ruler; for the multiplication of such by ten would be the opposite of an advantage. The 'rulers' must be the king's officers or agents, and then the meaning of the maxim is clear: wisdom in the king is better than the multiplication of officers, for it is a mistake to punish small offences, nor is it well for the king to be informed of everything that goes on.

Essay IV

For the general argument of the essay see the Syllabus.

vii. 23. I said, I will be wise; but it was far from me . . . I turned about, and my heart was set . . . to search out, etc. These words contain the purpose of the essay, and make clear its difference from Essay I. The words imply two stages of thought (compare above, page 1537): the first (like Essay I) recognises the hopelessness of solving the mystery of things; then another suggests the possibility of a partial or tentative solution: and this Essay IV follows out.

vii. 29. They have sought out many inventions: the antithesis is between moral and utilitarian. A commentary on this saying of Ecclesiastes is the common reflection of modern writers that a man will endure insinuations against his moral character with more equanimity than suggestions of his mental incompetence.

viii. 2. I counsel thee, keep the king's command, and that in regard of the oath of God. The general doctrine of passive obedience or non-resistance: the same combination of thoughts as in Romans xiii. 1–7, though of course St. Paul is providing for a very different situation of things — a 'kingdom not of this world' in the midst of secular rule. Whoso keepeth the commandment shall know no evil thing, etc. For this difficult passage see above, page 1639.

viii. 10. And withal I saw the wicked buried, etc. This passage becomes clear when the paragraphs are arranged as in the text (see also the Syllabus). The thought is: There is a time when an individual has the power to oppress another; the wicked oppressor dies and is buried; similarly the righteous victim is taken away [by death] from the holy place and the city: both have the same end, and the sight of this 'vanity' of providence encourages sin. This is strikingly parallel to a difficult saying in Job (chapter xxi. 29): the two passages explain one another.

Have ye not asked them that go by the way?
And do ye not know their tokens?
That the evil man is spared in the day of calamity?
That they are led away in the day of wrath?
Who shall declare his way to his face?

And who shall repay him what he hath done?
Moreover he is borne to the grave,
And they shall keep watch over his tomb;
The clods of the valley are sweet unto him,
And all men draw after him.

Both passages are concerned with the providential mystery of the oppressor and wicked man honoured in the time of their death. — Though a sinner do evil . . . yet surely I know, etc. A paradox: in spite of appearances, it is not so; or in spite of individual cases, the principle of judgment on the wicked is sound. The importance of the passage is the maintenance of moral principle side by side with complete scepticism as to understanding the mystery of God's ways. (Introduction, page 1475.)

viii. 15. Then I commended mirth, etc.: for mirth, eat and drink, etc., see above, page 1537. The point of commended is, that this seems an inevitable deduction from the facts.

viii. 16. The business that is done upon the earth . . . all the work of God: for these phrases see above, page 1537.

ix. 3. Madness is in their heart while they live: this does not apply to the wicked only, but to all; madness being one of the synonyms of laughter (as well as of folly) in Essay I.

ix. 7. God hath already accepted thy works: for the importance of this thought in the whole argument, see Introduction, page 1474. For already compare above, page 1642. All the days of thy vanity, etc.: the point of these impressive reiterations is the same as that of Essay V: the briefness of life is reason for appreciating to the full what is given.

ix. 11. Time and chance happeneth to them all . . . for man also knoweth not his time: see above, page 1640.

x. 14. Yet man knoweth not what shall be: see above, page 1642.

x. 16. Thy princes eat in the morning: compare such passages as Acts, chapter ii. 15; Isaiah, chapter v. 11.

xi. 3. According to the structure of an epigram (page 1457) the two lines standing out to the left ought to contain a couplet proverb complete in itself. In substance this principle is carried out here; only the nouns of the preceding lines need substituting for the pronouns; thus the form would be:

Full rain clouds empty themselves upon the earth,
And the tree, where it falleth, there shall it be.

The saying puts the thought of irresistible necessity, as in the prologue.

xi. 5. For an interesting parallel compare Psalm cxxxix. 13–16.

Essay V

For the general argument see the Syllabus. Compare also Introduction, page 1474.

xi. 9. But know thou that for all these things God will bring thee into judgement. This is not (1) an ironical challenge: revel away, but the judgment will come down upon thee. (2) Nor a reference to any 'day of judgment' in the far future. It is the main positive thought of the book that happiness is God's best gift; but it must be happiness with a sense of responsibility; for their enjoyment, as for everything else, men must be prepared to give account. Throughout the O.T. the word 'judgment' implies the irreconcilable antagonism of good and evil, the recognition of which makes responsibility. This passage by itself is sufficient to differentiate the 'joy' of our author from the abandon of the reveller.

Sonnet. The form of this sonnet is the pendulum structure (page 1523): the middle lines put symbolic descriptions of old age; the left hand lines drop the symbolism and speak in plain terms. [The lines indented on the extreme right are subordinate clauses.]

The matter of the sonnet is a tour-de-force of symbolism, under which are veiled the symptoms of senile decay followed by death. It is very likely that some of the symbols may be lost; but it is not difficult, without straining, to see a possible interpretation for each; and some of them have passed into traditional use. The poetic beauty of the passage is marvellous. It has, however, been the subject of extraordinary ingenuity in pressing details to too literal significance. Those who are curious are referred to the notes of Plumptre, or the elaborate edition of Dr. Ginsburg. I attempt no more than a simple suggestion for each detail.

Or ever the sun, and the light . . . be darkened: in view of the opening words of Essay V, which take the 'light' and 'sun' as symbols of the whole happiness of conscious existence, it is clear that the darkening of this light is the gradual failing of the joy of living. — And the clouds return after the rain: an exquisite symbol closely akin to the last. In youth we may overstrain and disturb our health, but we soon rally; these are storms that quickly clear up. In age the rallying power is gone: 'the clouds return after the rain.' — The keepers of the house shall tremble: Cheyne understands of the hands and arms, the trembling of which is a natural accompaniment of old age. Compare in the parallel below (page 1646) the withered fist knocking at death's door. — The strong men shall bow themselves: the stooping frame; the plural is merely by attraction to 'keepers.' — The grinders cease because they are few: obviously of the teeth. — Those that look out of the windows be darkened: the eyes becoming dim. — The doors shall be shut in the street: the general connection of ideas makes it inevitable that the 'folding-doors' should be the jaws; clenched jaws are so marked a feature in the skull that it is not difficult to associate them with the picture of old age. — When the sound of the grinding is low, and one shall rise up at the voice of bird, and all the daughters of music shall be brought low: these must be taken together: appetite, sleep, and speech are all feeble. Grinding must be interpreted as grinders in the previous part of the sonnet: the loud or low sound of such grinding may fitly typify the eagerness of appetite or the reverse. The early waking or short sleeping of the old is well known. The daughters of music are the tones of the voice. — They shall be afraid of that which is high, and terrors shall be in the way: the gait of old age is, through physical feebleness, much what the gait of a person terrified is for other reasons. Compare Sackville's lines:

> Next saw we Dread, all trembling how he shook,
> With foot uncertain proffered here and there.

The almond tree shall blossom, and the grasshopper shall be a burden, and the caper-berry shall burst: the three are linked together as being images from natural objects, not because of their symbolising similar things. The blossoming of the almond tree I believe to be the sparse white hairs of age. It would be unlikely that this obvious symptom should be omitted; and of the almond tree these two things are established: (1) it is the first to blossom (and its Hebrew name is founded on this), (2) though not strictly white its blossoms look white by contrast with other blossoms (see Sir W. Smith's dictionary s.v. page 97 b). The whitish blossoms solitary while all is bare around just yield the image required. The grasshopper is evidently a symbol for a small object, which is nevertheless heavy to feeble age. The caper-berry shall burst: the last stage of its decay: the failing powers at last give way. And then follows the dropping of the symbolism: "Man goeth to his long home."

So far we have had symbols for failure of powers; now for actual death and dissolution. Or ever the silver cord be loosed, or the golden bowl be broken: a symbol from the house-lamp of gold, suspended by a silver cord, suddenly slipping its cord and breaking, its light becoming extinguished. For bowl in this sense compare Zechariah, chapter iv. 2, 3. — Or the pitcher be broken at the fountain, or the wheel broken at the cistern: these are exquisite symbols for the sudden and violent cessation of every-day functions. Compare the popular proverb: "The pitcher goes to the well once too often." — And the spirit return unto God who gave it: this by analogy with the previous line must be interpreted to mean no more than that the man becomes just what he was before he was born.

With this symbolic picture of Old Age may be paralleled an elaborate passage of Sackville, which it may be interesting to have side by side with the text.

> And next in order sad Old Age we found,
> His beard all hoar, his eyes hollow and blind;
> With drooping cheer still poring on the ground,
> As on the place where nature him assigned
> To rest, when that the sisters had untwined

His vital thread, and ended with their knife
The fleeting course of fast declining life.

There heard we him with broken and hollow plaint
Rew with himself his end approaching fast;
And all for nought his wretched mind torment
With sweet remembrance of his pleasures past,
And fresh delights of lusty youth forwaste.
Recounting which, how would he sob and shriek,
And to be young again of Jove beseek.

But and the cruel fates so fixed be
That time forpast cannot return again,
This one request of Jove yet prayed he;
That in such withered plight and wretched pain
As eld (accompanied with his loathly train)
Had brought on him, all were it woe and grief,
He might awhile yet linger forth his life,

And not so soon descend into the pit,
Where death, when he the mortal corpse hath slain,
With retchless hands in grave doth cover it,
Thereafter never to enjoy again
The gladsome light, but in the ground ylain,
In depth of darkness waste and wear to nought,
As he had never into the world been brought.

But who had seen him, sobbing how he stood Unto himself, and how he would bemoan
His youth forpast, as though it wrought him good
To talk of youth, all were his youth foregone:
He would have mused, and marvelled much, whereon
This wretched age should life desire so fain,
And knows full well life doth but length his pain.

Crookback'd he was, tooth shaken, and blear-eyed;
Went on three feet, and sometimes crept on four;
With old lame bones that rattled by his side,
His scalp all pill'd, and he with eld forlore;
His wither'd fist still knocking at death's door;
Tumbling and drivelling as he draws his breath:
*For brief, the shape and messenger of death.

utterance. The final words, "a mouth that lieth destroyeth a soul," are the link with Discourse II.

Discourse II

Immortality and the Covenant with Death

Death no part of the Divine creation, for righteousness is immortal — it has come invited into the world by the words and life of the wicked.

1. By their Words. — Monologue of the Ungodly: despair of aught beyond this life converting into luxury and antagonism to the righteous.

2. By their Life: wickedness blinds them to the wages of holiness — and being thus of the 'portion' of the devil (whose envy was the means of death's entering into the world) they make trial of death.

The seeming death of the righteous is only a trial of them — in the time of their visitation there awaits them splendour, a position in the divine hierarchy, and Divine grace and mercy.

Digression. — The Hopes of the Ungodly [substitutes for immortality]. — (1) Life in posterity. But the brood of the ungodly is unstable and accursed: better is childlessness with virtue.

(2) Long life. But their old age is without honour; and a life cut short may be a life perfected.

The ungodly who ignore the grace and mercy vouchsafed to the chosen shall be suddenly overthrown — dishonoured carcases among the dead — in the day of reckoning amazed at the salvation of their former victims.

Monologue of the Ungodly: the derided righteous among the saints — their own great things passed away without a trace left.

The author breaks in: Vanity of the ungodly hopes — immortality of the righteous — the whole creation uniting to overwhelm the foes of God.

The personality of King Solomon is gradually assumed in a final appeal to kings, as those on whom will fall a sterner judgment because of their greater position: this makes the transition to the next discourse.

Discourse III

in the form of a Dramatic Monologue

Solomon's Winning of Wisdom

Wisdom meeteth every purpose of her seekers — from first desire of discipline to a final kingship by the side of God. Kings therefore are addressed.

The author (identifying himself with wise King Solomon) will speak of Wisdom to his brother kings — without grudging, for Wisdom desires the multiplication of the wise.

He began like all other kings, and had to pray for Wisdom — he preferred her to all other good things.

Digression. — But in reality all other good things came with her — God gave him knowledge of all human and external nature in giving him Wisdom.

For Wisdom is all-pervasive [moral and intellectual Wisdom are one] — an effulgence from everlasting light and an image of Divine goodness.

Her then he sought as a bride: for she would bring riches, understanding, experience, glory abroad and rest at home.

The mode of obtaining this Wisdom he thought to be prayer — this thought was the result of a pure nature and understanding.

Solomon's Prayer for Wisdom. — Closing with the impossibility of knowing God's will without Wisdom, it reaches the thought that, when in the past men did right, it was through Wisdom that they were saved: which is the topic of the next discourse.

Discourse IV

The World saved through Wisdom

[The history included in this discourse presents Wisdom sometimes as subjective, the character of an individual — and sometimes as objective, Divine Providence ruling events.]

Wisdom protected Adam in his loneliness;

and appeared in his self-conquest, and rise to the dominion over all things. Cain in his anger fell away from Wisdom;

Wisdom preserved the righteous from the Flood.

Wisdom called righteous Abraham;

and Wisdom kept him blameless under sharpest trial.

Wisdom found out a deliverance for righteous Lot:

Lot's wife, passing Wisdom by, perished.

Wisdom guided Jacob in his varied career.

Wisdom raised Joseph from a dungeon to a sceptre.

Wisdom delivered a holy people from their oppressors:

entering into the soul of Moses, so that he withstood kings:

guiding and protecting the people in their marvellous passage.

In the desert Wisdom marvellously supplied their wants.

[The supplying of water for the thirsty Israelites suggests the thought that becomes the text for the next discourse.]

Discourse V

Judgement on the Wicked turning to Blessings for God's People

1. Thirst. — Water turned into undrinkable blood for the Egyptians — water brought out of the solid rock for the Israelites.
2. Appetite. — For the Egyptians a plague of loathly vermin.

A. Digression. — Vermin on vermin-worshippers: men punished by that in which they sin.

AA. Digression. — Such measured punishment (admonishing to repentance) is the mercy of Omnipotence — just as again the wicked inhabitants of the holy land perished by little and little through the hornets that were forerunners of the coming people — by such sovereignty over his strength God teaches his people love of men, and hope under chastisement.

A. Digression Resumed. This mocking punishment of vermin on vermin-worshippers meet for those so far gone in the folly of idolatry as to worship what their very enemies dishonoured.

B. Digression. — For all idolatry is folly, but there are degrees in its folly. — Least blamable are those who worship the works of God in Nature — next, those who make gods out of the works of men's hands, silver, gold, painted wood: corrupting what God has created.

C. Digression. — For idolatry is a corruption, and not a thing from the beginning nor destined to last. — Origin of Idolatry in the vainglorious-ness of man: images for remembrance, gradually coming to be worshipped — the ambition of the artist assisting — a hidden danger that culminated in imaging the incommunicable Name — all moral dissolution follows, especially perjury.

B. Digression Resumed. The worshippers of our God are saved from the folly of idolatry — like that of the potter, treating life as a fair for selling images made out of the clay into which he must soon return.

A. Digression Resumed. But the last degree of folly is that of the Egyptian oppressors: adding to all other idolatry the worship of things hateful.

2. Resumed. So the Egyptians suffered from loathly vermin: while for God's people dainty quails were sent to satisfy appetite.

3. Noxious Bites. — Locusts and flies plagued the enemy without healing — the Israelites the serpent bites but admonished, and then salvation was found.

4. Rain of fire and hail destroying the food of Egypt — rain of manna feeding the people of God — the same fire raging or slackening its power to work the Creator's will.

5. Darkness imprisoned the oppressors.

To guide the Israelites night was illuminated by the pillar of burning fire.

6. The Night of Deliverance and Song — a night of destruction to the firstborn of Egypt.

7. Death came as a trial to the righteous, but a champion was soon found.

To the ungodly in their final folly came a strange death without mercy.

Summary. — Thus, reviewing the whole deliverance, we see the elements of nature interchange like the notes of a psaltery to magnify God's people.

Notes to the Wisdom of Solomon

For the book as a whole, see Introduction, page 1476. The General Note on Footnotes (page 1532) has also special relevancy for this work.

Title

The early title is The Wisdom of Solomon; and in uncritical ages it was supposed to be his composition. St. Jerome and the Vulgate, throwing over this tradition, entitle it The Book of Wisdom. It is also often cited (in ancient and modern literature) simply as Wisdom.

Discourse I

For the argument see the Syllabus.

The language of Wisdom, especially in the full rendering of the Revised Version, is transparently clear; the difficulties of the book lie in the argument, and especially in the order of the thought. Thus, in regard to this first discourse, while the sentences are clear, the difficulty is to see any point in the whole, apart from the question of the relation between this work and Ecclesiastes. The denunciation of crooked thoughts and blaspheming or murmuring words seems to have little relevance to judges of the earth.

One explanation might be this: the first part of this discourse deals with improper thoughts, the rest with improper words, the opening words of the following discourse speak of 'life' and 'works': thus thoughts, words, and actions of evil are mentioned before the death they bring is contrasted with immortality and righteousness. But (1) there is no symmetry in the whole argument such as this explanation would suggest. (2) It runs counter to the division into discourses. This division is very marked. (a) The 'texts' of the first three discourses are the only independent sentences in the whole work; all others being bound into grammatical sequences. If the texts of the last two have particles connecting them with what precedes, yet these sentences are so unmistakable as new departures that their connection with the preceding context simply illustrates the characteristic of form next to be mentioned. — (b) This is that the final thought of each discourse directly leads to the commencement of the next. This is brought out in the Syllabus.

On the other hand, the matter of this discourse receives point at once, if we understand a veiled attack on Ecclesiastes and the fancied experiment of Solomon.

Love righteousness.
In singleness of heart seek ye him.
He is found of them that tempt him not.
Crooked thoughts separate from God.
Wisdom will not enter into a soul that deviseth evil, nor dwell in a body that is held in pledge by sin.

All these have direct relevance to the supposed experimenter's idea of "laying hold on folly" while his "wisdom remained with him."

It may be worth noting that Milton's interpretation of the temptation in Eden has the same underlying idea of experimenting in evil as the supreme sin.

Knowledge of good, bought dear by knowing ill. (iv. 222.)

Let him boast
His knowledge of good lost, and evil got,
Happier had it sufficed him to have known
Good by itself, and evil not at all. (xi. 87.)

What fear I then, rather, what know to fear,
Under this ignorance of good and evil . . .
Here grows the cure of all, the fruit divine,
Fair to the eye, inviting to the taste,
Of virtue to make wise. (ix. 773.)

So with regard to the latter part: the idea of wisdom as a spirit that loveth man, the denunciation of murmuring, blaspheming lips, backbiting, may well be called forth by the pessimism of Ecclesiastes; his passionate reduction, in the name of wisdom, of human to the level of brute life seems a 'blasphemy' on the "wisdom that loveth man"; and his reiteration of 'vanity' in regard to every department of human life is a 'murmuring' and 'backbiting.' Ecclesiastes keeps saying that "all things are vanity": the present writer insists that "that which holds the all things together" must hear such slander of his wisdom.

Discourse II

For the argument of the whole see the Syllabus.

i. 13. God made not death . . . righteousness is immortal: compare below (ii. 23) "God created man for incorruption, and made him an image of his own proper being." — Ungodly men called death unto them: there is no allusion at this point to the Fall as related in Genesis (which is introduced later on); the reference is to the ungodly of the monologue that immediately succeeds. — Deeming him a friend . . . and they made a covenant with him. It is tempting to compare Isaiah (chapter xxviii), particularly as the present writer has many echoes of Isaiah. But the 'covenant with death' in that writer is a totally different idea.

Because ye have said, We have made a covenant with death, and with hell are we at agreement; when the overflowing scourge shall pass through it shall not come unto us: . . . And your covenant with death shall be disannulled, and your agreement with hell shall not stand; when the overflowing scourge shall pass through, then ye shall be trodden down by it.

In this passage the covenant with death is that he shall pass them by and take others. But in Wisdom the ungodly, instead of holding death as something hostile, accept him for a friend, that is, fall in with the fact that they must die, and make this the basis for a life of revelry.

ii. 1–20. Monologue of the Ungodly. The important point is the relationship of this with Ecclesiastes.

None . . . gave release from Hades	Neither hath he power over the day of death . . . there is no discharge in that war
The breath in our nostrils is smoke . . . the spirit shall be dispersed as thin air . . . scattered as is a mist, etc.	The life of thy 'vanity' [metaphor of 'vapour' in repeated forms of expression]
The body shall be turned into ashes	The dust return to the earth as it was
Our name shall be forgotten in time, and no man shall remember our works	The memory of [the dead] is forgotten; as well their love, as their hatred and their envy, is now perished

The general spirit of this first portion of the monologue is even more suggestive of Ecclesiastes than the parallel phrases. The monologue proceeds: Come therefore and let us enjoy the good things that now are; and let us use the creation with all our soul as youth's possession. This is close to the opening of Essay V in Ecclesiastes; and the further expansion of it suggests the Preacher's " Eat and drink," etc. So This is our portion echoes the Preacher's reiteration of This is his portion. The third part of the monologue passes on to the oppression of the righteous poor. This of course is entirely opposed to the spirit of Ecclesiastes. But it is noticeable that, in that book, it was the picture of oppression (Essay II) which suggested the thought of a judgment to come, though the thought was rejected. The present writer makes the rejection of such future judgment lead directly to the oppression. The general view of the whole then is that the monologue is based, not on the views of Ecclesiastes, but on the easy perversion of them which (the author thinks) may be made by the ungodly.

iii. 1–9. The true view of the Death of the Righteous. The conception includes these ideas:

The death is only apparent [seemed to have died].

It is a chastening, a making trial of them (compare the idea of the prologue to Job).

It is a sacrifice they offer to God [as a whole burnt offering he accepted them. Thus the death of the godly is brought into line with the whole institution of sacrificial ritual. Compare St. Paul's ' living sacrifice ' in Romans xii. 1].

There is a time of visitation for the righteous, quite distinct from the day of reckoning [iv. 20: They shall come when their sins are reckoned up] for the wicked: when they attain their true position in some heavenly hierarchy [They shall judge nations (so Ecclesiasticus iv. 15: " He that giveth ear unto her shall judge the nations ") and have dominion over peoples: the allusion may be to such " sons of God " as appear in the prologue to Job, or in Psalm lxxxii].

iii. 9. Because grace and mercy are to his chosen: these words should be noted as the exact point of junction with the digressions that follow: the words are caught up again as the argument is resumed (iv. 15).

iii. 10–iv. 14. This is a Digression (see the Syllabus) on the Hopes of the Ungodly, their substitutes for the Hope of Immortality. Their hopes are two: (1) Life in posterity, (2) Long life in this world; but the whole is best considered together, as the ideas attaching to the two are entangled.

1. The brood of the ungodly is accursed:

Their wives foolish: hence the begetting accursed.

Children of sin reach no maturity [bastard slips, etc.] — share the short-livedness of the wicked generally — and their hopelessness in death.

Thus the children witnesses to wickedness of the parents [compare Ecclesiasticus xi. 28; and on the general subject xli. 5].

Better than this is childlessness with virtue.

For the celibate and chaste a peculiar favour — and a lot in the sanctuary of the Lord. [Compare Isaiah, chapter lvi. 1–8; and (?) Psalm lxxiii. 17, where a similar phrase is used in connection with the kindred problem of prosperous wickedness.]

[If there be children]: the root of understanding cannot fail.

Childlessness and virtue: universal recognition of virtue and immortal memory.

2. The ungodly setting their hopes in long life.
They shall be requited even as they reasoned [taken at their word: "Our life is short," etc.].
Toils, hope, works, unprofitable.
Whereas the life cut short may be the life perfected.
Good labours have fruit of great renown.
In the memory of virtue is immortality.
Honourable old age — not in years alone — but in the unspotted life.
Perfection quickly reached — snatched away for fear of spoiling.
When dead, the good are none the less a condemnation of the ungodly living. [Second footnote to page 1023.]

Page 1023: footnote. These sentences are not necessary to the general drift of the paragraph; but are a special enlargement of the idea "accursed begetting."

Page 1023: second footnote. The only possible way of finding a place for these sentences is to understand them as a footnote exegetical of the idea in the word 'visiteth': even though dead the righteous man convicts the wicked of not understanding a visitation of God.

v. 3–23. The Overthrow of the Ungodly: partly a monologue (in quotation marks), partly the words of the author. The end of the wicked:

Sudden and hopeless overthrow [in this life].
Dishonour among the dead, and anguish.
Their memory on earth shall perish.
[A day] when their sins are reckoned up [different from the 'time of visitation' of the righteous in iii. 7]: they miserably recognise the triumph of their despised victims, and blindness of their own hopes.

v. 17–23. He shall take his jealousy as complete armour, etc. This brilliant description appears not to relate to the overthrow of the ungodly who have been presented as rising from the dead and mourning their folly. Those overthrown in this passage are represented by the general term his enemies: and the final words, So shall lawlessness make all the land desolate, and their evil doing shall overturn the thrones of princes, connect the destruction with those who are yet living on earth to be affected by it. It thus appears to be a general destruction directed against what might be called the empire of evil on earth. The necessity (according to the scheme of the book) of making the close of this discourse join on to the next has led the writer to leave the subject of the 'ungodly,' treated so far, and pass suddenly to that which affects 'princes,' such as in the next discourse King Solomon will directly address.

Thus the idea of JUDGMENT, which in Wisdom literature generally is a principle undetermined by time or place, in the present writer covers four distinct incidents: (1) The overthrow [in death] of the individual sinner; (2) His 'day of reckoning' beyond the grave [the future beyond that day left blank]; (3) The 'time of visitation' for the righteous, when their seeming death is changed for a glorious position in a Divine hierarchy; (4) A supernatural overthrow of the powers of evil on earth. The 'day of the Lord' in prophetic literature sometimes combines (1) an immediate vindication of the chosen people, the evil amongst them being sifted out; and (2) a final overthrow of 'the nations,' with the chosen people left supreme. The prophecy of Joel is a clear type.

The details of this description seem like an enlargement from the similar interposition for judgment in Isaiah, chapter lix. 17–20.

Discourse III

For the general argument see the Syllabus.

vi. 13. She forestalleth them, etc.: for the general spirit of this passage compare in Ecclesiasticus Essays commencing iv. 11; vi. 18; xiv. 20. — So then desire of Wisdom promoteth to a kingdom: this, taken with the words immediately preceding, bringeth near to God, seems to make kingdom refer to the position in the Divine hierarchy mentioned in the preceding discourse.

vi. 22. I will not hide mysteries from you . . envy shall have no fellowship with wisdom, but a multitude of wise men is salvation to the world: this (especially in a book written in Greek) must be a stroke directed at the 'Mysteries,' or confinement of doctrine to the Initiated, which was a feature of early Greek thought. Compare the use of the word throughout the New Testament (especially Ephesians, chapter iii. 9). There is no corresponding word in the Old Testament.

vii. 11–viii. 1. These two paragraphs constitute a digression (see the Syllabus), after which the idea of seeking 'her' as a bride is resumed. — With her there came to me all good things . . . she was the mother of them: compare Proverbs iii. 1–20; and especially sections v and vi of the poem on page 913. — To know the constitution of the world, etc.: for the whole of this passage compare Introduction, page 1478. The successive clauses are intended as a summary of the various branches of what we should call 'Natural History' [thoughts of men would mean anthropological rather than ethical science]. A foundation for the attribution of this to Solomon would be I Kings, chapter iv. 33. But the probable significance of this is, not natural science, but wise sayings founded on things of the animal or vegetable world: fables, apologues, riddles (compare such sayings of Agur as Proverbs xxx. 15, 18, 24, 29). There is no tradition, or trace in Wisdom literature, of the application of analysis to external nature for its own sake before the present passage. (Introduction, page 1478.) — All things that are either secret or manifest: possibly there is another reference here to the 'mysteries,' or knowledge of the initiated; but the phrase may be general, as in Ecclesiasticus iii. 22: "The things that have been commanded thee, think thereupon; for thou hast no need of the things that are secret." It is natural to compare Deuteronomy, chapter xxix. 29: but there the reference is probably confined to secret sin and visible judgment. — For in her there is a spirit quick of understanding. This celebration of Wisdom is the counterpart in the present book of the monologues of Wisdom in Proverbs (vii–viii) and Ecclesiasticus (Preface to Book II), and of the well-known passage in Job, chapter xxviii. Its position in the argument is to identify objective wisdom [mirror of the working of God] with subjective wisdom [image of his goodness]. Compare Introduction, page 1478.

viii. 2–ix. These paragraphs resume the general purpose of the discourse: to found on the historic Prayer of Gibeon (I Kings, chapter iii) an incident of Solomon's gaining of wisdom by prayer and the gift of God, to counterpoise the imaginary incident of Solomon's search for wisdom in Essay I of Ecclesiastes. — A good soul fell to my lot; nay rather, being good, I came into a body undefiled. This much-disputed passage is important in theology rather than in literary interest, on account of its bearing upon the question of the pre-existent soul. It may be remarked, however, that in any case it betrays rather than conveys a view on that subject: in the general argument of the passage its only force is that, good as he knew himself to be, he yet felt that he could obtain true wisdom only by prayer.

Discourse IV

For the argument, and relation to the other discourses, see the Syllabus. Compare Introduction, page 1479. — She shewed him God's kingdom: a reference to Jacob's Vision of God and the Angels, and his exclamation, "This is the gate of heaven" (Genesis, chapter xxviii). — From those that lay in wait she kept him safe: an allusion to the appeasing of the wrath of Esau. — Over his sore conflict: the mysterious 'wrestling' of Jacob (Genesis, chapter xxxii).

Discourse V

For the argument, and the Chain of Digressions, see the Syllabus, and compare Introduction, pages 1479–80.

xi. 7. To rebuke the decree for the slaying of babes: here (as in Instance II) the idea of 'nemesis' is added to the main argument: the bloody river was fit retribution on the shedders of innocent blood. — Having shewn them by the thirst which they had suffered how thou didst punish the adversaries. This is a corollary to the main argument. The main thought is, what punished the foe became blessings to God's people; the corollary is, that God's people experienced the punishment in question just enough to appreciate the punishing of the foe, and no more. — Yea, and whether they were far off from the righteous or near them, etc. The thought of this obscure passage is: The Egyptians suffered, when the Israelites were with them [the plague of water changed to blood], and when they were far away [by the news of the rock yielding water to quench thirst]; in the latter case a double grief took hold of them, [the deliverance of their foe] and the mortifying memory of their own unrelieved thirst: when they realised that water, in which they had suffered punishment, had been made a miraculous blessing to the enemy, they felt the presence of the Lord. Even in the first case they left off mocking Moses; but in this final manifestation they could only marvel, and think how very different their own thirst had been.

xi. 16. That they might learn, etc. I have thought it best to represent here the abrupt commencement of a paragraph in the middle of a sentence: a solecism of style just fitting in with the unique use of digressions in this book. (See the Syllabus.) The sentences preceding this break of the paragraph are not carried sufficiently far to make the argument appear. The argument is resumed, after the Chain of Digressions, at xvi. 1 on page 1032. Before the break the author has only mentioned irrational vermin sent upon the Egyptians; after the digression he contrasts this torment with the dainty food sent to satisfy the appetite of the Israelites; only when the two are put together is the argument apparent, that appetite is the point which was made a punishment to the one and a joy to the other.

This paragraph commences digression A of the Syllabus; from which B is a further digression, and C is a digression from B; then B digression is resumed, then A is resumed, and finally the argument (Instance II of the principle of the text) is recovered. But in this digression A, which is on the topic that men are punished in that wherein they have sinned, there is a digression (AA) that such measured punishment is the mercy of Omnipotence; after which digression A is resumed and concluded. All this subordination is represented to the eye in the Syllabus; and in these notes the commencement of each section is indicated.

xi. 21. For to be greatly strong is thine: these words commence Digression AA. (See Syllabus.) For the sentiment compare Ecclesiasticus xviii. 8–14.

xii. 23. Wherefore also the unrighteous . . . thou didst torment through their own abominations: at this point is resumed Digression A: the vermin coming as nemesis upon vermin-worshipping Egyptians. — As unto unreasoning children, etc.: this is a thought added to the main thought of the digression: the vermin plague on vermin-worshippers was a childlike correction, but when this was slighted there came real destruction on the Egyptians.

xiii. 1. For verily all men by nature were but vain who had no perception of God: here commences Digression B. (See the Syllabus.) It is occupied with the degrees in the folly of idolatry. — Let them know how much better than these is their Sovereign Lord: the whole passage is founded on the widely diffused tradition of Abraham, which is thus given in the Qur'an vi. 75.

> Thus did we show Abraham the kingdom of heaven and of the earth, that he should be of those who are sure. And when the night overshadowed him he saw a star and said, "This is my Lord"; but when it set he said, "I love not those that set." And when he saw the moon beginning to rise he said, "This is my Lord"; but when it set he said, "If God my Lord guides me not I shall surely be of the people who err." And when he saw the sun beginning to rise he said, "This is my Lord, this is greatest of all"; but when it set he said, "O my people! verily, I am clear of what ye associate with God; verily, I have turned my face to him who originated the heaven and the earth."

xiii. 11. Yea, and if some woodcutter, etc. Though such idolatry is a common topic of Hebrew literature, yet this passage seems inspired by Isaiah, chapter xliv. 12–20: besides the emphasis on using the residue to make the god, there is the noticeable phrase (xv. 10): his heart is ashes (Isaiah's: "he feedeth on ashes, a deceived heart hath turned him aside").

Page 1031: footnote. This is clearly a digression of the nature of a modern footnote, on the words more rotten than the vessel that carrieth him. Two points are conceived as differentiating the wood of the ship from the wood of the idol: (1) the design implied in a ship is an element of wisdom; (2) the ship in its navigation is a subject of providential guidance. From this last the thought widens to the providential guidance of a helpless raft, and of the ark.

xiv. 7. For blessed hath been wood through which cometh righteousness. The word righteousness may here be used in the sense of setting right, vindication, salvation (compare Isaiah, chapter li. 5, lvi. 1), in allusion to the "raging waves": but it is not so used elsewhere in this book, unless perhaps in the close of Essay II (v. 18): "he shall put on righteousness as a breastplate." Or it may simply imply right doing; wood used for the righteous purpose of carrying travellers in safety.

xiv. 12. For the devising of idols was the beginning of fornication: here begins Digression C, on the Origin of Idolatry. (See the Syllabus.) Fornication or adultery is a regular image in the O.T. for departure from God.

xv. 1. But thou, our God, art gracious and true: at these words we resume Digression B, on the Folly of Idolatry. (See the Syllabus.)

xv. 14. But most foolish were they all: here we pass back to Digression A: the main point in which is the monstrous idea of vermin-worship — and almost immediately the main argument is recovered, at the words For which cause were these men worthily punished. The contrast of dainty quails with loathly vermin makes Instance II of the text of Discourse V.

Page 1032: footnote. This is clearly a parenthesis of the nature of a footnote to the idea: "a man made them."

xvi. 5. For even when terrible raging of wild beasts: Instance III of the text. (See the Syllabus.)

xvi. 15: But thy hand it is not possible to escape: and page 1033: footnote. The difficulties of this passage (which I would call subtle rather than obscure) are considerably reduced by the recognition of certain sentences as a footnote. Read without the footnote the paragraph is regular in its order of thought. First: the writer contrasts the destruction by fire fierce enough to burn amid water with the bounty of food wrought by fire [tempered] into every variety of taste. This last rests upon the tradition that the manna was cooked food. Then he repeats the contrast: the unmelting snow and hail were evidence that the fire was a destructive force sent against God's enemies; on the other side, fire slackened to act according to the desire of each eater. The footnote adds a distinct marvel; this fire so fiercely destructive must have restrained itself so as not to destroy the lice and similar creatures still plaguing the Egyptians. Compare the same circumstance noted in the peroration (xix. 21). — For that which was not marred by fire: this is a further contrast brought out of the account of the manna: while the tempering fire harmed not [but improved] the miraculous food, yet a faint sunbeam destroyed it (Exodus, chapter xvi. 21): a miracle designed to teach early rising to offer praise.

xvii. 1. For great are thy judgements: here begins a fifth Instance: the Plague of Darkness contrasted with the Miraculous Light of the Israelites. There is a slight shifting of the point here: a contrasted curse and blessing rather than the same thing acting as curse and blessing. But the spirit of the text is illustrated. The whole is a magnificent filling in, by 'analytic imagination,' of details into the phrase of Exodus: "darkness that might be felt." — All sleeping the same sleep now were haunted by monstrous apparitions. The writer's difficulty is: the darkness being absolute, how can he enrich his picture with visible terrors? He evades this by the thought that sleep belongs to darkness, and yet sees terrors in dreams. The same idea is utilised below (xviii. 17) for the deaths of the firstborn.

Page 1034: first footnote. This reflection (breaking a sustained passage of imaginative picturing) is best treated as a footnote commenting on the terror painted in the sentence to which it is attached. The final words of the note are difficult, but seem to mean this: the brave man has the rational plan of escape to divert his mind from the terror; whereas the coward, having less expectation [of escape] gives his whole attention to the unknown terror.

Page 1034: second footnote. It seems to me that these words are an elaborate parenthesis. The contrast to the Plague of Darkness clearly begins with the words Whereas thou didst provide for thy people a burning pillar of fire; the whereas cannot connect with anything but the preceding paragraph. The words I have relegated to a footnote are exegetical of yet heavier than darkness were they unto themselves; they express the uncomfortable thoughts suggested to the Egyptians as they heard through the darkness the sound of Israelite voices.

xviii. 4. For well did the Egyptians deserve: once more the idea of nemesis is added to the main argument.

xviii. 5. After they had taken counsel: here commences Instance VI: the same night brought deliverance to the Israelites and death to the firstborn of the Egyptians. Again the thought of nemesis is added to the main argument: the slaying of the firstborn fitly punished the Egyptians for slaying the males of the Israelites.

xviii. 20. But it befell the righteous also to make trial of death. Here begins the final Instance of the text: Death as a form of mercy to the Israelites in the incident of Phinehas: Death as utter destruction to the Egyptians in the Red Sea.

xix. 6. For the whole creation, each part in its several kind, was fashioned again anew: here commences the peroration, or summary. (See the Syllabus.) It draws into one view the past [they still remembered the things that came to pass in the time of their sojourning: and plagues of Egypt are enumerated], and the present [then was beheld the cloud . . . and dry land rising up out of what before was water, etc.], and the future [but afterwards they saw also a new race of birds]: in order to make a basis for the climax that the elements of nature interchanged like the notes of a psaltery.

Page 1036: footnote. This lengthy passage is clearly an elaborate parenthesis or note exegetical of the word tokens. The Egyptians did not perish so suddenly but that the thunders reminded them that it was for their sins that they were going to be destroyed. The footnote enlarges upon these sins, making an elaborate parallel between the inhospitality of the men of Sodom (punished by an overwhelming of fire) and the greater inhospitality of the Egyptians towards the Israelites. The parallel is carried to the degree of making the plague of darkness a counterpart of the sudden blinding of the men of Sodom by the angels (Genesis, chapter xix. 11).

The Rearrangement of speeches in the Third Round

It will be seen that in the third round of speeches I have varied from the division between the three speakers as it appears in A.V. and R.V. No alteration from the language of the R.V. is made: but verses 2–4 of chapter xxvi are transferred to the commencement of chapter xxvii, and a corresponding change is supposed in the headings of speeches.

Then answered Eliphaz the Temanite, and said — Chapter xxii.
Then Job answered and said —
Chapters xxiii, xxiv.
Then answered Bildad the Shuhite, and said —
Chapter xxv, continued in xxvi. 5–14.
Then Job answered and said —
Chapter xxvi. 2–4, continued in xxvii. 2–6.
Then answered Zophar the Naamathite, and said —
From chapter xxvii. 7 to end of chapter xxviii.
Then Job answered and said —
Chapters xxix, xxx, xxxi.

In the present edition these headings are replaced by the speakers' names, as is usual in dramatic works.

The reasons on which this arrangement is based are as follows.

1. The utmost caution should be used in accepting conjectural emendation affecting the sense of individual sentences; but the principle does not apply to changes in points of form, such as the arrangement of speeches, especially as the sacred books have passed through centuries in which the principles of parallelism were lost.

2. All critics recognise the difficulty of the text as it stands between chapters xxvi and xxviii (inclusive), which has the effect of making Job take up a position antagonistic to his former contention and to his subsequent words; and some commentators resort to violent explanations, such as prolonged irony, etc.

3. The most marked feature of literary style in the book is its extreme parallelism; this makes it most improbable that the third colloquy should be imperfect, by the omission of a speech from Zophar, and a reply to him from Job. Moreover, the change in the introductory formulas when chapters xxvii and xxix are reached — viz.: And Job again took up his parable and said instead of the usual Job answered and said — is very suspicious.

4. The conjecture here adopted is substantially that of Grätz, which is to a large extent the same as Cheyne's. Some eminent critics (e.g. Davidson, Driver) are deterred from seeking a third speech for Zophar by the shortness of Bildad's third speech (chapter xxv), which they take as an indication that the controversy is becoming exhausted. But the present conjecture lengthens Bildad's speech and removes this objection.

5. This rearrangement satisfies the important canon that emendations should explain how the distortions arose: otherwise, optima lectio pessima. Zophar (in the present arrangement) says (chapter xxvii. 11):

I will teach you concerning the hand of God;
That which is with the Almighty will I not conceal.

Then, turning to his companions, to include them in his protest against Job, he continues:

Behold, all ye yourselves have seen it;
Why then are ye become altogether vain?

(The all is explained by the presence of an audience; Elihu, for example, being one. The second line means: why are ye treated as of no consequence?) This is a perfectly natural remark. But in a traditional age, which thought more of sentences than the poetic scene, the plural all ye led the reciter or copyist to connect the speech with Job addressing the Friends. So the mistake crept in.

The Question of Interruptions

In addition to the change in the division of speeches discussed in the last note, the question arises whether certain passages in what appear as speeches of Job in the received text are not to be understood as interruptions by the other speakers. Five passages are affected by this question: the commencement of section xiii, the first half of section xxix, and three short passages in section xxiii. In all these cases the words must be understood either as actually spoken by the other speakers, or as imaginary objections of theirs cited by Job for the purpose of answering them.

The absence of any break in the received text has little weight: the considerations adduced in the last note show that the headings of speeches have not the same authority as the speeches themselves. The evidences on this question seem to me uncertain; on the whole, I have been led to different conclusions in respect to the different passages.

The clearest case seems to be section xxiii: and I have here assigned the three passages to the three Friends respectively. (1) The fact that there are three is significant: the sense of symmetry running through the whole poem is so distinct that it is easier to understand a triple interruption than the intervention of a single objector. (2) It comes as a confirmation that the three passages fit in with the individual speakers in the order in which they always speak. The words falling in this arrangement to Eliphaz are:

Lo, their prosperity is not in their hand:
The counsel of the wicked is far from me.

Now the first of these lines is an echo of the picture painted by Eliphaz in his speech of this cycle (chapter xv. 20), and the second line occurs in his next speech (chapter xxii. 18). Bildad's interruption is:

God layeth up his iniquity for his children.

It will be remembered that Bildad is the only one to allude (in his first speech, section vi) to the overthrow of Job's children; and though he suggests guilt on their part, yet he evidently treats this as part of the general judgment in which Job himself is involved. And Zophar's interruption —

Shall any teach God knowledge, etc., is in tune with the opening of his first speech (page 1050). Too much stress, however, must not be laid on this consideration, as the arguments of the three Friends all through have much in common. (3) A further confirmation comes a few lines further on:

Behold, I know your thoughts, etc.,

as if more interruptions were coming, and Job anticipates them. (4) It is another strong confirmation of this arrangement that these interruptions occur in just that part of the poem where they might most naturally be expected. Sections xxii, xxiii may be considered the turning-point of the debate: hitherto Job had only resisted the doctrine of judgment; here he proceeds, not without trembling at his own boldness, to suggest that the reverse of judgment appears as one of the regular ways of providence. Such a bold turn would naturally call out immediate protest.

The case is very different in section xxix. The whole rhythmic form of this is against the idea of interruption. Job recites a popular view of the end of the prosperous wicked in a figure of 8, 2, and puts his own reading of providence in a figure of 2, 8. Such antistrophic inversion is precisely in keeping with the matter, on the view that Job speaks the whole. In section xxiii, on the contrary, the rhythmic form is that of interruption; the objections making irregular breaks, and the answers advancing by augmentation (5, 5, 8, 11).

The most difficult case is the first four lines of section xiii. Here the rhythmic form is interruption, as in xxiii. The words would suit Zophar, who seems to admit interrupting at the commencement of his speech in section xxi. But it is a solitary break, and can perfectly well be read as a citing of objection by Job. The evidence here seems equally balanced, and I have left the arrangement to stand as in the received text.

A kindred question, but much more difficult, — indeed, to me the most perplexing question of form in the whole poem, — arises in the last section (l). Job's speech of submission is interrupted by the words:

Who is this that hideth counsel without knowledge?

and again, later, by the words:

I will demand of thee, and declare thou unto me.

Are we to understand these words to be spoken at the time by the Voice out of the Whirlwind: or are they echoes by Job of the Divine words spoken before? It seems to me that the considerations on both sides of the question are very evenly balanced.

It will be noted that these sentences are the opening words of the Divine Intervention, the first slightly, and the second considerably abridged; the second also commences the Divine speech following Job's former submission, and the word 'declare' has come as a challenge to Job more than once in the course of the speech out of the storm. If the first of these interrupting lines stood alone, it might be preferable to assign it to Job: it would fit easily with its context. The second, though possible, is yet difficult to understand in Job's mouth; coming after Job's

Hear, I beseech thee, and I will speak —

it makes a very abrupt break in the drift of the speech, without any special point to compensate for this. On the other hand, the dramatic gain is very great if the other view be taken. From Job's first words the tempest begins to retreat, in harmony with Job's submission; and such retreat of the storm can be powerfully indicated by the breaking out of the characteristic words, which each time sound more in the distance. It is as if two more Divine remonstrances were commencing with the opening formula of the other two.

but each is arrested by Job's words of submission. This need not seem too mechanical a mode of dealing with the Divine utterances, seeing that the crash of thunder is throughout suggested by the abrupt interrogatories which make the substance of the speech out of the storm. When again it is considered how very elaborately the approach of the whirlwind was indicated in the words of Elihu, it will seem not unreasonable to expect that some dramatic effect should be connected with its retreat: the broken echoes of the first crash make just the effect required, and it fits in with this suggestion that the lines in question are the former sentences abridged.

Brief Conspectus of the Argument

A dramatic debate may have all the force, but will certainly not have the logical order of a philosophic discussion; irruptions of personal feeling, and glancings at details of attack and defence, will sway the main argument out of its regular course. It will be well then for the reader, before he enters upon the detailed analysis of the poem, to fix in his mind the leading lines of thought, which, with whatever interruptions, are followed from the beginning to the end.

The starting-point is the position taken up by Job in his Curse: his misery, and claim for a speedy end. To this position Job is continually subsiding after outbursts of passionate argument. The Friends treat this as ignoring a visitation of God.

First Round of Speeches

The Friends	Job
The Doctrine: All calamity is judgment upon sin.	Opposition of facts to the Doctrine: impunity of the wicked exists.
Basis of the Doctrine: The infinite distance between God and man.	Helplessness of short-lived man to bring his cause before Omnipotence — momentary thought: a Vindication beyond death (dismissed).
Personal bearing of the Doctrine: Job a sinner, with a sinner's hope of restoration upon submission.	Wavering courage for Appeal to the inflicting God against the Friends' misinterpretation of the infliction.
Second Round
All three lines of argument maintained.	Job's opposition of facts against the Doctrine enhanced to a doubt whether impunity of the wicked is not a general thing. His helpless position enhanced, his cause is actually subverted — thought of a Vindication beyond death enhanced to a glorious certainty. Appeal to God from the Friends now passionately made, and the Friends treated with contempt.
Third Round
All three lines of argument advanced to a climax.	Job rises to corresponding climaxes.

The Doctrine [Zophar] made identical with all wisdom.

Basis of the Doctrine [Bildad:] distance between God and man in a climax of eloquence.

Personal bearing [Eliphaz]: suggestions of actual sins are made.

The visible impunity of the wicked formulated as one of the laws of providence.

The heavenly Vindicator not to be found: but the vindication will come.

The Oath of Clearing.

[The subsidence into misery which appears in Job at intervals throughout rises to a formal climax just before the Oath of Clearing in the contrast of what he was and what he is.]

Elihu

Elihu modifies the Doctrine of the Friends: Affliction is not so much a judgment, as a warning against judgment to come. Provoked by the silence, first of Job and then of the Friends, he advances to threats of coming judgment — the first appearance of the storm leads to the idea that the threatened judgment is now impending.

Divine Intervention

An outburst emphasising the infinite mystery of all nature, of good as well as of bad — when Job attempts a word of submission, a further outburst proclaims him unequal even to the mysteries of human government, how much more to the climax mysteries of nature — Job makes complete submission; and justifies him as against the Friends.

Epilogue

The Story Prologue

The dramatic poem of Job rests upon a basis or frame of narrated story, which appears at the beginning, the end, and briefly at the passage from the Debate to the Interposition of Elihu. Dramas regularly contain (or imply) a trace of story element in the 'stage directions,' which in modern literature there is a growing tendency to expand (compare Wagner, Ibsen). This story frame to Job is partly an enlargement of such stage directions.

[The Story Prologue is in prose. The only exceptions are: (1) The Messengers' Speeches exhibit a form intermediate between verse and prose, external without internal parallelism; the lines correspond not with others in the same speech, but with similar lines in other speeches. (2) Job's first words of submission make two recitative couplets; a form which suggests a pause between the two. The same form is taken by his first submission at the end of the poem (section xlvii); his later submission (l) enlarges from this by augmentation, with interruptions. The same form (interrupted) underlies the Curse (i).]

The greatest of all the children of the east. The name children of the east seems to be given in Scripture to the Arabian nomad peoples to the east of Palestine. Their present successors claim descent from Abraham. (Genesis, chapter xxix. 1; Jeremiah, chapter xlix. 28.) — It may be that my sons have . . . renounced God in their hearts. The word renounce is founded on the gesture of salutation, and (like the double meaning of the Greek chairete) may be used for welcoming or departure. The feeling underlying this expression may be illustrated by a later passage in the Oath of Clearing:

If I beheld the sun when it shined,
Or the moon walking in brightness;

And my heart hath been secretly enticed,
And my mouth hath kissed my hand:
This also were an iniquity to be punished by the judges:
For I should have lied to God that is above.

This (and a somewhat similar passage in Deuteronomy, chapter iv. 19) brings before us the conception of the worship of Jehovah as a sense of sanctity and restraint, in contradistinction to competing religions of revel and excitement; the gesture of an excited moment might violate plighted troth to Jehovah.

Now there was a day when the sons of God came to present themselves before the LORD. With this incident should be read Psalm lviii (margins of R. V.), and especially Psalm lxxxii (Cheyne's comment valuable). Other single passages may be compared, such as Psalms xxix. 1; lxxxix. 6, 7; xcvii. 7; Job, chapter v. 1, and Exodus, chapter xv. 11. Without going into difficult questions as to the phrase sons of God or of the gods, or the identification of these with seraphim of Isaiah, three main ideas may be kept distinct. (1) The sons of God are supernatural powers conceived to attend upon God as a council of officers upon a king. (2) They are conceived to be functionaries through whom God's government is carried on. (3) In Psalms lxxxii and lviii the sphere of government of these sons of God would seem to be the different peoples of the earth. They are in these poems regarded as neglecting their duties, and (in Psalm lxxxii) threatened with degradation from their rank of immortals. But in Job the suggestion is rather that the various parts of the universe, of which our earth is only one, are under their charge; and that 'Satan,' or 'the Adversary,' has the oversight of 'the earth.' In support of this view, compare the regular association of angels with stars (implied in such a phrase as 'the host of heaven,' and in such passages as Deuteronomy, chapter iv. 19; Isaiah, chapter xxxiv. 4; Psalm cxlviii. 3) with the picture later in this poem of the rejoicings over creation:

When the morning stars sang together,
And all the sons of God shouted for joy.

And the Adversary came also among them. The Adversary is the marginal alternative of R.V. for 'Satan' in the text. Either 'the Adversary' or 'the Satan' will convey the right impression. The essential points are: (1) The word is not a proper name, but a common noun, the name of an office. (2) This officer is represented as coming amongst the other sons of God, and there is nothing in his reception to suggest any difference between him and the rest. (3) His office is that of Inspector or Guardian of the earth: the words From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it, besides being in themselves just descriptive of such an officer, are close to the words ("walk to and fro through the earth," five times repeated) in the vision of Zechariah (chapters i. 7 to vi. 8), which undoubtedly are a formula expressing spirits of ministration of God on the earth. (4) When associations with the other use of the word 'Satan' are dismissed, it is easy to see that there is no malignity or sin in the Adversary's action in the present incident. To be suspicious is the function of an inspector; and he only does his duty in suggesting a possible flaw in the apparent integrity of Job. The Lord is not represented as showing any displeasure. The position of the Adversary is exactly that of the Advocatus Diaboli in the usages of the Roman Church, who has the function of making opposition to the canonisation of a saint, lest any flaw should be passed over. He is an 'adversary' only in the sense in which any inspector or examiner is opposed to those on whom he exercises his office. The same title of an officer of heaven, and the same functions, appear in other passages of Scripture: compare Zechariah, iii. 1; I Chron. xxi. 1, and I Kings, xxii. 19. Finally (5) it is intelligible how the name of an office should in time come to be applied as the name of an individual: the Adversary of God, and so champion of evil.

With regard to the whole incident, it may be remarked that the views presented above are assisted by the ritualistic character of the narrative. The exact repetition of questions and formularies in the description of the two days suggests that these are to be regarded as periodical gatherings, with formularies of ritual, as each son of God presents himself. It may be added, that the popular notions of 'Satan,' and his connection with the early stages of the world history presented in the Bible, are derived from Milton's working up of Scripture into Paradise Lost, rather than from the Bible itself. Bishop Bickersteth, in his Yesterday, To-day, and Forever, has reconstructed the biblical story of Milton, and harmonised the conception of Satan in Job with the conception in the N.T. It is unnecessary to point out that the prologue to Goethe's Faust is wholly founded on the ideas of this incident of Job.

Skin for skin, yea, all that a man hath will he give for his life. The general sense is clear enough; but the exact force of the proverb is difficult to catch. Cox quotes a Jewish proverb which is helpful: "One gives one's skin to save one's skin, and all to save one's life." — And he sat among the ashes. Davidson quotes from Wetzstein a passage which brings this clearly before our imagination.

> The dung which is heaped upon the Mezbele of the Hauran villages is not mixed with straw, which in that warm and dry land is not needed for litter, and it comes mostly from solid-hoofed animals, as the flocks and oxen are left over-night in the grazing places. It is carried in baskets in a dry state to this place before the village, and usually burnt once a month. . . . The ashes remain. . . . If the village has been inhabited for centuries the Mezbele reaches a height for overtopping it. The winter rains reduce it into a compact mass, and it becomes by and by a solid hill of earth. . . . The Mezbele serves the inhabitants for a watchtower, and in the sultry evenings for a place of concourse, because there is a current of air on the height. There all day long the children play about it: and there the outcast, who has been stricken with some loathsome malady, and is not allowed to enter the dwellings of men, lays himself down, begging an alms of the passers-by by day, and by night sheltering himself among the ashes which the heat of the sun has warmed. There, too, lie the village dogs, perhaps gnawing a fallen carcase, which is often flung there.

After this Job . . . cursed his day. The word curse is quite distinct from the renounce (God) of previous passages. It simply implies execration. There is not here any approach to the renunciation of God, which the Adversary suggested as probable, and which Job feared for his children, while his wife in a moment of distraction bade him do it. On the contrary, Job accepts his loss of all without resistance; only he insists now upon recognising that all is lost, and he claims permission to die. There is no suggestion of rebellion against God, until the Friends contend that his doom is deserved.

The Curse

i, ii

i. Job, in an outburst of sustained passion, execrates the time that brought him into existence.

> [The form of i is antistrophic couplets interrupted: an exact counterpart to Proverbs, vi. 12; see note on page 1526. The interruption is a tour-de-force of terms for darkening, applied, six of them to the day of his birth, nine to the night of his conception.]

Who are ready to rouse up leviathan. Davidson's explanation of this passage is lucid and interesting. It must be read with two other passages. One is in section xxx:

> By his spirit the heavens are garnished;
> His hand hath pierced the swift serpent.

The other is from Isaiah, chapter xxvii. 1:

> In that day the LORD with his sore and great and strong sword shall punish leviathan the swift serpent, and leviathan the winding serpent; and he shall slay the dragon that is in the sea.

The latter passage identifies the swift serpent with leviathan, or the dragon of the sea; the former passage identifies the piercing of this swift serpent with the act of clearing of garnishing the heavens. The idea is of the dragon or monster supposed to produce eclipses of the sun: those referred to in the Curse are magicians professing to rouse this dragon and so darken the sun. — It may be convenient to anticipate an expression used by Job (vii. 12).

Am I a sea or a sea-monster,
That thou settest a watch over me?

As the sea-monster in the one passage is a danger to the heavenly bodies, so is it here to the land. And the wording seems to identify the conception of sea-monster (winding, or swift, in the quotation from Isaiah) with the sea itself, twisting round the land, and at times invading and destroying.

ii. The feeling expressed in the first section is carried forward: If he was doomed to be born, why was the luxury of immediate death denied him? Why now is life forced upon the miserable?

[After a transitional quatrain the metre is antistrophic: each of the thoughts, death denied, life forced on him, has a strophe of the form 2, 4, 2, 6.]

The Debate

iii Eliphaz

Eliphaz opens the Doctrine of the Friends: that all calamity is a judgment on sin — but this is made a source of hope for Job through submission. — A climax passage makes a Basis for the Doctrine by a supernatural vision setting forth the infinite distance between God and man: there can be no human plea against a visitation of God. — The strain of hope yields another climax passage in the picture of Job's restoration.

[Stanza system, with duplication and climax passages. (It is unnecessary to mention recitative couplets, which may occur anywhere.) The doctrine (with its hope) appears in quatrains; the enlargement in stanzas of 2, 6 duplicating into 4, 12. The climax vision is antistrophic (2, 9); the other climax passage is a number sonnet (see page 1458) on the base 7, worked out in couplets.]

Is not thy fear of God thy confidence, etc. The tenderness and grace of Eliphaz must be noted. He has the delicate task of suggesting to this pattern of the world that he has been secretly a sinner. His first hint of this is conveyed under the form of a hope for Job: if this overwhelming disaster were a capricious accident, the sufferer would indeed be hopeless. But now his confidence in God's justice shows him penitence as a way of escape. — To which of the holy ones wilt thou turn: see above, page 1661. — Man is born unto trouble as the sparks fly upward: that is, the visitation of calamity is no accident, but is as much a law of nature (viz. its connection with sin) as that of the upward tendency of fire.

iv, v Job

iv. Job [in antistrophic interlacing: 7, 6; 7, 6], as if speaking to himself, justifies the position taken up in the Curse: his sufferings give him a right to complain and ask for a speedy end.

v. Speaking aloud, Job now expresses disappointment at the Friends who have given him rebuke instead of comfort — then, after a transitional passage challenging them to look him in the face and accuse him, Job turns to God, and justifies the position taken in the Curse: man's life is that of one hired for a period of service — after another transitional passage of misery, Job rises to a climax of bitter appeal against what he presents as God's persecution of the helpless — finally he subsides into a cry for pardon of whatever transgression he may have committed, in view of the near end.

[The transitional passages, as always, are of alternate parallelism. The rest is in stanzas with extreme duplication (1, 6; 2, 12; 3, 18). The protests against the

Friends and the first appeal to God make three stanzas of 2, 12; then the climax intensifies to 3, 18, and the final subsidence is in 1, 6.]

Am I a sea or a sea-monster: see above, page 1663.

vi Bildad

The doctrine of the Friends reasserted, with appeals to nature and tradition. Hope of restoration not omitted.

[Stanzas of 2, 4; with very curious examples of interruption. The first stanza, which is a conditional sentence (If thou wert pure and holy, etc.), has the interruption of conditional sentences more remote (If thy children, etc.). Similarly, the fourth stanza, which is to work out the previously suggested illustration of the rush, is interrupted (at the beginning) with a further illustration of the spider's web.]

vii–x Job

vii. Job [in antistrophic introversion: 4, 6; 6, 4 and 4, 3; 3, 4 bis] dwells on the hopelessness of submitting his cause to Overpowering Strength.

viii. The strain is continued [changing to antistrophic interlacing]: the further ground of hopelessness in his short life.

ix. Job appeals to God against a persecution which is a persecution of God's own workmanship, and of unrelenting severity against helplessness.

x. Finally Job subsides [in quatrain stanzas] to the position taken in the Curse: his right to beg a speedy end.

xi Zophar

Zophar enlarges upon the basis of the Friends' doctrine: the distance between God and man: the only hope is submission.

[Stanza system. Three stanzas (of 4, 2) describe Job resisting and Job repenting — then two (of 2, 12) dwell on the immeasurable greatness of God, and the hope of restoration.]

xii–xv Job

xii. Job commences with blunt opposition of facts to the Friends' doctrine: impunity of the wicked is to be seen, as well as their punishment.

[The figure is antistrophic inversion: 2, 3; 3, 2; 3, 2; 2, 3. This is a curious example, almost amounting to introverted introversion.]

Who knoweth not in all these that "the hand of the LORD hath wrought this?" Delitzsch makes the excellent suggestion that there is a proverb quoted here (comparing Isaiah, chapter xli. 20); this turns what seems a vague weakness (in the this) into a fine stroke of argument. This line must be connected with the previous line, Who knoweth not such things as these? They have offered Job commonplaces of Divine judgment; he retorts with commonplaces of impunity, bringing out their commonplaceness by the phrase of a current proverb.

xiii. Continuing, Job confronts the 'wisdom of the aged,' which has been cited to him, with another wisdom seen in the actions of Irresistible Strength (as it were, the logic of events).

[The form may be called Augmenting Interruption. An objection (as if in the objector's words) interrupts the speaker: his reply makes two rhetoric masses, augmenting from 2, 8 to 2, 20. Compare sections xxiii and l.]

xiv. The idea is gathering strength of an appeal to God against God's own visitation as interpreted by the Friends — Job sways between longing to make the appeal, and awe of the Power to be appealed to.

[Two pendulum figures. In the first the swaying is between the idea of appealing to God against God himself (left) and the Friends making false pleas out of subservience to God (right) — in the second the swaying is between the appeal to God (left) and awe of God (right).]

xv. The feeling of awe has prevailed, and Job sinks back to despair of short-lived man — this leads to a momentary glimpse of the idea of a vindication beyond the grave — which is instantly rejected, and the most miserable despair follows.

[Antistrophic interlacing and then inversion: 3, 2; 4, 2 3, 4; 4, 3 7, 4; 4, 7.]

Only for himself his flesh hath pain, and for himself his soul mourneth. This is one of the strongest passages depicting the semi-existence of the soul after death has transported it to Sheol or the Grave. Other passages may be read with this (Job, chapter iii. 13–19; x. 21, 22; xvii. 13–15) to support the idea of Sheol as a habitation of more or less conscious existence, with worms and corruption for companions. The flesh wastes away and the persons become 'Rephaim' or Shades (Job, chapter xxvi. 5, 6). Only an occasional burst of faith pictures a deliverance from Sheol (Job, chapter xix. 25–27).

xvi, xvii Eliphaz

xvi. Eliphaz exclaims against Job, as resisting alike the united wisdom of his friends, and the visitation of God.

[Stanza system: quatrains contain the resistance to the Friends; stanzas of 2, 4 the resistance to God.]

With us are both the grayheaded and the very aged men, much elder than thy father. It is tempting to understand these words as relating to some one present, though, of course, they need not have this meaning. Zophar seems to speak with the tone of extreme age; and it would be in accordance with this idea that to him is given the peroration (so to speak) of the Friends' case, as Eliphaz has its formal opening. But of course this whole idea rests on very slender foundation.

xvii. Doctrine of the Friends emphasised: Judgment is descending on the impious, while all appearances are to the contrary.

He hath covered his face with his fatness, and made collops of fat on his flanks. The same association of fat and sin is prominent in Psalm lxxiii.

xviii Job

After a transitional passage [alternate parallelism] of contempt for the Friends, Job gives himself to a sustained appeal to God: swaying [in pendulum figure] between the misery of his visitation [left] and his appeal to the visiting God rather than the misinterpreting Friends [right].

xix Bildad

After a passing rebuke to Job's contempt [alternate parallelism] Bildad supports the doctrine in a sustained outburst [triplet recitative and alternate parallelism]: Shall Job be an exception to universal law?

xx Job

After a transitional passage of personal irritation, Job proceeds to an address in which two opposite sides of his general position are intensified. His cause he now declares to be subverted by God (hitherto he had spoken of the difficulty of submitting it). In the reaction from the misery so described he suddenly rises to a certainty of the vindication hereafter (hitherto brought forward only to be rejected). With the power of this conception he almost faints; then resumes the misery, which is interrupted by the speech of Zophar.

[The sustained picture of misery is in alternate parallelism. By interruption, the confidence of vindication beyond the grave appears in quatrain stanzas, the last lacking one line, as Job breaks off in a half-fainting condition. He resumes the alternate parallelism; and one of these couplets is imperfect as Zophar breaks in.]

xxi Zophar

The doctrine of the Friends intensified: the short triumph of the wicked is only to emphasise his fall. This is a providential law.

xxii, xxiii Job

xxii. Job, after a transitional passage, which expresses the disturbing emotions attending a sudden thought, proceeds to open [in alternate parallelism] his doubt whether the impunity of the wicked is not a general principle.

xxiii. The thought is continued, in the way of dealing with stock objections against such alleged impunity. According to the note above (page 1657) I understand these objections to be actually spoken by the three Friends.

[The form, as in the similar section xiii, is augmenting interruption: the objections (four) appear irregularly as interruptions; the answers augment in the proportions 5, 5, 8, 11.]

xxiv, xxv Eliphaz

xxiv. Falling back on the basis of the doctrine, the awful distance of God from man, Eliphaz then brings the personal bearing of the Friends' doctrine to a climax in direct accusations of offences on Job's part.

[Stanza system: stanzas of 2, 4 contain the basis ideas; stanzas of 8, 4 the direct accusations.]

xxv. Then Eliphaz puts for the last time the hope that lies for Job in submission. [Transitional quatrain and pendulum figure, swaying between Job's submissive attitude (right) and his restoration (left).]

xxvi–xxix Job

xxvi. This attack has brought back Job to his own case; he falls back [in antistrophic inversion: 2, 8; 8, 2] upon the thought of the heavenly Vindicator, who is not to be found in this world, but will certainly clear him.

xxvii. The meditative strain is continued [in quatrain stanzas]: Job feels his innocence and yet his helplessness against the Almighty.

xxviii. Then he passes from his personal case to the general impunity of the wicked; and what before was a doubt, is now calmly formulated as apparently one of the laws of mysterious providence.

[After the question has been opened in a recitative couplet, the section falls into triplet stanzas with duplication. But the duplication is irregular in the first of the two sextets: instead of the parallelism running aabbbb, it runs abbbaa. I suppose this may be classed as a form of variation; but there is no similar case in Job.]

Why are times not laid up by the Almighty? On the word times, see on page 1639. The use here is close to that in Essay II of Ecclesiastes (page 1012): "God shall judge the righteous and the wicked: for there is a time there for every purpose and for every work." In the whole passage the steps of social evolution are scientifically discriminated: (a) encroachment, by removing boundaries, on the common land; (b) the consequent formation of a class sinking into hardship and poverty; (c) the intensification of this hardship by close contact with wealth:

And being an-hungered they carry the sheaves;
They make oil within the walls of these men;
They tread their wine-presses and suffer thirst.

(d) Next we have the crowding of population in cities, and the violence of city crime; (e) finally, the rise of a distinctly criminal class, whose whole existence is a warfare against the light: in this way the morning is to all of them as the shadow of death.

xxix. The stock objections against this view of the impunity of the wicked as part of God's providence are cited and answered.

[Unlike the previous sections dealing with objections (xiii, xxiii) the form of this passage is antistrophic inversion: 8, 2; 2, 8.]

xxx Bildad

Bildad brings to a climax the basis of the Friends' doctrine: the infinite distance between God and man [in a single pendulum figure: God's infinite greatness (right), inability of man to maintain his cause against such power (left)].

The Shades tremble: see note to xv, page 1665. — beneath the waters and the inhabitants thereof: this is the location of Sheol as the lowest conceivable region. Compare Amos, chapter ix. 3; Psalm cxxxix. 8. — Destruction hath no covering: below (section xxxiii) this term is used as a synonym of Sheol. — He closeth in the face of his throne, and spreadeth his cloud upon it: the idea is, that the storm is the moving Presence of God, but the clouds conceal him from our eyes; compare Psalm xviii. 9.

He bowed the heavens also, and came down;
And thick darkness was under his feet.
And he rode upon a cherub, and did fly:
Yea, he flew swiftly upon the wings of the wind.
He made darkness his hiding place, his pavilion round about him;
Darkness of waters, thick clouds of the skies.

He hath described a boundary upon the face of the waters, unto the confines of light and darkness. This is the mystery of the horizon: which is associated with ocean, because there only is it visible without interruption. Compare below (xlvi):

As for darkness, where is the place thereof?
That thou shouldest take it to the bound thereof,
And that thou shouldest discern the paths to the house thereof?

The idea of this last is, being able to carry darkness forward to the horizon, and back again to the place from which it came. So Milton's Satan, wandering on the outer surface of the 'World,' sees the light of the Empyrean streaming through the opening passage from heaven to earth:

So wide the op'ning seem'd, where bounds were set
To darkness, such as bound the ocean wave.

His hand hath pierced the swift serpent: see note above, page 1662.

xxxi Job

As the Friends persist in ignoring his doubts, Job, after a transitional passage of contempt [alternate parallelism], briefly returns to the assertion of his own personal case: he will never be moved from the position that God has subverted his cause [antistrophic].

xxxii, xxxiii Zophar

Zophar, on behalf of the three Friends, prepares to bring the discussion to a conclusion. He first (xxxii) calmly states over again the doctrine of Judgment on the wicked; and then (xxxiii) makes the fear of God and his judgments the basis of universal wisdom. This makes the climax or peroration of the Friends' case.

[Alternate parallelism as Zophar begins to speak (xxxii), followed by quatrain stanzas for the simple statement of the Doctrine. The climax (xxxiii) is a complete sonnet, consisting of elaborate strophe, antistrophe, and conclusion. Here is one of the few examples of variation in this poem (above, page 1519). The couplets of the strophe are broken by two successive triplets, and the same thing occurs in the antistrophe, but not at the same place.]

Behold, all ye yourselves have seen it; why then are ye become altogether vain? These words are in accordance with the idea that Zophar is summing up the case for the Friends, as the materials of the debate are evidently exhausted, and Job is more immovable than ever. He has said, I will teach you, and then turns to include his colleagues in his views: Ye yourselves have seen it; why, then, he asks, are ye become altogether vain? that is, why are your united attestations to go for nothing with Job? — The difficulty of these words in the Bible arrangement of the speeches, by which all this falls to Job, is felt by all commentators. The words are further of interest as possibly explaining how the misplacing of the speeches came about (see above, page 1657).

xxxiv–xxxvi Job

The formal conclusion to Job's side of the discussion will be the Oath of Clearing. In these sections, as if to emphasise the coming oath by a pause of delay, Job soliloquises in a climax picture of the misery which was the starting-point of the Curse. xxxiv is a picture of what Job was; xxxv the contrast, what he has become; while in xxxvi he sinks into a wail of utter misery.

[xxxiv is a combination of antistrophic interlacing and inversion: the stanzas succeed one another in the order: strophe 1, strophe 2, strophe 3; antistrophe 2, antistrophe 3, antistrophe 1. The first strophe is of the figure abbbaabbbb; strophe 2 has the form 2, 6, and strophe 3 the form 2, 4.]

[xxxv is antistrophic interruption (described above, page 1526). — xxxvi has a stanza system: quatrains and stanzas of 2, 8.]

xxxvii

Job rises, and in the most formal manner, falling into a traditional form of oath, disclaims all such sins as he could be suspected of: the form of speech being elastic enough to admit emotional outbursts of horror at the suggested sin, or longing for appeal to God.

[The form is a triple pendulum: a swaying between three tones. One is the enumeration of the supposed sins: If . . . Another is the denunciation of evil on himself, if he have committed them: Then . . . The third is a sort of permitted interruption of the formal oath to express the swearer's horror of the sin, or appeal to God against the idea of being guilty. The idea that this is a recognised formula appears not only from the repetition here in some ten stanzas, but also from the exact parallelism of form with a similar oath of disclaiming in Psalm vii.

O LORD my God, if I have done this;
If there be iniquity in my hands;
If I have rewarded evil unto him that was at peace with me;
(Yea, I have delivered him that without cause was mine adversary:)
Let the enemy pursue my soul, and overtake it;
Yea, let him tread my life down to the earth,
And lay my glory in the dust!]

If like Adam I covered my transgressions . . . so that I kept silence and went not out of the door. The general drift is, Job had never done anything to be ashamed of. To paraphrase: If like Adam (when he heard the voice of God in the garden and hid himself) Job had secret transgressions that forced him to keep in hiding from public contempt—. The sentence is never finished: there comes the natural interruption of a longing for a distinct indictment: how can he answer charges of sin not even made?

The words of Job are ended! I understand these words to belong to the poem (not simply to the written MS.). Job waves a dismissal of the debate, and sinks down on the ash-mound in dignified silence.

The Interposition of Elihu

Elihu the son of Barachel the Buzite, of the family of Ram. The only literary significance of this description is the suggestion of this speaker as representing a kindred people to the other speakers but not the same: as if in a dialogue of English personages an American were to interpose. It seems natural — though in a work that is parabolic rather than historic there can be no certainty — to associate 'the land of Uz' with Uz the first-born son of Nahor, Abraham's brother; Buz was the second son. Their descendants would be kindred tribes of monotheists, with their ethnological variations; the large infusion of Aramaic elements into the original of Elihu's speeches bears this out. The names 'Elihu,' 'Barachel,' keep up the suggestion of monotheist race (the words mean 'my God is he,' 'may God bless'). — Of the family of Ram. The experts have not been able to make anything substantial of this; it is enough to suggest that he is 'a man of family.'

xxxviii–xlv

The Interposition of Elihu takes the form of a succession of speeches: there is no speaker beside Elihu, but the multiplication of his addresses is due to circumstances connected with the scene and the demeanour of the auditors.

After he has gradually introduced and then expounded his argument, he then (at the close of xl) appeals to Job, and pauses for his reply:

If thou hast any thing to say, answer me:
Speak, for I desire to justify thee.
If not, hearken thou unto me.

Job's silence evidently nettles Elihu, and he turns to the Friends: Hear my words, ye wise men . . . what man is like Job, who drinketh up scorning like water? The speech so provoked deals with presumption; and at the end Elihu again tries to take the Friends with him in his condemnation of Job:

Men of understanding will say unto me,
Yea, every wise man that heareth me:
Job speaketh without knowledge, . . .
For he addeth rebellion unto his sin,
He clappeth his hands among us.

But the Friends evidently ignore this appeal. Accordingly the next speech (xlii) is directed against them as well as Job:

I will answer thee,
And thy companions with thee.

At the close of xlii a similar pause may be understood; but as both parties continue to ignore the youthful speaker, he has in the next speech (xliii) to take refuge in increased self-assertion: I will fetch my knowledge from afar . . . one that is perfect in knowledge is with thee.

But meanwhile another external stimulus has appeared to the eloquence of Elihu. At the opening of xlii, where he had just suffered the double slight of the Friends' silence following that of Job, he seems to look up to the sky, and finds there a starting-point:

Look unto the heavens, and see.

Now from the end of xliii this sky of the land of Uz seems to show signs of change; and from this point to the close of his speeches, Elihu's words are inspired wholly by the changing heavens. These changes are traced below (sections xliv, xlv).

xxxviii. Elihu, with mingled excitement and nervousness, apologises as a young man for interposing in a debate of his elders; but his feelings are roused by the sight of Job justifying himself against God, and the Friends unable to answer him.

[This nervousness gradually stiffening to self-assertion is admirably expressed by the form of augmenting alternation: 1, 1; 1, 1; 2, 2; 2, 2; 4, 4; 4, 4; 6, 6; 6, 6. See above, page 1525.]

xxxix. In this short section Elihu briefly states Job's position, and briefly opposes to it what is the basis of the Friends' doctrine: the distance between God and man.

xl. Here Elihu reaches his real answer to Job, and contribution to the argument. It is that calamity is a warning, just as truly so as Eliphaz's vision, which was the foundation for the doctrine of the Friends. He urges this view on Job, and pauses for his reply.

[The form is antistrophic duplication, set in a suspended introductory sextet. As to the latter, the couplet —

For God speaketh once, Yea twice, though man regardeth it not —

is clearly continued in the four lines:

Lo, all these things doth God work,
Twice, yea thrice, with a man;
To bring back his soul from the pit,
That he may be enlightened with the light of the living.

Between comes the whole doctrine of Elihu. Similarly, in section xxxix, his negation of Job's doctrine was contained in a sextet, which was suspended to interpose in the middle of it the statement of Job's position. — The antistrophic duplication which is the form of Elihu's main argument is fully explained above; see page 1525. Note also the reiteration: He keepeth back his soul from the pit, Deliver him from going down to the pit, in the corresponding parts of the vision warning and the warning of affliction. The section ends in a transitional passage of alternate parallelism, in which Job is called upon for an answer.]

xli. Receiving no reply from Job, Elihu appeals to the Friends against Job's presumption, and enlarges on the sin of presumption generally. At the close he connects this with his main argument, the rejection of the warning contained in affliction; and gives a first hint of further judgment in store for Job (would that Job were tried unto the end).

[Stanza system: quatrain stanzas express the greatness of God; septets the special sin of presumption.]

For hath any said unto God, "I have borne," etc. This is recognised as an obscure passage, but its sense is assisted by our remembering that Elihu's main point is the rejection of the warning implied in affliction. He now says in effect: Has any man ever submitted to the warning conveyed in calamity and shall his recompense be other than restoration? Elihu does not say "other than restoration," but "as thou wilt" because he is trying to put Job's thought. Job must suppose that the recompense will be something else than restoration, or else he would not refuse to take this course; but what Job can suppose it to be Elihu cannot conceive: Thou must choose, not I.

xlii. Disappointed at the silence of the Friends, Elihu looks up to heaven, and there finds a fresh inspiration: the God of that heaven can have no motive for injustice. He returns to the theme of men's rejection of the warning of affliction, and gives a second hint of further judgment in store for Job (because he hath not visited in his anger).

[Introduction and stanza system: quatrains express the distance between God and man, stanzas of 2, 4 the neglect of the warning conveyed by affliction.]

xliii. Falling back upon his own thoughts, in the absence of encouragement from without, Elihu brings to a climax his doctrine of warning calamity, and utters a similarly intensified threat of judgment on Job's impenitence: Thou art full of the judgement of the wicked: as if to say, "Thou art even now ripe for judgment."

[Introduction and triplet stanzas, with regular duplication.]

xliv, xlv. At this moment the first signs of the approaching storm attract attention, and Elihu catches the thought that the judgment with which he has threatened Job is that moment impending. From this point Elihu's speech is entirely occupied with the increasing storm.

[The crescendo in the storm without is reflected (xliv) in augmenting alternation: 1, 3; 1, 3; 2, 6; 2, 6; 4, 12; 4, 12. — The actual climax (xlv) is in sustained alternation.]

The leading effect in all this part of the poem is the absorption of the thought with the signs of approaching tempest. It is not essential that every detail should be connected with some present disturbance: to a certain extent Elihu may generalise upon what the visible scene presents (e.g. He sealeth up the hand of every man is most naturally understood of winter in general). Of course, in regard to a large proportion of lines, the language would be the same whether Elihu were speaking of the general works of God in nature or of a tempest then rising. But some of the lines cannot be interpreted in this general sense; for example:

At this also my heart trembleth,
And is moved out of its place.
Hearken ye unto the noise of his voice, etc.

And again:

Hearken unto this, O Job:
Stand still, and consider the wondrous works of God.

Again:

We cannot order our speech by reason of darkness.

These being necessarily called forth by present phenomena, the rest of the description goes with them.

The most important point is to note the order of the natural phenomena pictured by Elihu, and how this agrees with the approach of the whirlwind. The transition to this section is made by the words:

Behold, God doeth loftily in his power:
Who is a teacher like unto him?

Then we get, in regular succession, drawing up of drops of water which distil in rain from his vapour, which the skies pour down — spreadings of clouds — thunderings and lightning — cattle showing recognition of the storm that cometh up. Then some thunder clap at which Elihu's heart trembleth and is moved out of its place — thunder under the whole heaven, lightning unto the ends of the earth. — Next snow and cold out of the north mingles with the wind storm out of the chamber of the south, while beasts go into coverts; the thick cloud laden with moisture is thus turned about in terrible whirlwind violence. After the next hearken we hear of the balancings of the clouds (the black mass is descending on to the speakers): they who, a few moments ago, were chilled with the icy snow and wind now find their garments too warm, when the earth is struck quiet with the suffocating south wind. The storm cloud has now plunged them in its thickest darkness:

Teach us what we shall say unto him;
For we cannot order our speech by reason of darkness.
Shall it be told him that I would speak?
If a man speak, surely he shall be swallowed up.

From this point we have no longer a whirlwind, but a supernatural visitation, appropriate to the ushering in of Deity. Every clause must be studied. And now men cannot look on the light when it is bright in the skies, when the wind hath passed, and cleansed them. The whirlwind has blown the encompassing cloud to form a dark background in the distance: against which appears a supernatural brightness too vivid to gaze upon.

Out of the north cometh golden splendour:
God hath upon him terrible majesty.

They recognise this blaze of glory, golden yet too bright to gaze upon, as the visible glory of God. The north must not be taken of the north wind cleansing the skies, but of the north as in prophetic imagination the quarter specially associated with the Divine abode, or the direction from which the God of Judgment makes his appearance. This is perfectly clear from Isaiah, chapter xiv. 13:

And thou saidst in thine heart, I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God; and I will sit upon the mount of congregation, in the uttermost parts of the north: I will ascend above the heights of the clouds; I will be like the Most High.

(Compare Ezekiel, chapter i. 4; Jeremiah, vi. 1; i. 13–14, etc.). It is a regular feature of the theophanies of Scripture to have a supernatural brightness as a stage beyond the natural tempest. Thus in Ezekiel's vision (i. 4):

Behold, a stormy wind came out of the north, a great cloud, with a fire flashing continually and a brightness round about it, etc.

Again, in the appearance to Elijah the order is, wind rending the mountains, then earthquake, then fire, and then the Voice. (Compare verses 11 and 12 of Psalm xviii. In the Ode of Habakkuk there is the combination of supernatural brightness and nature convulsion, but the wind and darkness are wanting.)

The Divine Intervention

xlvi–l

For the general significance of the Divine Intervention see Introduction, page 1491.

xlvi. The first part of the Divine Intervention is made up of startling interrogatories as to the mysteries of the universe (broken occasionally by quieter description): the suggestion being that the mystery of suffering is not greater than these. — The idea of thunder crashes must be kept in mind throughout.

xlvii. A brief transitional section in which Job interjects words of submission [in two couplets: see note on the form of the Prologue, above, page 1660.]

xlviii. In a tone less terrible, even human government is presented as a task too hard for Job. [Recitative and quatrain stanzas].

xlix. As if without break in the violence of the storm, the chief wonders of land and sea are instanced in elaborate detail, behemoth and leviathan: the argument of course a continuation of xlvi.

[The form is sustained alternation, with a passage of triplet interruption: the alternate parallelism contains the tour-de-force of description; the interrupting passage, the feebleness of man before these monsters.]

1. Job makes his full submission. Job had been awed by the thought of God's presence when it was but a thing spoken of: now he has attained it he feels himself but dust and ashes. (Compare Introduction, page 1493.) All this while the Voice out of the Storm is dying away.

[The form must be described as augmenting interruption: compare above, notes to section xiii, and on the form of the Prologue (page 1660).]

Who is this that hideth counsel without knowledge? . . . I will demand of thee, and declare thou unto me. On the difficulties connected with these sentences see a special note above, page 1658.

Story Epilogue

The significance of the Epilogue has been discussed in the Introduction, pages 1491, 1493. [The form is plain prose.]

Notes to St. Luke's Gospel

This is, with the Acts of the Apostles and the Epistles of St. Paul, and with the other epistles, made here a continuous scheme of New Testament History. Compare Introduction, page 1496.

The differing purpose and spirit of St. Luke's Gospel in comparison with that of St. Matthew is reflected in the natural divisions into which the narrative is found to fall. Matthew is essentially a thinker, and his divisions spring from stages in the developing 'kingdom' of God. Luke, as his preface suggests, is an annalist, carefully verifying and fitting traditions into their local surroundings. Hence — apart from the opening and closing sections which are the same in both treatments — the main divisions of the present work may be called local and temporal: (a) the ministry in Galilee, which finds a climax in the confession of the Messiah by Peter and the rest; (b) the way from Galilee to Jerusalem, marked by an expectancy of a kingdom soon to be revealed; (c) Jesus in Jerusalem, where again the narrative falls mostly into the same divisions as in the other gospels.

I

i. 46. My soul doth magnify the Lord, etc. This and the other verse passages which follow, may be considered examples of the 'Antique Rhythm' which distinguishes most of the poetic outpourings retained in the historical books of the O.T. [see page 1596]. Its elastic 'strain' [a couplet of which either line may be strengthened by an additional line, but not both] makes it specially suitable for extemporaneous composition. It is noticeable, however, that these passages are less clear examples of parallelism than similar passages of the O.T.: no doubt because the Greek language does not lend itself to parallelism so readily as the Hebrew.

II

Page 1099. Genealogy of Jesus Christ. The difference of outer form in this as compared with the Matthew genealogy is in keeping with differences of substance. Details cannot be here discussed; but probably (a) Matthew's is a copy of the official register, in which links may be omitted, as the only purpose is to establish Davidic descent; (b) Luke's is the actual descent through Mary: the marriage of Joseph with Mary having constituted him the 'son,' that is, legal heir, of her father Heli.

III

The matter of this section centres clearly around the idea of the ministry in Galilee, and culminates in the Recognition of the Messiah by the Disciples. What links are necessary are given by the marginal headings in the text.

viii. 1–19. This corresponds to Section VII of St. Matthew. The distinction Matthew makes emphatic between the doctrine taught to the circle of disciples and that to the multitude is not formally stated by Luke. It is however the point of the passage (viii. 16), No man, when he hath lighted a lamp, etc.: the esoteric teaching is only given on condition of its being made public to others. Compare below, page 1696.

IV

As the title to this section suggests, the connection of its matter is twofold. (1) The long sustained journey: thus the starting-point of several incidents is local [e.g. ix. 51, 57; x. 38; xi. 1; xvii. 11; xviii. 31, 35; xix. 1]. (2) The growing sense of a crisis at hand, and expectation of the revelation of "the kingdom": this is seen to affect Jesus himself, his disciples, the character of the crowds of followers, the opponents of Jesus. — The marginal headings in the text bring out such links of connection.

xi. 14–36. The content of this passage is substantially parallel to that of Matthew xii. 22–45, though the order is varied; the last paragraph of Luke's section [image of the lamp] serves the same purpose as Matthew's image of the tree and its fruit. [See note on page 1695.] The unclean spirit when he is gone out of the man: the connection of this seems difficult in Luke's version, it is clearer in the fuller section of St. Matthew. The foundation of the blasphemy is the rejection of the divine spirit of healing; the inherently unclean, with evidence of healing before their eyes, make their souls the seat of yet greater uncleanness.

V

The subdivisions of this section are simple: the triumphal entry into Jerusalem and cleansing of the temple — the challenge of Christ's authority — the test questions, and the way these are met by Jesus, with his denunciation of the opposition, and (apparently by contrast) exaltation of the poor widow — the discourse of the end of all things. This falls into sections similar to those of the other reports of it: compare note to Matthew, page 1699.

VI

The subdivisions are: the last supper, and arrest of Jesus — the trial — the crucifixion and burial — the resurrection and ascension.

Notes to the Acts of the Apostles

The Acts of the Apostles, whatever difficulties it may raise for the historian, is singularly clear and straightforward in its style considered as a work of literature. It falls into divisions and subdivisions which are naturally related to the title of the work. 'Apostles' is the equivalent of our modern term 'commissioners': the 'commission' is given to these apostles in the opening section, and the sections that follow are natural stages in the fulfilment of the commission.

The charge given the apostles in the incident (I) of the ascension is to be witnesses (a) both in Jerusalem, (b) and in all Judæa and Samaria, and (c) unto the uttermost part of the earth. Accordingly, we have described the opening of the witness in Jerusalem (II); the extension, through the incident of Stephen's martyrdom, of the witness to Samaria and Galilee (III); the epoch of extension made by Peter's Vision, and the opening of the gospel to the Gentiles (IV), followed by the appearance of Paul as a separate leader for Gentile evangelisation (V), and the establishment, by means of a general council, of a non-circumcision Christianity (VI); a further vision originates a new departure in the extension of Paul's mission to Europe (VII); finally, a series of providential circumstances, as remarkable as any vision, brings the apostle of the Gentiles to exercise his office in Rome: the uttermost part of the earth is, so to speak, represented by the world's metropolis (VIII).

The extension of the apostolic witness has, in the last two sections, come to be measured in the field of Christian thought and church government even more than in territorial additions. Accordingly the epistolary communications of Paul begin here to take a position as elements of church history. Six epistles connect themselves with the period covered by sections VII and VIII. Further epistles, now unaccompanied by any narrative of Luke, carry on the history of the church, into two more sections: the Epistles of Paul's First Imprisonment in Rome (IX), and the Last Epistles of St. Paul (X), representing probably the period of his release and second imprisonment. — For the whole compare the Introduction, pages 1498–9.

I

This section briefly gives the Ascension charge to the apostles, and their period of waiting for the signal to begin their public witness.

II

This Opening of the Witness at Jerusalem falls into three subdivisions: (1) The outpouring of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost, and first 'fellowship' of the church — (2) A new outpouring of the Spirit in connection with a notable miracle and consequent interference of ecclesiastical authorities, followed by more particular description of the apostolic 'fellowship' — (3) A more determined interference by the high priest and Sadducees, ending in the pacification of Gamaliel.

III

Here first appears the double element in the Christian fellowship, Hebrew and Greek: first sign of the history that is to follow. — The incident of martyrdom, besides its intrinsic interest, suggestively brings together the names of Stephen and Saul. — The consequent persecution scatters the Christians as witnesses through Judæa and Samaria, and there is formal recognition of Samaritans as Christian brethren by the apostles. — Wider territorial extension by Philip. — Conversion of Saul, with a special commission to him as a witness to the Gentiles. — The conclusion recognises extension through Judæa, Galilee, and Samaria.

IV

The whole section is occupied with the epoch-making extension of the witness to the Gentiles. — Peter's Vision, with its consequences, in the visit to Cornelius, and recognition of events by the apostles at Jerusalem. — Then we have the first appearance of Antioch, as a head centre of Gentile Christianity, and of a distinctive name 'Christians,' whereas previously (and still in Jerusalem) the converts of the apostle had appeared as a sect or 'way' among the Jews. — The imprisonment of Peter and execution of James make a natural conclusion to that part of the history of which Jerusalem and the twelve apostles had been the centre: henceforth the interest is transferred to Paul and the extension to the vast Gentile world, Jerusalem and the other apostles appearing only incidentally and so far as they affect Gentile history.

V

The growing extension of the 'witness' is now embodied in a distinct institution, the missionary journey, or organisation of local churches. — The recognition of this institution, and formal ordination of Paul and Barnabas at Antioch. — A full-length picture of the mode of evangelisation adopted by the missionaries, especially the presentation of the word first to the Jews. — Further incidents and conclusion of the first missionary journey.

VI

The raising and settlement of a fundamental question as between Jewish and non-Jewish converts: the conclusion is a formal recognition of a non-circumcision Christianity.

VII

The 'missionary journey' is now an accepted institution. The narrative evidently seeks less to distinguish particular journeys [e.g. what are usually called second and third journeys of St. Paul mingle almost in the same sentence] than to recognise successive stages of widening of the mission. The present section ushers in, by vision, the opening of the witness to Europe. — Further missionary journeyings, with personal changes. — Providential circumstances, including a vision, which lead Paul to carry the gospel to Macedonia and Europe. His first adventures at Philippi. — Other prominent European centres. — Athens as intellectual metropolis of the Gentile world. — Corinth as one of the leading commercial centres of the world. By encouragement of a vision, Paul settles down for a long stay, and makes a determined attempt to evangelise the whole city.

During the long stay at Corinth Paul appears to have sent his First, and subsequently his Second, Epistles to the Thessalonians. Apparently he had, from Athens, sent Timothy to inquire after the welfare of these churches, receiving him on his return at Corinth.

Conclusion of the stay at Corinth, and further journeyings.

The date of the Epistle to the Galatians has not been positively determined, owing to the ambiguity in the term 'Galatia.' (a) It may mean a portion of Asia inhabited by Gauls or Galatians, and at this period a Roman province. (b) It may be certain territory, not inhabited by Galatians, but made a part (on the south) of the Roman province of Galatia. In the former case, there is no note in the Acts of any evangelisation by Paul, unless what may be covered by the general phrase twice repeated (chapters xvi. 6 and xviii. 23) 'the region of Phrygia and Galatia.' If the other meaning of Galatia be taken, this southern territory includes the cities of Derbe, Lystra, Iconium, etc., Paul's visits to which are told in detail. The historic question as between this northern and southern Galatia, in connection with Paul's epistle, seems almost impossible to settle, and expert opinion is almost evenly divided. This question affects the question of date, because it appears from the epistle that Paul had visited twice, but not more than twice, the people he is addressing. I have placed the epistle in its present position because (a) on the theory of northern Galatia this would be its proper place: (b) on the other theory this position, though too late in time, yet connects the epistle with the context.

Further journeyings, especially a long stay at Ephesus, with signal success in evangelisation.

The First Epistle to the Corinthians was written from Ephesus, probably before the disturbances which brought the visit to a close.

VIII

This final section of Luke's narrative presents what may be regarded as a final stage in the opening of the apostolic witness to the whole world: the bringing of Paul, the representative of Gentile extension, to the metropolis city of the world. It opens with an expression of Paul's purpose to proceed to Rome: then details circumstances which, in a manner very different from Paul's intention, bring him thither as a prisoner of state. — i. Paul turns his thoughts to Rome (xix. 21). — The disturbance of Demetrius: Paul quits Ephesus for Macedonia, as one stage in a journey to Jerusalem.

From Macedonia was sent the Second Epistle to the Corinthians.

ii. Paul lingering on his journey sends forward a letter to Rome (xx. 2). — Here a few words represent a period of time important in what it produced.

From this Grecian journey, from Corinth, was written the Epistle to the Romans. The personages addressed are apparently not a formally organised church, but a body of people christianised elsewhere and returned to or otherwise settled at Rome.

Thus many are known to Paul, though he has never visited Rome itself. He has already made a resolution to visit Rome, but not till after his journey to Jerusalem. Apparently he foresees that this intervening journey is likely to occupy a long time; meanwhile the dividing questions on which he feels so keenly are making themselves felt in all directions, and are sure to affect the Romans. Accordingly he takes advantage of an opportunity to send, by a deaconess of Cenchreæ visiting Rome, an epistle which is mainly a theological treatise.

iii. The incidents of this journey become more and more charged with prophetic warnings, these premonitions reaching a climax in Paul's address to the Ephesian elders (xx. 3). — iv. A simple device to avoid misunderstanding results in a crisis, Paul being arrested: the hierarchical opposition to Christianity is now concentrated upon Paul (xxi. 17). At the close of this incident a vision makes clear that it is part of a providential train of circumstances leading Paul to bear his testimony at Rome. — v. As a further stage, a conspiracy against Paul's life transfers him to the Roman judicature of Felix at Cæsarea (xxiii. 12). — vi. With the change of (Roman) administration from Felix to Festus, Paul is put on trial, and makes formal appeal to Cæsar (xxv. 1). The hearing before Agrippa is a preliminary stage of the appeal to Cæsar, for the purpose of formulating an accusation. — vii. The voyage and shipwreck (xxvii.). — viii. Paul, in Rome, goes through the regular process of offering his ministrations first to the Jews, and upon their rejection of him turning to the Gentiles (xxviii. 16).

IX

The narrative of The Acts having ceased, the next stage of church history is represented by the Epistles of Paul's (First) Imprisonment. Three appear to be sent by the same messenger, Tychicus.

The Epistle to the Ephesians. The absence of the term 'Ephesians' in certain MSS. and the absence of individual messages, agrees with the contents and character of the epistle in suggesting a circular letter sent to various churches, of which that at Ephesus was one.

The Epistle to the Colossians is sent at the same time, and for the same general purpose; but an independent letter is necessitated by the false doctrines which are rife at Colossæ.

The Epistle to Philemon is a private letter from the apostle to a friend.

To this period also belongs:

The Epistle to the Philippians, sent by Epaphroditus, who had brought the offerings of the Philippian church to the apostle in his imprisonment, and, after a dangerous illness, is returning to Philippi.

X

The Last Epistles of St. Paul. While evidence of this part of church history is obscure, the generally received opinion is that the apostle was released from imprisonment at Rome, and resumed his journeyings: during which we have:

The First Epistle to Timothy.
The Epistle to Titus.

He was again arrested; now with near prospect of execution he indites

The Second Epistle to Timothy.

Syllabus and Notes to Epistles

 This Syllabus is constructed on the principle that single paragraphs of the text are represented either by single paragraphs of the Syllabus, or by sections of a paragraph divided by a dash.

Syllabus to I Thessalonians

I. Thankful remembrance of the assurance with which the gospel was introduced to the Thessalonians, spontaneous testimony to which comes from believers everywhere. — On the one hand the apostle's ministry among them had been bold, disinterested, loving, unwearied: on their part the Thessalonians received it as a word of God; like the churches of Judæa, and amid persecutions such as those churches suffered from the Jews.

Hindered by perverse circumstances from himself coming, the apostle had sent Timothy to the Thessalonians: and can never be thankful enough for the glad tidings Timothy has brought of their faith and love: may God and the Lord Jesus bring about the meeting, and establish their hearts to the time of his coming.

It remains that in their faithful walk they should abound more and more: in sanctification from uncleanness, love of the brethren, and ambition for quiet and unobtrusive work.

The question of those that fall asleep: those that sleep in Jesus God will bring with him; they will be the first to rise, and those who are alive will be caught up with them.

II. The question of times and seasons not a question for discussion: the day of the Lord will come like a thief upon the careless traveller. But believers, as children of the day, will be sober and watchful.

III. Exhortations: the brethren to respect for leaders; the leaders to their work of oversight; all to Christian acts and graces. — Conclusion.

Syllabus to II Thessalonians

I. The apostle thanks God, and in the churches glories over the faithfulness of the Thessalonians amid their persecutions and afflictions: these sufferings as true a token of God's righteous judgments, in that they are fitting the sufferers for the kingdom, as will be the recompense God will mete out to their persecutors at the coming of the Lord Jesus. May God count the Thessalonians worthy of their calling, and fulfil their every desire.

II. The question of the coming of the Lord Jesus: a firm attitude to be maintained against the suggestion that the 'day of the Lord' is present. Warnings given during the apostle's personal ministry among the Thessalonians recalled: (a) the condition precedent of a 'falling away,' and a revelation of the 'man of sin' with his exaltation of himself against God; (b) that the 'mystery of lawlessness' does indeed work, but (c) a restraining power is for the present acting in order to delay to the proper season the revelation of the 'lawless one,' and his destruction by the Lord Jesus in spite of his power and signs, lying words that deceive those who have not embraced the truth.

III. Prayers with thankfulness for the Thessalonians: their prayers desired for the apostle in his labours. — A positive command to withhold fellowship (yet in no hostile spirit) from those who walk disorderly and contrary to traditions received from the apostle, fortified by apostolic example. This called forth by rumours of busybodies who shun all work. — Conclusion.

Syllabus to Galatians

A marvel: that the Galatians are so readily moving away from the original gospel under which they were called: whatsoever man or angel introduces any other gospel, let him be anathema.

I. Paul makes solemn testimony that the gospel he preached came from no human authority, but direct from the Lord Jesus. He recounts his position in the early years after his conversion to show the impossibility of other influence. — He recounts his visit at a later period to Jerusalem, and his recognition by the 'pillars of the church' as being intrusted with the gospel of the uncircumcision as Peter with the gospel of the circumcision. — Finally is recounted Paul's open conflict with Cephas at Antioch on this very question of Gentiles conforming to Jewish life. [The account of this conflict merges in more general statement of the principles involved.] Even we who are born Jews yet believe on Christ, because by faith and not by law is man to be justified: shall we then, while professing justification in Christ, erect again a Law which must pronounce us sinners, and so make Christ a minister of sin? With Christ our former life was crucified; what lives now is Christ in us the life of faith.

II. Appeal is made to the Galatians from their own experience: have the wonders of their conversion and its sequel come by law or faith? — Abraham's righteousness rests on faith: they which be of faith are sons of Abraham. — They that cling to the works of the law are under its curse, from which curse Christ became curse to redeem us. — Considered even as a human institution the original covenant to Abraham cannot be disannulled by the law of 430 years later.

> The question arises: What, then, is the position of the law? An interim institution, arising out of the existence of transgression, obtaining to the time of the promised 'seed' (Christ), ordained not directly by God but indirectly through a mediator. Is there then contradiction between Divine law and promise? No: righteousness would have been of law if the law could have made alive. Law was the prison from which faith is the release; the attendant leading to the teacher Christ; the period of tutelage during which the heirs of life are not different from slaves. Will the Galatians voluntarily return to that elementary stage?

Appeal is made to the Galatians from their personal relations with the writer: is that passionate zeal for him become nothing because he is absent?

> An allegory from the Law which the Galatians so much admire: Sinai and Jerusalem, the child of the handmaid and the child of promise. Stand fast in Christian freedom, and be not entangled again with a yoke of bondage.

Appeal is made to the Galatians from their bond to Christ: solemn declaration that receiving circumcision is severance from Christ.

What can have marred the fair course they were running? Some little leaven that leaveneth the whole lump. They may be sure that Paul gives no countenance to the new doctrine: or else why should he be persecuted? Would that these disturbers would circumcise themselves away!

Caution in applying the doctrine here laid down: freedom is your calling, but freedom not used for the flesh. Walk by the Spirit, and then there is no danger of fulfilling lusts of the flesh.

III. General exhortations in gnomic form: spirit of correction — mutual comfort and individual responsibility — support of teachers — sowing and reaping — constancy of effort ——— conclusion with autograph.

> Galatians ii. 17. But if, while we sought to be justified in Christ, we ourselves also were found sinners, is Christ a minister of sin? God forbid, etc. The sense of the whole passage is affected by an ambiguity in the expression, found sinners. (1) It is sometimes understood as = conforming to Gentile life. Thus the whole sense would be: If, while seeking justification through Christ, our lives show no better than Gentile lives, will the guilt lie on the head of Christ? Never: the building up what was destroyed is a confession that our former abandonment [of the law] was a transgression. — (2) I have followed another view: found sinners = re-erecting the law [under which all are found sinful]. Thus the sense of the whole is: Are we, while professing justification through Christ, to erect again a law which will make us sinners, and so make Christ a minister of sin? Never! And yet that is what your position amounts to: for to erect what you have pulled down is a confession of sin. The sentence, If I build, etc., is exegetical of found sinners.

Syllabus to I Corinthians

Introduction: Thankfulness for the rich gifts bestowed upon the Corinthian church, and confidence for their future.

I

Points arising out of information received

i. Appeal against the spirit of faction: parties of Paul, of Apollos, of Cephas, of Christ. Were they baptized in the name of Christ or of Paul? As a fact, only a few were even baptized by Paul. — His work was not baptizing, but preaching the gospel: the simple power of the cross, in contrast with human wisdom. — For the full grown there is indeed a Divine mystery of wisdom: but this spiritual wisdom can be interpreted only to spiritual men; and the Corinthians were carnal, and still are, as these factions show. — What then are Apollos and Paul? Merely ministers through whom God works, one perhaps laying a foundation and the other building on it: what he builds the fire shall test. — [Building is just what they are: God's temple: let a man beware of destroying it.] — Worldly wisdom is spiritual self-deception: instead of magnifying human leaders these should be considered stewards of God's mysteries, and all of them (with all other things) belong to those who are Christ's: whether they are even faithful stewards cannot be known before the time of the Lord's coming. — What has been said of Paul and Apollos in this figure of the steward applies to all: if the Corinthians have any superiority it has been given them; yet they are posing as if the probation were over and the reigning had begun, in contrast with the poor apostles who are exposed as a spectacle of persecution to men and angels. But all this is only admonition: this and Timothy's coming is to prepare for Paul's own visit.

ii. Protest against tolerance of a reported case of shameless impurity: the direction in a former epistle 'to keep no company with the impure' related to such a case as this, not to the impure outside their ranks.

iii. Protest against disputes between brethren being carried to courts of unbelievers. Rather be willing to be defrauded: instead of this they even defraud.

iv. A fixed principle: the sensual and other evildoers cannot inherit the kingdom. What law may not forbid expediency does. Impurity is a sin, not against what is external, but against a man's own body: a body which is a member of Christ, a temple of the Holy Ghost.

II

Points arising out of the Corinthian Letter

i. Questions growing out of the marriage relation discussed on the general basis that marriage intercourse is lawful, but perhaps not the most desirable thing in an exceptional period (of distress and the near coming of the Lord), also on the wider principle that all should abide in the general condition (e.g. circumcision, slavery) in which they were called. The principles are applied successively to married persons — to those who are single, or married to unbelievers — to virgin daughters.

ii. The question of meats sacrificed to idols. As a matter of knowledge [but knowledge betrays to self-consciousness: it is love that really builds up] idols are nothing: but to the weak, who have not knowledge to see this, offence must not be given in a matter of mere eating.

> Paul himself has all the rights of an apostle (eating and drinking, and leading about a wife, and support in things carnal from those to whom he ministers) but he uses none of these things. Nay, he positively refuses to use his rights: his only reward for preaching the gospel shall be that he be allowed to do it without charge. This, and the adapting of himself to all men, he does for the gospel, that he may have a share in its benefits: an athlete going into full training, lest after saving others he himself should prove a castaway.
> Remember our fathers, how all had the same spiritual blessings, yet some displeased God and fell in the wilderness: taking example from these let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall.

To resume. Run no risks of idolatry: just as your own Lord's Supper implies a participation in the body and blood of Christ, and just as those who eat the sacrifices of carnal Israel have communion with the altar, so to eat idol meats is to partake of the table of demons. The matter must be treated as one of expediency, not of law: there is no need to ask questions, but where attention is called to idol meats refrain for the sake of others. Even eating and drinking may be done to the glory of God.

iii. Points of order. Women not to pray or prophesy unveiled: on principle [veiling the sign of subordination in the scale God, Christ, man, woman: nature, moreover, by the long hair of women points the same way], and because so the custom of the churches requires. — Behaviour at the common feast is not to be regulated as if it were a matter of appetite: from the Lord himself came the institution of the Lord's Supper as a memorial of himself.

iv. Spiritual Gifts. In contrast with the dumbness of idol gods, there is for the followers of Jesus a Spirit who inspires even the simplest cry, 'Jesus is Lord.' All the diverse spiritual gifts proceed from one and the same Spirit. — Simile of the Body: As with the bodily parts, some are inferior, but have the more abundant honour bestowed on them, so that there is no schism, but on the contrary if any part suffers or is honoured all suffer or rejoice: so there are higher and lower spiritual gifts; but, while the greatest are to be desired, LOVE is beyond all, without which the best are nought;. love will abide when all the gifts are done away. — Love then is the main thing: of desirable gifts prophecy is better than tongues because more edifying to the church: tongues are chiefly a sign to the unbelieving. — Discord is produced in assemblies of the church by competition in spiritual gifts: let all things be done decently and in order. Women should not speak in the assembly at all. [What right has the Corinthian church to lay down principles as if they were the originators of the word, or as if there were no other churches? If any claim spiritual authority, Paul bids them receive his words on the authority of the Lord.]

v. The Resurrection of the Dead. Paul reminds the Corinthians how the very foundation of the faith preached, by which they are being saved, is Christ raised from the dead and seen by many, last of all by Paul himself: if there be no resurrection of the dead (as some are saying) the whole faith is vain, and its witness false. — But Christ has arisen: a second Adam, firstfruits of resurrection as the first Adam of the life that ends in death; beginning of the process that ends when the Son, having subjected to himself death as the last of all things, is himself subjected to God. Without this vain is the baptism for the dead, and vain the daily death that consists in the renouncing of all that makes life. Only corrupting intercourse could have begotten such thoughts. — As to the mode by which resurrection is possible: the analogy of corn sown suggests how the body sown is not the body that rises, and yet each grain has its own body. Nature is full of differences and graduations. So for man there is a natural body and a spiritual body. Though all will not die, for all the present corruption will put on incorruption. This is the 'death being swallowed up in victory.'

Conclusion: arrangements of the collection for the saints — personal movements of Paul and others — salutations.

Syllabus to II Corinthians *

Blessings to the God who comforteth in affliction, making affliction a means of comfort for others. Paul has thus been raised from an affliction he expected to be fatal, and has confidence in future comfort, with the prayers and to the rejoicings of the Corinthians. For he is conscious of having behaved with sincerity to the Corinthians, and he believes that they make their boast in him as he in them.

In this spirit Paul had purposed to make a double visit to Corinth: he was prevented [not by fickleness: there is no uncertainty in the promises Paul preached, and the God of those promises gives the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts] by his determination not to come to them in sorrow. He had written to them in much anguish: but he who caused the anguish has been sufficiently punished, let him be forgiven by all, as he is by the Apostle.

* It must not be assumed that this epistle is next in succession to the preceding in Paul's intercourse with the Corinthians. There are suggestions that other communications had passed between the two parties.

At Troas, in spite of the open door for the gospel, the absence of Titus made Paul too anxious to stay, and he came into Macedonia. His life is a blessed march in the triumphal procession of Christ, a scattering of incense, savours of life and of death. Who is sufficient for such work? especially if it be done in sincerity and in no mercantile spirit.

> Is this self-commendation? No need for that with the Corinthians. If the ministration of the temporary dispensation leading to death caused the face of Moses to shine, should not the ministration of righteousness which remaineth exceed in glory? We will not veil our speech [the veil is still present for the hearers of Moses, until they turn to the Lord] but be an unveiled mirror reflecting the glory of the Lord. To repress the brightness of this ministry of light would savour of the crafty and deceitful speech which has been renounced. (There is veiling enough in the hearts of the blinded unbelievers.) ——— True, this treasure of light is in earthen vessels: the preachers of life are daily delivered to death: but we look from the temporary dissolving tabernacle to the permanent building in the heavens. ——— Whether here or there, our aim is to make ourselves manifest before the judgment of God, and in your consciences. Thus it is not self-commendation, but a presentation of our case for your glorying. Dead with Christ's death to old things, a new creation in him, we have received from God the ministry of reconciliation; as ambassadors we convey Christ's appeal; and seek to free our ministration from all offence, and to commend it under all circumstances and by all means. — We have poured out our hearts freely to you: recompense us in kind: cut * yourselves completely adrift from unbelievers and from defilement. We are full of confidence for you.

To resume. When in Macedonia Paul's affliction was still unrelieved, until the coming of Titus and news of the Corinthian church brought rejoicing. Paul even rejoices that he made them sorry, for it was sorrow of a godly sort; he rejoices also that the spirit of Titus has been refreshed.

Mention is made of the liberality of the Macedonian churches: Titus (with another) has been sent to the Corinthians in order that final arrangements might be made in a matter which the Corinthians were beforehand in commencing. — The readiness of the Corinthians is well known: may they abound as God's grace abounds to them.

I beg that I may not be compelled to show myself bold when I come; bold with spiritual, not fleshly weapons. — Look at what is before you: if I make much of my authority this is not a foolish taking of ourselves for a standard, but the standard is the measuring line which has brought us to Corinth, and shall bring us to preach the gospel yet further away. — The folly of our boasting is excused by our godly jealousy over the virgin church I espoused to Christ. What makes Paul behind the chiefest of apostles? is it that he preached without charge? He did this, and will do it, merely to cut off the boasting of false apostles posing as angels of light. — Ye bear with men who bring you low: bear with my boasting. Recital of Paul's high claims as a Hebrew, and on the ground of uninterrupted persecutions — recital of revelations such that, to prevent exaltation, a thorn in the flesh was sent upon Paul. — Among the Corinthians themselves Paul's signs of apostleship have been shown: they have been inferior to no church except in being served without charge. — Now a third visit from Paul is impending: he will visit them on the same terms. This is no apology: Paul wishes to prevent, when he comes, a state of faction and disorder: in such circumstances Paul will not spare. — Final good wishes.

Syllabus to Romans

Introduction: Thankfulness and prayers for the Roman Church: with longing to visit them and impart to them some spiritual gift, as to the rest of the Gentiles.

THE GOSPEL IS THE POWER OF GOD: TO JEW AND GREEK: AS REVEALING A RIGHTEOUSNESS THAT IS BY FAITH.

* It should be pointed out that the words from Be not unequally yoked (vi. 14) to perfecting holiness in the fear of God (vii. 1) bear signs of being an interpolation; the sentence Open your hearts, etc., joins naturally to what precedes the doubtful passage.

I. Divine wrath revealed against all unrighteousness. Those [Gentiles] who might have known the Creator by his creation changed his glory into vile images, and were themselves delivered over to moral vileness. — Those that judge them [Jews] are in the same case as doing the same works: circumcision to transgressors of the law becomes uncircumcision; and equally, those without law doing the things of law become a law unto themselves.

Then what advantage is there to the Jew? He is the honoured depository of Divine oracles: the lack of faith in some must not nullify the righteousness of God. — But how if our unrighteousness is found to commend the righteousness of God? Will you call the judge of the whole earth unrighteous when he visits with wrath? — But if my lie display God's truth, why am I to be judged a sinner? Why not, you may equally say, do evil that good may come? — Then our case is worse than that of the Gentiles? Nay, the work of your own law is to make ALL sinful: law brings nothing but the knowledge of sin.

II. But now hath been manifested, apart from the law yet witnessed by the law and prophets, a righteousness through faith in Jesus, unto all who believe without distinction, by Divine grace, through the propitiation of Christ, which makes justification consistent with righteousness. Here there is no place for exclusive privilege or distinction of Jew and Gentile.

Is it objected that such faith makes the law of no effect? No: Abraham was justified by faith: circumcision was given as the seal of the faith he had before. The promise to Abraham's seed was through faith, not through law.

III. Starting from the foundation of justification by faith we have peace, grace, rejoicing even in trouble, and hope founded on the thought that even while sinners Christ died for us: much more shall we be saved by his life. — As by one man sin passed upon all, so (but much more so) by Christ the gift of grace abounds to the many. Law came in to make the trespass abound, but grace abounds more exceedingly.

Does this imply that we are to continue in sin that grace may abound? Nay: we were baptized into the death of Christ; the old life is dead, there is a resurrection of a new life of righteousness, no longer under the dominion of sin but under grace. — Then are we to sin because we are not under the law but under grace? Nay, if ye present your members unto sin ye become bondslaves of sin. Again, as with a legal marriage dissolved by death, you are free from law and death, and joined to Christ, so as to bring forth fruit unto God. — The argument seems to imply that the law is sin. No, but that which brings the knowledge of sin: the law itself is holy and good. — Could that which is good become death to me? No, but sin is shown exceeding sinful by the fact of its working death to me by means of that which is itself good. It brings out a carnal law in my members warring against the law of my mind. But for those that are in Christ condemnation is removed, for the law of the spirit of life in Christ has set them free from this law of sin and death: the weakness of flesh which defeated law has been met by the Son of God appearing in the likeness of flesh. If Christ is in you the body is dead as regards sin, the spirit is life as regards righteousness.

IV. So ours is a life of mortification of the deeds of the body, under leadership of the spirit. This is a sonship, making us sons of God, joint-heirs with Christ. — Compared with the glory to which we are thus heirs, what are present sufferings? The whole creation groans under the bondage of corruption, waiting for the revealing of the sons of God. We who have the firstfruits of the Spirit groan in hope for the redemption of the body, the Spirit helping our groans and intercessions: while all things are working together for our glorification. With God on our side who can be against us? Whether sufferings within or power without, nothing can separate us from the love of God.

The sad thing is that all this seems to be at the cost of the rejection of Israel. Yet there is no inconsistency in God's dealings: witness previous rejections of Ishmael and Esau.

Is there then unrighteousness with God? Nay, his prerogative is to have mercy or to harden as he will: the clay may not criticise the potter. — Then the case is that the Gentiles not following righteousness attained it, whereas the Jews following the law of righteousness did not attain: wherefore? Because they sought by works and not by faith: this is the 'stumbling-block of Zion.' — But how faith in one of whom they had not heard, and how hear if none were sent? Their own Scriptures show hearing and rejection.

Is it however a fact that God's people have been rejected? There is still an elect remnant who have obtained, and the rest are hardened: not to their fall, but to provoke the Gentiles to jealousy: if their fall is the riches of the world, how much more their fulness? — Then the Gentiles must not be elated at being grafted in in place of the natural branches: but rather fear the unbelief which caused the branches to be broken off. The calling of God is without repentance: the disobedient Gentiles obtained mercy through the disobedience of the Jews, so by the mercy shown to the Gentiles the Jews will obtain mercy. — O the deep wisdom of God!

V. Exhortation: to present your bodies as living sacrifices: to be transformed by the renewing of your minds from this world unto the divine will. — Use your gifts as members of one body. — As members of a civil order respect authority and be void of offence — in all elements of life sobered by the nearness of our salvation. — The weak deal with in a spirit of forbearance: granted that 'uncleanness' of meats is only a thing of opinion, yet for no question of meats should we trouble a brother for whom Christ died: rather, the strong should bear the infirmities of the weak. Receive one another, as Christ the minister of the circumcision received you Gentiles.

Conclusion: This letter prompted by Paul's special function of minister to the Gentiles. — Explanation of his movements — salutations, etc.

Syllabus to Ephesians

Blessed be God, for the blessing wherewith he hath blessed us in Christ: in him was the choice of us before the foundation of the world; in him our redemption, part of God's mystery of summing up in Christ all things in heaven and earth; in whom alike we who before had hoped in Christ, and ye who heard our word, were sealed unto the redemption of God's possession. I, hearing of your faith, give thanks and pray for you: God give you the spirit of revelation in knowledge of God, and of all that is implied in God's raising Christ from the dead, and setting him far above all principalities and powers.

You, also, he raised from the death of your sins. In a like world of sin we once lived a life of lust, but God raised us together with Christ. Such salvation is by grace through faith. I repeat, ye were uncircumcision in the eyes of the circumcision: aliens from the commonwealth of Israel: but Christ Jesus has broken down the middle wall of partition and made both one, abolishing that which was the principle of antagonism between them, the system of legal ordinances: ye are thus our fellows in the household and temple of which Christ is the chief corner stone.

Wherefore I, Paul, prisoner of Christ Jesus in the cause of the Gentiles —

[Ye have heard of my particular stewardship in the mystery of redemption: that Gentiles are fellow heirs in the promise through Christ. In such a mission I pray you not to faint under any sufferings of mine, which are your glory: rather I pray that you may be strengthened with power to know the unknowable utmost of Divine fulness. Glory to him who can exceed all our thoughts!]

I appeal to you to walk worthy of your calling, keeping the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace: there is one Spirit, and diverse gifts, which are to unite in building up a fulness of manhood in the body of Christ. — I charge you that the old life of lust and corruption be put away, and that ye walk in love and imitation of God, as children of the light. — Take heed thus to walk, and redeem the time, because the days are evil: — wives and husbands in the spirit of Christ and his church — children and parents, servants and masters. — Finally, be strong, and put on the whole armour of God for the contest against spiritual rulers of darkness. — Conclusion.

Syllabus to Colossians

Thankfulness for the faith and love of the Colossians, with prayer that they may be filled with knowledge and power. The prayer passes into a declaration of Christ as the image of God, firstborn of all creation and agency through which all principalities and dominions have been created, head of the church, firstborn from the dead: in him all the 'fulness' * of the Father dwells: through him are reconciled things in heaven and earth; through him you, alienated by evil works, are reconciled.

Paul rejoices in his sufferings as an element of the dispensation given to him to open the mystery of God among the Gentiles: Christ in whom treasures of wisdom and knowledge are hidden.

Appeal against being led away by traditional and secular philosophy. In Christ is the 'fulness' of the Godhead: in him was your circumcision, the dying with Christ to the fleshly life and rising through faith. The bond of ordinances against you is nailed to his cross: in his cross he triumphed over principalities and powers. Let no man set over you ordinances, or seduce you to angel worship and vows of humility. — If you died with Christ to the secular, why human ordinances of no real spiritual value? if you are risen with Christ, why not set your minds on that which is above? Put to death the old members: put on the new graces, love and peace.

Particular precepts of a general character. — Conclusion.

Syllabus to Philemon

After thankfulness and prayer in the thought of Philemon, Paul explains how he sends a deserting slave, now a brother, back, resisting the temptation to keep him for his own comfort. Paul knows Philemon will do even more than he is asked. — Personal matters and conclusion.

Syllabus to Philippians

Thankfulness for the good work in the past among the Philippians, and confidence for its abounding in the future.

Information that the circumstances of Paul's condition have resulted in furtherance of the gospel, with confidence that this will be so whether he lives or dies: Paul knows not which of the two to desire. — Only let their life be worthy of him: by all that is sacred between them Paul appeals to the Philippians to avoid faction and vainglory, and cultivate a spirit of lowliness, mindful of the great humiliation of Christ and his exaltation above all things: in this spirit he bids them work out their salvation, that he may rejoice in them, even if he be offered up upon the service of their faith.

Hopes with regard to future communications with them, and even a visit.

Paul is beginning his final greetings: —

> He breaks off with warning against the concision (we are the true circumcision): his own high Jewish claims he counts as nothing in comparison with righteousness through faith in Christ. The power of Christ's resurrection is a thing to which he is ever reaching forward: he calls on the Philippians to imitate his spirit, and (unlike the enemies of the cross who glory in earthly things) have their citizenship in heaven, looking forward to the conforming of their bodies of humiliation to the body of his glory. — Personal appeals for reconciliation of the factious. —

Final greetings resumed: exhortation to joy and peace, and to whatever is highest. — Acknowledgment of their gifts. — Final salutation.

* A technical term of heresies, which recognised angelic emanations as 'filling' the interval between God and man.

Syllabus to I Timothy

Resistance to a doctrinal heterodoxy prompted by temptation to magnify the law. — Paul's thankfulness for Christ's acceptance of his services though he had been the chief of sinners: a monumental example of what salvation may be.

Charge to Timothy in his pastoral work with a view to his warring a good warfare: — prayer on behalf of all — quiet life for women — injunctions for bishops and deacons.

Paul hopes to come to Timothy: meanwhile these injunctions are sent in view of the importance of the church and the mystery of godliness. It has been expressly said by the Spirit that there shall be fallings away from the faith in the latter times.

A series of paragraphs partly gnomic deal with Timothy's personal character, and with the requirements of particular classes of people.

Heterodoxy, especially under temptations of gain: Timothy to fight against this. — A final charge as to the rich. — A final charge to Timothy himself.

Syllabus to Titus

Titus left in Crete for the purpose of supplementing the work done there, and especially appointing elders. Proper characteristics for such overseers: amongst them the upholding of sound doctrine as against corrupting and interested deceivers such as are likely to abound in Crete. — Sound doctrine in its bearing upon various classes of people. — Emphasis laid on subjection to authority and meekness to all men, in memory of a salvation not attained by works but through God's mercy. — Personal matters and conclusion.

Syllabus to II Timothy

Thankfulness for the part and confidence for the future of Timothy in that holy calling which Paul and Timothy have in common. — Allusion to Paul's relation with succouring and forsaking friends. — Exhortation to Timothy to be united with himself in the arduous cause of preaching Christ. — Central ideas of the gospel to be kept prominent, as against corrupting disputes over trifles, such as engender strife, and impair usefulness as a vessel of God's service. — Special caution in view of the grievous times foretold for these last days: Timothy safe through his grounding in the Scriptures inspired by God for correction and instruction. — Solemn appeal to Timothy as to the fulfilment of his ministry: Paul's own ministry is nearing its end and its crown. — Personal matters and conclusion.

Syllabus to Hebrews

[The epistle describes itself at its close as a 'word of exhortation.' Two lines of thought are traceable in it: (1) a strain of exhortation (indented in the syllabus to the left); and (2) distinct arguments approaching to digressions which establish particular points occurring in the general strain of exhortation (indented to the right). These digressive arguments include the most important parts of the epistle; the thoughts they contribute are gathered up by the strain of exhortation as it resumes.]

I

Now that God's scattered revelations to the fathers by prophets have become a full revelation through a Son, exalted after his finished work of purification as far above the angels as he is beyond them by inheritance:

> for the Scriptures speak not of the angels as 'sons' — they are 'winds,' 'flames of fire' — their mission is to do service for the sake of the heirs of salvation:

how much more earnest heed should we give not to drift away from this greater salvation — a salvation by one to whom 'all things' are subjected.

> But not yet: Jesus hath been made 'a little lower than the angels' and exalted through death and sufferings, that the author of salvation might partake in all things pertaining to his brethren, and so be a merciful and faithful HIGH PRIEST between God and a sinful people.

II

Wherefore consider this High Priest of our confession — faithful as Moses, yet with more glory in proportion as a son is above a servant. Take heed that the evil heart of unbelief which kept the followers of Moses from 'entering into His rest' keep not us from the true 'rest.'

For it was the followers of Moses who provoked and were excluded, but it is to us that the psalmist's word of 'rest' must apply: not to the rest after the creation, nor the rest of the promised land: there must remain a Sabbath rest for God's people, a rest from works.

Let us hold fast our confession, confiding in a High Priest, tempted and thus able to succour the tempted, appointed like other priests by God, by obedience and suffering made perfect, and thus author of an eternal salvation, A HIGH PRIEST AFTER THE ORDER OF MELCHIZEDEK.

But is it any use to treat of this theme with those who linger in the milk of first principles instead of pressing on to strong meat and fulness of growth? Those who have lost the taste for the heavenly word have no means of renewing themselves, while they thus crucify afresh the Son of God. But your former love and diligence is earnest that you will press on to the fulness of hope, secured by God's promise and oath: a hope extending whither there has preceded us this High Priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek.

(1) Melchizedek ABIDETH A PRIEST CONTINUALLY. Abraham (and in Abraham the Levitical priesthood) paying to him tithes foreshadowed imperfections and change of Levitical law. — Jesus is surety of a better covenant: appointed by oath that can not be repented of; not mortal and therefore needing successors; not sinful and so needing daily sacrifices: by sacrifice of himself once for all perfected for evermore.

(2) Especially to be emphasised: our High Priest is minister of the TRUE TABERNACLE, of which the tabernacle made by Moses was but a shadow, and so is minister of a better covenant [founded on better promises]. Under the ordinances of the first covenant the High Priest passed with blood once a year through the first tabernacle into the Holy of Holies, the way to the holy place not yet having been made manifest: but Christ, through the more perfect tabernacle 'not made with hands' passed once for all with his own blood into the holy place, making eternal redemption.

(3) His better sacrifice makes him MEDIATOR OF A NEW COVENANT: his death is the dedicatory death of the covenant — his blood is the cleansing for heavenly things, as the blood of bulls and goats was for their copies. — As death comes but once, and then is the judgment, so Christ's death is once for all, and then cometh his salvation. — The old sacrifices by their not ceasing to be offered confessed their imperfection: in Christ is realised the psalmist's vision that takes away 'sacrifices' and establishes a 'coming to do God's will' — here is the 'remission of sins' that accompanied the prophet's 'new covenant'

III

With this High Priest then, and this way he has dedicated for us into the holy place, and with hearts thus sprinkled from an evil conscience, let us hold fast our confession and hope, that it waver not as the day approaches. — To shrink back after receiving knowledge of the truth will bring sorer doom than the violation of Moses' law. — Your former endurance needs to be supplemented by patience: it is 'BY FAITH that the righteous shall live.'

This 'faith' gives substance to future hopes, and dares to put the unseen to the test. — The glorious array of the fathers had witness borne to them that they thus made trial by faith, and yet received not, waiting for us before they could be made perfect.

Therefore with all these accepted witnesses to faith let us gird ourselves to our race, with eyes on our faith's captain. — Endure what is but chastening, that shall bring forth fruits of righteousness. — Strengthen one another — see also that no single poisonous root trouble the many.

Not to the material terrors of Moses' mount have ye come, but to the spiritual glories of Mount Zion and the mediator of the New Covenant: a voice then shook the earth, our promise is the ' Yet once more ' of shaking that brings a kingdom not to be shaken.

IV

General exhortations. — Especially against being swayed by diverse doctrines: they of the tabernacle are no authorities for us, who go with Jesus outside the camp and share his reproach.

Notes to Hebrews

ii. 2. If the word spoken through angels proved stedfast, etc. The connection of angelic mediation with the giving of the law is hinted at in Deuteronomy, chapter xxxiii. 2; but was a widespread idea in New Testament times. Compare Acts, chapter vii. 35; Galatians, chapter iii. 19.

ii. 12, 13: quotations. The first quotation is from Psalms xxii. 22: the writer evidently reads it as a Messianic psalm. The other two are probably representations of Isaiah, chapter viii. 17, 18. The point of the citation is difficult to catch: it appears to be that Isaiah, accepting (in the words, I will put my trust, etc.) his function of being a ' sign ' to Israel, associates with him in this function his own children (the sharers in flesh and blood of the next sentence). So the Son associates himself with flesh and blood in his work of mediation.

iii. 2. As was Moses in all His house: compare Numbers, chapter xii. 7: My servant Moses is not so; he is faithful in all mine house.

vi. 4. As touching those who were once enlightened . . . it is impossible to renew them . . . the while they crucify, etc. This description of a spiritual state, hopeless as long as it lasts, may be compared with similar passages of the gospels: compare note to Matthew xii. 22–50 on page 1695.

vii. 16. Not after the law of a carnal commandment: the context shows that carnal is used in the sense of limited by mortality. So ix. 10, carnal ordinances.

Page 1226: footnote. Here as elsewhere I use the modern device of footnotes to convey parentheses which, as they stand in the text, obscure the argument, and give an impression of awkwardness of style, where there is in reality only difference of page-setting.

ix. 11. Through the greater and more perfect tabernacle not made with hands. Though the text does not explicitly state what point, in the elaborate analogy, is to be understood as antitype to 'tabernacle,' yet the words 'not made with hands' call up the prominent saying of Christ: Destroy this temple . . . and in three days I will raise it up — he spake of the temple of his body. (John, chapter ii. 19.)

ix. 16. For where a covenant is, there must of necessity be the death of him that made it. For a covenant is of force where there hath been death. The text of the R.V. in these two sentences changes the rendering of the word that runs through the whole passage from covenant to testament. As the margin says, the Greek word means both. But the argument requires that the same word be used throughout. Moreover the word testament in this connection introduces an image familiar to the English reader, but of no force to Hebrews, with whom 'testaments' in the sense of 'wills' were scarcely known. On the other hand, the image required by the whole context is one unfamiliar to the English reader, but perfectly intelligible to those to whom the epistle is addressed. The reference is to the sacrifices of animals which were the formal sign of a covenant between parties: the stroke of death being the irrevocable seal set on an agreement from which there can be no departing. An elaborate act of this kind accompanies the establishment of the covenant in Exodus (chapter xxiv): which indeed is kept in view throughout the whole of the remaining argument. — The same notion underlies the words of Christ in the Last Supper: This cup is the new covenant in my blood (I Corinthians, chapter xi. 25; the briefer form is given in St. Matthew: this is my blood of the covenant).

x. 38. But my righteous one shall live by faith: and if he shrink back, etc. The citation is from Habakkuk, chapter ii: but from the Greek version, which has a different sense and reference from the Hebrew version represented in our O.T.

xii. 1. Compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses. There is an ambiguity in the English word witness which does not hold of the original. The cloud is, not of spectators, but of those who have had witness borne to them that they were faithful: so throughout the preceding paragraphs. — The sin which is admired of many: the beautiful phrase of the R.V. and A.V. text: 'sin that doth so easily beset us' is hardly borne out by the Greek. The image is that of keeping on a fine garment though it hinders the running.

xii. 24. The blood of sprinkling that speaketh better than Abel: a reference to Genesis, chapter iv. 10: The voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground. So above: He being dead yet speaketh (xi. 4).

Notes to St. James

This is a miscellany of Wisdom literature: another 'Wisdom Epistle,' but of the simplest kind, is found in the Book of Proverbs (page 937). In Wisdom literature it is natural to look for separate sayings, not a continuous argument. The forms followed by St. James are chiefly two: (1) The Maxim: a gnomic text, with a prose expansion. (The texts in this edition are printed in italics.) Compare above, page 1460. Several of these maxims of this epistle may be termed 'Paradoxes.' — (2) The Essay. For both compare Introduction to Ecclesiasticus, pages 1460, 1461. — Of course the matter of the epistle is a Christianised form of traditional wisdom; and, as an outward mark, my brethren takes the place of the old formula, my son.

i. 12. This is the most elaborate and difficult of the essays of St. James. Its topic is the Sources of the Evil and Good in us. The opening note is temptation, or the struggle of evil and good. Then the origin of the Evil in us is put under the image of childbirth: one parent is the individual himself [or his will, we may say by analogy with the other paragraph], the other his lust: this is not a marriage but a seduction. The thought is carried forward to a second generation: lust, sin, death. — Passing to the origin of Good, the writer again uses the image of birth: the Divine will and the word of truth beget in us an inborn word. Development of good consists in listening for this inborn word (swift to hear), avoiding all that drowns the sound. Especially essential is the acting on this inborn word so far as heard: here the imagery changes to that of a mirror. Practical examples conclude the essay.

ii. 8. If ye fulfil the royal law . . . ye do well: but if ye have respect of persons ye commit sin. The argument appears to be as follows: You take your stand on the letter of the law, 'Thou shalt love,' etc. and refuse to transgress it. But respecting persons is equally a transgression of the law: and to transgress in one point is as bad as to transgress in another. Rather, take your stand on Christian liberty and mercy.

iii. 1. This essay is full of reminiscences of Ecclesiasticus: compare sections commencing v. 9, xix. 4, xxiii. 7, xxviii. 12.

iv. 6. But he giveth more grace. The connection is obscure: perhaps it may be put thus. The spirit of longing envy in you is not of God's planting; but he will give more grace to overcome it in proportion to its strength (compare the suggestion of strength in the expression long unto envying): yet only to the humble. Wherefore, etc.

iv. 11. He that speaketh against a brother . . . speaketh against the law. It is a characteristic of the epistle that it represents Christian liberty, not as a relaxation of law, but as a higher law. He who censoriously interferes with his brother's freedom of action is attacking this supreme law of liberty.

Syllabus to I Peter

I

The epistle starts with a recital of the LIVING HOPE, restored through the resurrection of Jesus to the faithful, while they are being guarded to their final salvation: a theme of joy amid their manifold temptations, an object of search to the ancient prophets, an object of interest to angels.

The true attitude in presence of such a Hope: sober effort — holiness in place of former lusts — fear, alike in regard of the righteous Judge and the price of their redemption — fervent love of the brethren, lower love being purged away by obedience. — As babes born of the incorruptible seed of God's word to grow with spiritual milk unto salvation — as living stones to build up a spiritual house: a priesthood for spiritual sacrifices, an elect race, God's own possession.

II

More particular exhortations to the realisation of this attitude. First of all, by abstinence from fleshly lusts to become a testimony to the Gentiles — to silence outsiders by well-doing in all social relationships — as subjects — as servants (patient even to the froward, since Christ their redeemer was thus patient) — as wives (seeking the inner adornment of a quiet spirit) — as husbands.

To sum up: tenderly united among themselves to meet outside persecution, not by reviling back, but by blessing with the blessings of which they are heirs. — To suffer for well-doing is their calling, as Christ suffered for others' sins. — As Christ was put to death in the flesh [but quickened in the spirit, so as to preach to the disobedient spirits in prison] so let their own sufferings be made a death to the life of lust and a living to the will of God.

III

The end is at hand: let their sobriety, their love, their work, be all quickened. — The fiery trial must not be thought a strange thing by the partakers of Christ's sufferings: it means that judgment is beginning at the house of God. — Let the elder in his oversight and the younger in their subjection humble themselves under the mighty hand of God, waiting for their exaltation in due time.

Notes to I Peter

i. 23. Having been begotten again not of corruptible seed, etc. While retaining the words of the R.V. I have altered the punctuation, so as to take this participial clause with what follows and not with what precedes. [The Greek admits of this.] There is little point in associating the idea of the incorruptible seed, so strongly emphasised, with the fervent love of the brethren. On the other hand, much strength is added to the passage if this incorruptible seed is made the first item in the continued image of babes — spiritual milk . . . grow unto salvation. This participial clause having been interrupted by a parenthesis, including a lengthy quotation, is linked on to another participial clause by a therefore, which repeats the causal relation implied in a participial clause. There is a similar use of then after the long parenthesis at the top of page 1238: forasmuch then as Christ suffered in the flesh.

iii. 10. For, He that would love life, etc. The relevancy of the quotation is to the whole command (to meet persecution with blessing), not to the sentence immediately preceding.

iv. 6. For unto this end was the gospel preached even to the dead: the dead are the spirits in prison of iii. 19: the position of the sentence shows that both the elements here asserted of Christ — put to death in the flesh, and ministering in the spirit to the dead — are pressed into the analogy between Christ and his followers: see Syllabus.

Syllabus to II Peter

The epistle starts from the formula of greeting: Grace be multiplied to the possessors of the promises: a succession of graces, richly supplying an entrance into the eternal kingdom of Jesus Christ.

The life work of the writer is thus to stir up to remembrance of the coming of Christ — since he has been one of the eye witnesses of his majesty — and thus has a confirmation of the word of prophecy. — But just as there were false prophets of old, so now there shall be false teachers — moved by lasciviousness and covetousness — as to their certain doom, God's dealings with the angels, with Noah's world, with Sodom and Lot, are testimonies how God can deliver the godly and keep the unrighteous under punishment unto the day of judgment. — With every horror of defilement and disorder these re-ensnare to corruption those who are escaping: dogs returning to their own vomit.

This second epistle like the first is to stir up to remembrance of words received from prophets and from the Lord through apostles. Mockers will arise, casting doubts on Christ's coming because of the unbroken course of things since the creation — but as the old world by water so the present world shall perish by fire — with the Lord a day and a thousand years are alike: the judgment will come like a thief in the night. — Live in the light of this coming judgment, and account the longsuffering of the Lord as salvation.

Syllabus to Jude

The writer's general purpose to write quickened by the privy entering in of corrupters: his word is, contend for the faith once for all delivered to the saints.

Remember the judgment of the Israelites in the wilderness, of the fallen angels, of Sodom and Gomorrah — of like kind are these corrupters: fleshly and disorderly, things of horror — of these Enoch prophesied destruction — and the Lord Jesus Christ forewarned. — For yourselves: build up yourselves in your most holy faith — and on the erring have mercy, though mercy have to mingle with hate.

Notes to First Epistle of St. John

That which is traditionally known as The First Epistle of St. John is entirely lacking in all epistolary form. Nor have the contents any resemblance to the epistle. Probably the recurrence of such formulæ as brethren, little children, beloved, has led to this document being classified with the literature of address. But such formulæ are merely the Christian counterpart of the my son, or my sons, that runs through O.T. wisdom. The continuity of thought traced by many commentators through this work I find myself wholly unable to follow. I have classified this 'epistle,' like the General Epistle of St. James, under the head of Christian Wisdom. It has the character of meditative address which belongs to O.T. wisdom, of course with the substitution of Christian for Hebrew thought. There is also the form of brief independent fragments, which belongs to wisdom literature; this form not only characterises a large section of the O.T., but I have shown its recurrence in the discourses of Christ [page 1692], and in the prologue of St. John's gospel [page 1701]; while the whole of St. James is of this type. Of the various forms in this fragmentary wisdom literature the sections of St. John's writing resemble less the maxim than the essay.

It may be remarked that the sections of this Wisdom of St. John occasionally show a tendency to connect themselves thus: that the final thought of one essay is the opening thought of the next. [See notes on i. 5 and iii. 4.] This is a characteristic of The Wisdom of Solomon [page 1476].

i. 5. This brief Saying on the topic of God as Light, ends with the phrase cleanseth from sin, which is the topic of the Saying that follows.

ii. 7. This illustrates the Paradox of wisdom literature: so in St. James. [Above, page 1689.] It is the paradox of the Law of Love: this is old, for Jesus sums up the whole Law and Prophets in the two commandments of love; it is new, A new commandment give I unto you that ye love one another. This newness (St. John continues) is true, because the night [of the Law] is passing away, and the true light already shineth for the Christians he addresses; but if any fail to love, he is outside this light.

ii. 20. And ye have an anointing from the Holy One . . . the anointing which ye received of him. The point of these expressions is somewhat obscured in the translation; anointing (or chrisma) is of the same root as Christ, and accordingly of anti-christ, the topic of this Saying.

iii. 4. Everyone that doeth sin doeth also lawlessness. The connection of these words with the rest of the Saying seems to be this. Sin is the usual Christian term for what the word implies; lawlessness is a word that would appeal to those leaning to the old dispensation. St. John identifies the two as a mode of emphasising the point of the whole Saying, that doing righteousness is the sole criterion of sonship: those who do evil have no hope from law or gospel. — This Saying ends with the 'love of the brethren,' which is the topic of the next.

Epilogue. The structure of this Epilogue is obvious: three confessions are made of fundamental points of faith; such faith presents the true God, all else deceives with idols, false semblances of Deity.

Notes to St. Matthew

For the spirit and structure of the book as a whole see Introduction, page 1501.

The Genealogy

There is in this genealogy a superficial discrepancy in the fact that the details do not seem to bear out the fourteen generations claimed for each of the three divisions. This, however, can be explained without the assumption (sometimes made) that David and Jechoniah are counted twice over. (1) Abraham and Jesus, the starting-point and the conclusion, are both counted in: this is the 'inclusive manner of reckoning,' by which the Hebrews would call the period from Friday afternoon to Sunday morning three days. This at once brings the first division to the requisite number fourteen, and the third division to thirteen. (2) It is obvious that generation in the strict sense can be carried no further than Joseph. Between him and Jesus the mother Mary is interposed: when she is reckoned as one the number fourteen is completed.

I, II

i. 23. Behold the virgin shall be with child, etc. — ii. 15. Out of Egypt did I call my son. — iv. 15. The land of Zebulun, etc.: compare Isaiah, chapter vii. 14 and ix. 1; Hosea, xi. 1. New Testament writers, and especially Matthew, seem often to cite sentences of the O.T. apart from their historical context, as seeing a mystic significance in the very phrases of Scripture. For the first citation, and the name Immanuel, compare pages 1568–70; for the third, pages 480 and 1569.

ii. 23. He shall be called a Nazarene: the reference has not been identified. Some suppose Nazarene to be a term of reproach (compare, " Out of Galilee ariseth no prophet "), and that the reference is to such a passage as Isaiah, chapter liii. 1, 2.

III

After a few sentences describing the opening of Christ's ministry, this section is wholly occupied with the collection of sayings which has come to be known as 'The Sermon on the Mount.' The general suggestion is that it is a collection from several discourses, many of them delivered very likely from a hill slope, as a favourite mode of public speaking, and drawn together into their present arrangement by the evangelist as a full type of the teaching of Jesus in the early part of his ministry. The sayings are sayings of Jesus; the arrangement is that of St. Matthew. This explains the occurrence in St. Luke's gospel of a collection of sayings having so much in common with the present collection as to suggest identity; yet much briefer, different in form, and associated with different surroundings. Both writers are giving specimens or résumés of the general teaching that characterised an epoch in Christ's life.

The arrangement adopted by St. Matthew is that of a literary form very common in Wisdom literature. It may be called the 'Maxim' [compare page 1460]: and consists of a gnomic sentence by way of text, followed by a prose comment or expansion. These 'maxims' form a characteristic part of Ecclesiasticus and Ecclesiastes, with the former of which Jesus shows familiarity [see page 1468]: it continues a form of writing to the time of the Epistle of St. James [above, page 1689]. But that the word has lost its proper significance to modern ears, the discourse might be appropriately entitled, 'The Wisdom of Jesus.' The whole discourse in St. Matthew's arrangement falls into seven sections: six are expansions each of a single gnomic saying, expressive of some fundamental conception of the new kingdom. The seventh section is miscellaneous: strings of disconnected sayings following more connected argument are a highly characteristic feature of Wisdom literature [compare in Ecclesiastes pages 1014, 1017]. The number of sayings in this seventh section are seven, and the opening section has a sevenfold expansion of its text: this domination of Matthew's writings by the number seven has been noted in the Introduction.

i. In accordance with the general scheme of the whole discourse, this first section must be read, not as a string of eight beatitudes, but as a single beatitude with a sevenfold expansion. The beatitude brings forward a leading conception of Christ's new kingdom:

the way in which it is to reverse accepted ideas of what is greatness. Thus the significance of the term poor in spirit must be looked for in the seven applications into which it is expanded:

mourning — in contrast with gaiety: compare such passages as Ecclesiastes, chapter vii. 2.
the meek — in contrast with the territorial magnate: just the contrast emphasised in Job, chapter xxii. 6–9.
they that hunger and thirst after righteousness: the sense of higher spiritual attainments to be sought — in contrast with Pharisaic satisfaction with external righteousness: the contrast of the publican and the Pharisee.
the merciful — in contrast with the oppressive.
the pure in heart — in contrast with the worldly: the thought of Psalms xxiv and xv. As these psalms describe such purity as preparation for God's house, the conclusion here is natural, they shall see God.
the peacemaker — in contrast with the warrior.
finally, with full details bearing upon those addressed: the persecuted — in contrast with his persecutor.

ii. The significance is clear: Salt is not food, but that which is used to keep food wholesome; if the church is ceasing to influence the world its very raison d'être is gone.

iii. Ye are the light of the world. Of this gnomic saying a twofold application is made: (1) As you are the world's spiritual leaders, no action of yours can escape observation. — (2) It is the function of light to shine: unless you make goodness attractive to outsiders you are failing in your mission.

iv. The new kingdom is not a relaxation of the law, but a carrying of it on to its perfection. — Agree with thine adversary . . . thou shalt by no means come out, etc. This whole passage is not a fresh command, but an illustration. The theme has been anger, and its rising stages of intensity. This is illustrated by the successive stages of legal process: subdue anger in the early stage, and so escape the bitter end.

v. The text is the heavenly and not the earthward reference of all spiritual acts. — Our Father which art in heaven, etc. The structure of this first part of the Lord's Prayer is important for the exact sense. As ordinarily printed the passage is made a series of separate petitions: Hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done as in heaven so on earth. By this arrangement the words as in heaven, etc., are made to apply only to the last petition, Thy will be done. I have printed the whole as an 'envelope figure,' which connects the beginning and the end with all that comes between; thus the full sense implied is, Hallowed be thy name, as in heaven, so on earth — Thy kingdom come, as in heaven, so on earth — Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on earth.

vi. The lamp of the body is the eye. That which we 'have an eye to' is what gives the light of purpose to all our actions; if the very light-making part of us be darkness, what must be the gloom of the rest of us (the darkness).

vii. As remarked above, this section is made up of seven miscellaneous sayings. — In vii. 6 parallelism of structure is an important light upon exact meaning. As printed in the text it will be observed that the first and fourth lines have common indentation, and again the second and third: thus the sense is:

Give not that which is holy unto the dogs,
Neither cast your pearls before the swine:
Lest haply they [the swine] trample them under their feet,
And [the dogs] turn and rend you.

Throw a bone, if you want to propitiate a dog: if you throw him something sacred, he will smell at it a moment and then be at you. So, cast pearls to swine and they will trample them without deigning to notice. The application in both cases is to want of spiritual appreciation: spiritual things must be spiritually discerned.

IV

In this, as in all sections, we have general incidents of teaching and healing: and especially, works of power. The distinctiveness of section IV is however clear. (1) It contains the First Impressions made by the ministry of Jesus: especially the teaching with authority, which made so startling a contrast to all that was then in vogue. — (2) With this we have the Gathering of Disciples: the incident of the scribe, in view of the future hostility of this class, suggests the eagerness with which the call was being responded to. — (3) There are also Hints of the Antagonism that was about to manifest itself: the words to the centurion suggest how the Gentiles were about to welcome what the children of the kingdom would reject; then, a whole city is offended; then we have questionings as to forgiveness of sins, eating in company with outcasts, abstinence from fasting. The section reaches an appropriate conclusion in an incident which rouses the multitude to enthusiasm, and calls from Pharisees mutterings of the thought which was hereafter to be their great blasphemy.

viii. 4. See thou tell no man; but . . . shew thyself to the priest, etc. The latter part of the command illustrates the care with which Jesus avoids a conflict with the existing ecclesiastical system, so far as this is innocent: compare (xxiii. 2) The scribes and the Pharisees sit on Moses' seat: all things therefore whatsoever they bid you, do and observe. It is part of his fixed purpose to extend his kingdom to the Gentiles through the chosen people, if they will accept the duty; and this explains the words to the Canaanite woman (xv. 24), and the charge to the Apostles (x. 5), as well as the Ascension charge which is the basis of the Acts of the Apostles. The former part of the command [compare below (ix. 30), sternly charged them] reflects the fixed purpose of Jesus to avoid unsettling men's minds by appeals to wonder and excitement, which leads Matthew (xii. 19) to apply to him the Isaiahan prophecy, He shall not strive nor cry. His appeal is to spiritual evidence: hence [Mark i. 25; iii. 12] he checks the acknowledgments from demons, and [Matthew xii. 39] indignantly refuses the demand for a sign from heaven. When [as recorded by St. John, chapter xiv. 11] he says to the doubting disciples, Or else believe me for the very works' sake, he is descending to meet the adversaries on their own ground. — In the same spirit he commands [xvii. 9] the disciples to tell no man the wonder of the transfiguration until the time of his resurrection: he will not have the revelation of his glory stand apart from the revelation of his sufferings.

viii. 20. The foxes have holes, etc. . . . leave the dead to bury their own dead. The purport of both incidents seems to be the same: the eagerness at this period in responding to the new call needs to be so far checked as that aspirants are bidden to count the cost.

The Commission to the Apostles, which is the subject of this section, is an excellent illustration of the principle underlying the whole of St. Matthew's writing, how he gathers from various parts of Christ's life sayings which he masses together at the point where they will be most effective. The Commission in the other gospels is brief. But Mark [chapters iii. 14 and vi. 7] seems to speak of more than one expedition of the twelve; Luke records this and also a similar expedition of seventy: the suggestion is that Christ sent out many such expeditions. Significant portions of the charge appear in the other gospels in connection with the expeditions: Matthew once for all gives a full and elaborate commission. It has the sevenfold division which is his strong characteristic:

1. Limitation to Israel.
2. The two works of preaching and healing.
3. It is not a hired ministry.
4. On the other hand, it is not to be at the cost of the missionary: simple hospitality is to be accepted.
5. Attitude to the inevitable opposition.
6. Great doctrine of the kingdom: outwardly a kingdom of peace it brings spiritual warfare into every household.
7. For those accepting the word reward is certain, but it is spiritual [a prophet's reward].

x. 26. For there is nothing covered that shall not be revealed, etc. The general connection makes these words, not a promise to the apostles, but a restatement of their duty. They are fearlessly to exercise their function of being the light of the world; for the special privileges [compare the whole of section VII and its indication of an inner circle and doctrine] which have been accorded them have been given on the express condition that they shall impart to others what has been spoken to them in the privacy of the circle of disciples That this is the connection of thought is clear from the fact that in Mark (chapter iv. 22) the words There is nothing covered, etc. directly follow the image of the lamp or candle, significant of the function of the disciples to make their doctrine known. [Compare Luke, chapter xii. 2–3.] This cannot be affected by the fact that in Luke (chapter xii. 2) the proverbial saying, There is nothing covered, etc., is put in antithesis to the hypocrisy of the Pharisees.

VI

I have entitled this section 'The Growing Isolation of Jesus and his Ministry.' Successive sections bring out his reluctant separation from the ministry of John, greatest of ministers, yet still outside the kingdom of heaven — his separation from the might and wisdom of the cities: he thankfully turns to the meek and lowly — his separation from the Pharisaic doctrine of the Sabbath, most distinctive of Jewish institutions — open antagonism to the now open blasphemy of the Pharisees, and the appeal of other scribes and Pharisees for physical and not spiritual wonders. — As a climax to this section, Matthew records here a sense of separation even from mother and brethren in response to the call of his divine mission.

xi. 3. Art thou he that cometh, etc. The suggestion is an impatience on the part of John the Baptist for some grand assertion of Messiahship; the reports of Jesus were not the works of the Christ which he was expecting. The answer of Jesus is, as always, an appeal to spiritual evidence: healing and good tidings, not wonders. The final words bid John not make an offence of this confinement of miracle to works of mercy.
In the discourse that follows Jesus does enthusiastic justice to the grandeur of John, yet recognises his ministry as below the kingdom of heaven. — The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence . . . all the prophets and the law prophesied until John: the period of passive acquiescence in a law and external righteousness gives place, with John, to a period when righteousness must be active, nay, a violent pressing in to the kingdom. This is the general spirit of the fourth maxim of the Sermon on the Mount.

xi. 16. It is like unto children. . . . And wisdom is justified by her children. The image is of children's games: they cannot agree among themselves whether to play funeral or wedding, and the sport is spoiled. Meanwhile, both in John's ministry and Christ's, those who are children of Wisdom recognise the truth [compare the use of justified in Luke (chapter vii. 29): the people . . . justified God, gave their verdict on his side, in contrast with the Pharisees and lawyers, who rejected the counsel of God].

xi. 27. All things have been delivered unto me of my Father. The connection of thought seems to be this: he has just recognised his rejection by the great; by the authority committed to him from the Father he solemnly turns from the strong to the humble: Come unto me, all ye that labour, etc.

xii. 22–50. The internal connection of this important section, though not obvious, must be insisted upon. (1) The incident of the mother and brethren is linked to that of the Pharisaic blasphemy in Mark (iii. 20–34), and even in Matthew the phrase, While he was yet speaking, etc., is a link. (2) In Luke (chapter xi) the whole discussion of the 'sign' is closely bound up with the incident of the blasphemy. (3) In the present case the latter part of Christ's answer to the demand for a sign (see below) seems to sum up by parable the position of both objectors. The incident is opened by the bold words of some Pharisees, ascribing to demonic agency Christ's casting out of demons. After calmly exposing the self-contradiction of the suggestion, Jesus, with gathering indignation, goes on to denounce this as worse than antagonism to himself, being nothing less than blasphemy against the Divine Spirit of Healing, which is to Jesus the highest spiritual evidence. — It shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, nor in that which is to come: these words are not a threat, but picture the hopeless state of such blasphemers [compare (Mark, iii. 29): is guilty of an eternal sin]; antagonism to the spirit of healing is manifestly unhealable. — Either make the tree good, etc. . . . every idle word that men shall speak, etc.: the argument continues: such blasphemy implies an inward unsoundness deeper than their words [possibly idle words suggests a violent thing said in the heat of controversy]; though even their words will be an element in the judgment

Another body of the opponents interrupt, clamouring for a ' sign ' [Luke in a similar passage on the same incident has a sign from heaven, i.e. beyond the power of magic]. Originally, the ' sign of the prophet ' was the symbol or emblem which constituted the text of his discourse, such as the soiled girdle of Jeremiah, or the potter's bottle which he broke in token of the coming doom of the chosen people. But as some of these signs came miraculously (e.g. in Amos's visions), there grew in time a greater interest in the miraculous sign than in the spiritual truth of which it was the vehicle. Such decadence in the attitude to prophecy is precisely what Jesus sets himself steadily to oppose — the mere wonder at miraculous power taking the place of recognition of the spiritual grace of healing; he sets himself to suppress the natural fame of his healing wonders. Accordingly the demand at this point for a ' sign ' is a less pronounced form of the previous blasphemy; it is a rejection of the supreme spiritual evidence implied in healing powers, and a preference for the vulgar exercise of mere physical power. It is treated accordingly as an evidence of spiritual degeneration [an evil and adulterous generation]: and for a ' sign ' Jesus goes back to the true meaning of the term and offers the ' sign of Jonah ': the great symbol of preaching and repentance. To this is added the Queen of Sheba, great symbol of sitting at the feet of Wisdom. Addressing both bodies of objectors at once, Jesus then speaks the parable which has application to the evil at the root of both — the rejection of the supreme spirit of healing: the inherently unclean spirit, returning to his cleansed home, makes it the home of yet greater uncleanness.

Page 1264: footnote. Here, as elsewhere in this series of books, I have made use of the modern device of footnotes to separate sentences which, from the absence of such devices in ancient manuscripts, sometimes make awkward parentheses and interrupt the drift of thought. I understand the words, For as Jonah was three days and three nights in the belly of the whale, etc., to be a reflection of St. Matthew, and not part of the discourse of Jesus. (1) The ' sign of Jonah ' occurs three times [Matthew, chapter xvi. 4; Luke, chapter xi. 29–33]: only in this passage is there any reference to the incident of the whale. In all three passages the natural meaning of the 'sign of Jonah ' is that he is a sign of repentance to the Ninevites: this is put positively, and twice over, in the passage of Luke; while the strongly rhetorical cast, both of the present passage and that in Luke, makes the intrusion of a different image most unlikely. — (2) Again, a reference to the death and resurrection of Christ at this point is entirely out of keeping with the fixed order of narrative in the synoptic gospels, according to which no suggestion of the death of the Master appears until the complete recognition of him in his Messiahship by Peter and the disciples, from which point it dominates the whole narrative [compare Matthew xvi. 21): From that time began Jesus to shew unto his disciples, etc.]. References recorded by St. John in incidents usually understood to be earlier cannot affect the question: they belong to Judæa and individual conversations; this reference to the period of Christ's lying in the tomb would be unintelligible to the persons here addressed. — (3) On the other hand, the words contain precisely the kind of reflection on minute fulfilment of prophecy which is a leading characteristic of St. Matthew; and the utterance, pointless in the speech of Jesus, is a natural reflection for one who writes after the resurrection. — (4) No difficulty arises from the tense, so shall the Son of man be: the writer naturally puts himself at the point of view of the incident that raises his reflection. There is a very similar case in connection with the dream of Joseph (i. 22): after the words of the angel " Thou shalt call his name ' Jesus.' " etc., we read, " Now all this is come to pass that it might be fulfilled which was spoken," etc., — as if this recognition of prophecy was part of the dream. Yet I presume no one would so interpret it: not a trace of it is found in the announcement of the angel to Mary, as recorded in Luke.

All three evangelists treat the matter of this section in such a way as to suggest that it makes an epoch in the ministry of Jesus. Parables of course occur at other points: but here the Public Parable and the Private Interpretation becomes for a time a distinctive mode of teaching, suggestive of an outer and inner doctrine for the new dispensation. The suggestion is further assisted by the phrase, Unto you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven: ' mysteries ' is a technical term of ancient religions, implying the two elements of mystic symbols for the outside world, and the full understanding of them only for ' the initiated.' To the same effect is the suggestion of the concluding words that the inner circle of disciples are the 'scribes' of the new dispensation. We have seen above (note to x. 26) the warning that such special privileges are granted them only that they may be used for the public hereafter. The arrangement of the section is clear. According to his usual practice, Matthew represents the general parabolic teaching of Jesus by seven parables. There is an interruption after the first, and the whole plan of public parable and private interpretation is explained, while the foundation parable of the Sower is interpreted. Later on there is another interruption, as if further to illustrate the plan of teaching: for it will be observed that the parable then interpreted is not the one last delivered. At the end there is a formal conclusion, as if by a completed course of training the disciples are recognised as fully instructed 'scribes.'

xiii. 52. A man that is a householder . . . things new and old. The words merely imply that they are well furnished for their teaching. Possibly the latter phrase suggests ever new interpretations of old sayings.

VIII

This section is occupied with (1) the Greater Miracles. They are greater in the sense of being more impressive and wide-reaching in their effects. The feeding of multitudes directly associates itself with the pressure of crowds upon the ministry of Jesus, which is a link of connection throughout this part of the narrative; and to the wider fame may be due the deputation from Jerusalem. Again, the miracle on the sea draws from the disciples who alone witness it the anticipation of that full recognition which is the basis of section IX. — (2) The Growing Antagonism. His own country takes offence at Jesus; the deputation from Jerusalem leads to his open renunciation of the Tradition of the Elders which was the distinctive religion of the age.

A starting-point is the announcement of John's execution. From the tender affection he cherishes for his precursor Jesus feels this as a personal bereavement, and seeks retirement: the multitudes press upon his privacy and follow him to the desert, which leads to the miracle of feeding; seeking retirement in the night he is separated from the disciples, and his rejoining them brings the miracle on the sea; upon the arrival at the land there is fresh crowding, and so we reach the deputation from Jerusalem.

The Tradition of the Elders was the organised form finally taken by the long-continued idolatry of the very letter of the Mosaic Law. It was not enough to abstain from actual breaches of this Law: a 'hedge about the Law' had been made, in the form of traditional practices designed to avoid even doubtful acts. In process of time these minute traditions had, in the thoughts of the religious world, taken the place of the Law itself. Jesus is for ever appealing from the outward letter to the inner spirit: and in the present incident openly pronounces against the whole traditional system. How great a shock this was to the religious spirit of the time is measured by the difficulty with which even the disciples receive the appeal to inner as against outer purity.

xv. 21. Jesus, still in search of quiet, retires to the region of Canaanite cities outside the range he has prescribed for his personal ministry [compare above, note to viii. 4]. He allows himself to be spiritually forced by the faith of the Canaanite woman.

xv. 29. On his return, Jesus, still in search of quiet, is in the desert parts of Galilee, and is again oppressed by the widespread influence of the miracle of feeding; again he exercises his ministry, and a second time works a miracle of feeding. This leads to a fresh deputation of rulers, and another demand for a 'sign,' which is answered as before (above, note to xii. 22). The miracle and the discussion are both involved in the subsequent discourse on 'leaven.'

IX

The turning-point in Matthew's narrative of the Ministry of Jesus is made by the Confession of Peter, and full recognition of the Messiahship by the band of disciples, followed immediately by the visible glory of the Transfiguration. This leads to the revelation by Jesus of his sufferings and death, reserved till after this recognition: the union of the two ideas of kingship and suffering makes the whole 'mystery' of the kingdom into which the disciples are to be initiated. Their intense difficulty in understanding the union of these ideas leads to a series of Questions concerning the kingdom, and with these the whole section is occupied. Its natural divisions are divisions of locality. — (1) The Confession takes place in the parts of Cæsarea Philippi: in this neighbourhood arises the first of the questionings, as to the coming of Elijah. — (2) In Galilee there is fresh inculcation of the doctrine of the suffering Messiah. An external circumstance (the demand for toll) brings up the whole question, wherein consists greatness in the kingdom of heaven; and out of the discussion of this arises a kindred question of sin and its treatment under the new dispensation. — (3) The scene has changed to the borders of Judæa beyond Jordan. Here two external incidents give rise to two discussions: questions of marriage, and again of mammon, are raised in relation to the kingdom of heaven. — (4) In the going up to Jerusalem the nearer expectation of the kingdom leads, through a demand of the sons of Zebedee, to a new aspect of Christ's kingdom: lordship in it is service.

xvi. 18. Thou art 'Peter,' and upon this 'rock,' etc.: in the original the two words have a resemblance of sense and sound: Petros and Petra.

xvii. 22–xviii. The link binding together the parts of this subsection is found in the idea of 'offence': lest we cause them to stumble, go thou to the sea, etc. Payment of toll seems incongruous with the newly recognised kingship: Jesus admits it, yet pays, to avoid offence. This not unnaturally raises the question of greatness in this novel kingdom [compare, "Who then is greatest," etc.]. Christ's answer is the object-lesson of the child, and the care to avoid giving offence even to the least: to avoid giving offence to these his disciples must forego what is most positively their own — the hand, the foot, the eye — caring more even for the stray sheep than the ninety-nine at home. The transition is to offences against one's self, and actual sins: these are to be encountered, not by power, but by the reference to the spirit of the new society [tell it unto the church]; if even this fails, there is no more of violence than that the offender is to be held as outside the society [let him be unto thee as the Gentile and the publican]. The connection of the words that follow [What things soever ye shall bind on earth, etc.] is that this society and its relations to its members is pronounced the only power for dealing with offences that Christ will recognise in his kingdom. — A further question of Peter, as to how far this treatment is to be carried, leads to the declaration that it is unlimited: this is emphasised by the parable which brings out that all differences of offences as between man and man vanish in the vast gulf between sinful man and the forgiving God.

xviii. 22. I say not unto thee, Until seven times; but, Until Seventy times and seven. I have preferred the marginal reading of the R.V. here, because it preserves the echo of Lamech's Song of the Sword [Genesis iv. 24]:

If Cain shall be avenged sevenfold,
Truly Lamech seventy and sevenfold.

The law of Christian forgiveness is made commensurate with the traditional song of revenge.

xix. 3. The question raised of Divorce comes from the outside; its importance for the spirit of this part of the narrative consists in the further question raised by Christ's ruling in the mind of the disciples: If this be so, what is the good of marriage? The reply is, Even this may have to be given up for the kingdom's sake. — In the second discussion (on mammon) the connection of thought seems to be as follows. Mammon is opposed to the spirituality of the kingdom. When with difficulty this has been accepted the disciples ask, What then shall be our reward who are giving up everything? The answer is, Reward they shall have indeed, but not measured on any economic scale of graduation: the first may be last and the last first. This is enforced by the Parable of the Hired Labourers.

The order of narrative is clear and simple: the Royal Entry into Jerusalem, the successive conflicts with various classes of opponents, and the final breach with the rulers of the religious world. From this point Christ retires from public ministry, and the narrative follows his discourses to his disciples.

xxi. 19. Incident of the Fig Tree. The suggestiveness of this incident must be gathered from the position in the narrative in which it is found. The fig tree catches the eye of Jesus as he is approaching Jerusalem in this period of his final breach with the holy city and the religious rebellion it represents. It must be remembered that the barren fig tree had already been the subject of a parable [Luke, chapter xiii. 6] by which, at a time when the antagonism of the Jews had not yet reached its crisis, Jesus expressed long patience and a time of respite: there should be yet a year for digging and manuring, if perchance even yet the barren might bear fruit. Now that Jesus is on his way to the final casting off of the guilty city his eye is caught by the tree with its fair show of leaves and no fruit; he is reminded of his own parable, and solemnly pronounces that the offered respite is at an end: Let there be no fruit from thee henceforward for ever. But this natural significance of the incident is veiled by the perversity of the disciples, who, sharing the universal tendency to fix on the physical miracle and not the spiritual truth, are struck by the marvel of the fig tree's actually withering away. Jesus takes the opportunity for enforcing a lesson of faith and its power to work wonders.

xxiii. Here St. Matthew, according to his custom, gathers into one carefully arranged discourse the succession of sayings of Jesus in which he expresses his final denunciation of the scribes and Pharisees. Its structure shows (1) a general introduction, (2) a sevenfold woe, modelled by St. Matthew upon the Sevenfold Woe of Isaiah [page 476], and (3) a conclusion expressing the yearning over the fate of the doomed city.

xxiii. 34–5. "Therefore, behold I send unto you, etc." The words in quotation marks I understand to be words of God, not of Jesus. In rhetorical vehemence he unifies the whole hostility of the Pharisaic spirit, past as well as present and future, in one continuous opposition to God's will.

XI

This discourse appears in all three gospels in closely similar sections, except that Matthew, according to his custom, expands it to a sevenfold division. [Compare above, note to Section V.] The question of the disciples puts together thy coming and the end of the world, as if they constituted the same thing. It is a leading point of Christ's answer to separate the two, and this is a key to the sections of the discourse. — (1) He shows that every tribulation is not the end: they must beware of the cries of Christ's coming which these tribulations may give rise to. — (2) He then deals with the tribulation of Judæa: [this is so far the 'coming of Christ' that it is the fall of the power that has opposed him:] but the lightninglike coming of the Son of man in the true sense is different. — (3) After that tribulation will suddenly [note: immediately, after: not, immediately after: compare corresponding passages of Mark and Luke] be a greater tribulation: a shaking of the heavens, and the Son of man shall be seen coming in glory. — (4) The one tribulation can be told by signs, as are read the signs of coming spring in the fig tree: the other will come by surprise, and none but the Father knows when. — (5) The moral is watchfulness, and this is enforced by the Parable of the Ten Virgins. — (6) With watchfulness is combined work: Parable of the Talents. — (7) As a final section St. Matthew records the description of the last judgment.

XII

The narrative in this final section of St. Matthew is transparently simple and the divisions obvious: The preparations for the end — the Last Supper — the scenes on Olivet — the preliminary Examination before Caiaphas — the Trial before Pilate — the Crucifixion — the Burial — the Resurrection and Ascension.

xxvi. 1–16. The link binding together the three paragraphs of this subsection is the circumstance, recorded by St. John, that the speaker of the words, To what purpose is this waste, etc., was Judas.

xxvi. 28. This is my blood of the covenant, etc.: see above, note to Hebrews ix. 16.

xxvii. 9. That which was spoken by Jeremiah the prophet: the passage apparently referred to is found in our Book of Zechariah, chapter xi. 13. Similarly in Mark i. 2 a passage is cited as from 'Isaiah' of which the first portion is from our Book of Malachi, chapter iii. 1, the latter from our Book of Isaiah, chapter xl. 3. Just as the name 'David' stands for the psalms in general, and 'Solomon' for all wisdom literature, so the whole roll of prophecy may be cited by the names of the two most prominent prophets. There are traces of different rolls of the prophets commencing severally with Isaiah and Jeremiah. But the naturalness of this is increased if, as there is reason to suppose, the latter part of our Zechariah, and Malachi, were originally anonymous books of prophecy. See page 1414.

Notes to St. Mark

As already stated in the Introduction (see page 1505) the gospel of St. Mark takes the literary form of independent sections, narrating successive incidents, rather than that of a regularly arranged history.

i. 2. As it is written in Isaiah the prophet: see above, note to Matthew xxvii. 9.

i. 14. This section seems to be giving a general picture of the ministry of Jesus, with illustrative particulars. Most of it is a specimen day of work in Capernaum.

i. 40. A note of this section, and of a good deal of St. Mark's gospel, is the suggestion of the crowding upon Jesus, produced by the fame of his miracles.

i. 44. See thou say nothing to any man: see above, note to Matthew viii. 4.

ii. 13. The two incidents of this section are connected together by the three evangelists, but Mark preserves the link between them: that the feast in Matthew's house took place while John's disciples and the Pharisees were observing a fast.

iii. 7. While this section is a general picture, yet it serves to link the thronging of the multitudes, which is so much insisted on by St. Mark, with the selection of an inner circle of disciples.

iii. 20. It is characteristic of Mark to preserve visible links between incidents which elsewhere stand side by side. (Compare note to Matthew xii. 22–50.) Jesus goes into a house to eat bread, possibly for the purpose of meeting the deputation of scribes from Jerusalem. The pressure of the crowd disturbs the meal: this brings the brethren of Jesus to the rescue, and draws out the blasphemy of the scribes. At the end of Jesus's rebuke his brethren are still unable to get admittance through the crowd.

iii. 29. Is guilty of an eternal sin: see above, note to Matthew xii. 22–50.

iv. 1. A threefold division of this section would bring out its analogy with the corresponding section of Matthew (VII: see notes to that section). All the three evangelists make an epoch in Christ's ministry by this division between the outer multitude and the inner circle of disciples, and the addressing to each a different type of teaching. The first and third divisions of this section of Mark give examples of the public parables. There is the Parable of the Sower, which inaugurates this mode of teaching; the Parable of the Mustard Seed; and a third, peculiar to Mark, which suggests how the seed once planted must be left to work its own effects, the husbandman being unable to hurry its growth, or to interfere in any way until the harvest. Between (verses 10–25) comes the address to the inner circle of disciples, explaining the principle of the separation, and illustrating by the interpretation of the main parable. To this St. Mark adds teachings bringing out that these special instructions to the inner circle are only given them in order that they may pass them on to those outside. Here Mark introduces the image of the lamp — they are to be the light of the world — and the principle With what measure ye mete, etc., which Matthew embodies in the general discourse, or 'Sermon on the Mount.'

iv. 35. The unity of this section is easily recognised: incidents on either side of the lake in the same journey to and fro.

vi. 6. The connection of matter in this section seems to be as follows. The enlarged area of action made by the journeys of the apostles brings the fame of the new movement to the ears of Herod: the mention of this name leads to the story of the execution of John the Baptist. The return of the apostles is made an occasion for seeking rest: but the thronging of the multitudes into the desert prevents this, and leads to the miracle of feeding. Then Jesus seeks rest by night, and on his return to the disciples occurs the miracle on the sea. On his arrival on the other side there is fresh pressure of the multitude, and so we pass to the next section. In St. Matthew (xiv. 13) it is the news of the Baptist's death, brought home by the apostles on their return, that is made the motive for seeking rest.

vi. 10. Wheresoever ye enter into a house, etc. We have here the substance rather than the full text of the commission. Compare above, note to Matthew V.

vii. 5. The Tradition of the Elders: see above, page 1697.

Page 1293, footnote. I have here, as elsewhere, used the modern form of a footnote to convey a parenthesis: the absence of this device from ancient MSS. gives often an appearance of awkwardness to style where there is none. (Compare page 1532.)

vii. 24. For the incident itself compare note to Matthew viii. 4, page 1694.

vii. 31, viii. 22. Both sections illustrate Mark's power of vivid details.

viii. 30, ix. 30. Jesus seems to be unwilling that the recognition of the Messiahship shall stand alone, without the recognition of the Messiah's sufferings. It is part of his wider purpose to restrain the appeal to mere wonder working. Compare above, note to Matthew viii. 4.

ix. 30. A comparison of this section with Matthew xvii. 22–xviii is interesting. Matthew presents a series of important teachings, the link between which is the idea of 'offences,' the whole arising out of an incident he preserves in which Jesus paid tribute to avoid giving offence. Mark, who omits that circumstance, interrupts the series of discourses by another incident, that of the man casting out devils in Christ's name but not following Christ. Possibly the series of teachings may have been linked together by the object lesson of a little child in the midst: Mark has preserved this visible link, Matthew the logical connection.

ix. 49. For every one shall be salted with fire . . . have salt in yourselves, and be at peace one with another. — Compare Matthew v. 13: Ye are the salt of the earth. The connection of thought is not difficult: Ye are the purifying force of the world: this purifying force must be maintained at all costs, even at the cost of the purifying fire of suffering [viz. the sacrifices of which he has just spoken]: thus he bids them cast off for this purpose even their natural ambition and rivalry [be at peace one with another]. Fire is appropriately used for the supreme purifying power: compare Matthew, iii. 11, where it is contrasted with the weaker purifying power of water. John baptizes with water, but his mightier successor with fire.

x. 31. But many that are first shall be last, etc. The connection of this with what precedes is best seen in the fuller report of Matthew: see note to Matthew xix. 3.

xi. 12. For the Incident of the Fig tree compare note to Matthew xxi. 19.

xii. 32. And the scribe said unto him, Of a truth, Master, thou hast well said, etc. The difference of the two incidents as related here and in St. Matthew (xxii. 35) is characteristic of the two writers. Mark gives the visible picture of a particular incident seen by an eyewitness; Matthew is collecting a series of questions solved by Jesus, and the difference in personal character between this scribe and the other questioners does not concern him.

xiii. 1. See note to Matthew XI.

xiv. 1. See note to Matthew xxvi. 1–16.

xiv. 24. This is my blood of the covenant, etc.: see above, note to Hebrews ix. 16.

xiv. 51. And a certain young man followed with him, etc. Probably the explanation of this otherwise isolated circumstance is that it is one of the graphic details of which this gospel is full. A sleeper roused in the night follows to see what the disturbance is: the rough soldiers lay hold of his extemporised garment, and he flees naked. Another example of the mixture of curiosity and panic which was manifested by Peter on that night.

Appendix. Both the external evidence of MSS. and ancient authorities, and the internal evidence from the sentences themselves, concur in suggesting that this is not the final section of the gospel, but an appendix added subsequently because the conclusion was abrupt. In style it appears, not a narrative, but a compendium of the appearances of Jesus after his resurrection: one of these appearances being the very incident which was related in the previous section.

Notes to St. John's Gospel

Prologue

This prologue is the formal elaboration of a thesis which the body of the gospel is to support by selections from the actions and sayings of Jesus. The form it assumes to the eye in the present edition is that of Text and Comment: condensed gnomic sayings for texts, making a progression, with freer sentences expanding and supporting: substantially the same form which underlies the brief Maxim [page 1460], the lengthy Discourses of Wisdom [page 1476], and some of the Discourses of Jesus as reported by St. Matthew [see 1692].

In appreciating the full force of this prologue, it is well first to read the gnomic texts by themselves, in order to catch the progression to the third, which is the immediate theme of the gospel.

In the beginning was the Word:
And the Word was with God:
And the Word was God.

2

And the Word became flesh,
And dwelt among us,
Full of grace and truth.

3

No man hath seen God at any time:
The only begotten Son which is in the bosom of the Father,
He hath declared him.

1. What modern thought would naturally express by the abstract idea of 'revelation,' ancient thought expresses by a concrete term 'word.' In the present case the 'revelation' to be expressed is more than abstract; the very point of this first gnomic saying is to convey that the Revelation is no less Divine than that which is revealed. Of course, The Word is not a figure of speech invented by our author for this occasion, but is an accepted term for such concrete conception of revelation as is here to be presented in its supreme form.

The comment on this first saying expands the thought of Divine Word or Revelation: how it goes back to preëxistent Deity, how it is the medium of all creation, the medium of life, and the medium of the light which is the life of the spiritual world.

2. The next step in the progression is the idea of a Revelation (or Word) incarnate: making a new dispensation distinguished by grace and truth, as the old dispensation was identified with law.

On this again there is a threefold comment: the testimony of the author, as one of many [we], to the paternal glory visible in the incarnated Word, and to the fulness of grace and truth derived from him; and again, the witness of John Baptist (accepted as supreme type of the old dispensation) that his successor was before him in rank, as he had been before him in preëxistence.

3. The two other sayings have brought forward the conceptions of 'Revealing Word' and 'Flesh': the two now reach their union in the word 'Son.' Jesus is presented as Son of God, only Revealer of the Father. On this proposition the whole of the gospel is the comment.

I

i. The 'witness' of this section to the thesis of the prologue is not merely the actual testimony borne by John and the other disciples to the Messiahship of Jesus, but rather the testimony of Jesus himself, and of the whole incident: e.g., that John rests his recognition upon a positive sign from heaven.

ii. 'Sign' is the word almost universally used in this gospel for the miracles: they are adduced only in vindication of the truths laid down in the prologue. The closeness of this first sign to the prologue is clear: compare, and manifested his glory, with the words of the prologue, we beheld his glory.

iii. The witness of this incident is twofold: first, that Jesus claims the right to cleanse the temple as his Father's house; second, the enigmatic reference to the sign of the resurrection. Possibly a third claim may lie in the expression, Destroy this temple: the word for temple here implying the holier part, whereas in the rest of the incident the temple court has been spoken of.

iv. The witness of this section to the thesis of the prologue is obvious: the words, No man hath ascended into heaven, etc., being a direct echo of the third of the three sayings. — The wind bloweth where it listeth: a good deal of the force of this is lost in English; in the original Spirit and wind are the same. — Art thou the teacher, etc. There is no emphasis on the definite article: a generalisation from Nicodemus's position as a doctor of laws is all that is meant. — So must the Son of man be lifted up: these enigmatical references to the future are specially characteristic of this gospel. — For God so loved the world

etc. These words are not to be understood as part of the answer of Jesus. The evangelist is here introducing a comment on this the first distinctive reference to the crucifixion and 'eternal life.' It will be felt that the language here goes back to the tone of the prologue.

v. A still fuller witness from John, recognised as the supreme type of the dispensation of the Law and Prophets. — He that cometh from above is above all. Once more we have a comment by the writer of the gospel upon the detail of the narrative last mentioned, namely, John's words, He must increase, but I must decrease. Again we return to the tone of the prologue, and especially its words as to acceptance and rejection of the revealing Word.

vi. The incident is full of the various kinds of 'witness' that this gospel is accumulating. There are the claims put forward by Christ in his enigmatical words to the woman; the sudden recognition of him by the woman as a prophet fit to settle the question in dispute between Jews and Samaritans, this recognition being itself based upon what was another kind of witness, the 'sign' implied in Jesus's supernatural knowledge of the woman's life; there is a further witness borne by the Samaritans to the Saviour of the world, based not on miracle but on a two days' companying with Jesus. But above all there is the witness implied in the words of Jesus that his meat is to do the work of his Father, and that this work was already being accomplished.

vii. This is described as a sign, the raising a child from the point of death. — Jesus himself testified, that a prophet hath no honour in his own country. In other gospels this saying is applied to rejection of Christ by Galilean cities; here to a rejection by Judea. But of course there is no point in the word country: the proverb uses that word; the application may be equally to race, family, etc. The proverb might be applied to various kinds of rejection: here the thought is that of the prologue, He came unto his own, and they that were his own received him not. — Except ye see signs and wonders ye will in no wise believe. Of the two things to which he appeals Jesus prefers the evidence of 'witness' rather than that of 'signs': compare (xx. 29), Blessed are they that have not seen and yet have believed. With this may be connected the attempts of Jesus to restrain the spreading fame of his miracles, as recorded in other gospels [compare note to Matthew viii. 4 on page 1694].

II

This whole section is devoted to the signs and witness of Jesus appearing in his antagonism with 'the Jews.' It is a marked feature of this gospel that this term is regularly applied to the enemies of Christ: often in these incidents a distinction being preserved between the multitude (or they) and the Jews, the latter always associated with opposition and rejection.

i. We have here, first a 'sign' of healing; then its consequences, and out of these consequences 'witness' to the thesis of the prologue. First, opposition is made to Jesus on the ground that this healing was a violation of the sabbath: his answer, My Father worketh even until now, and I work, is rightly interpreted as a claim of equality with the Divine author of the sabbath. The answer of Jesus to this, The Son can do nothing of himself but what he seeth the Father doing, and again, I can of myself do nothing, as I hear I judge, is the most explicit and simple presentation of himself as revelation of God. Further claims are advanced: judgment and the resurrection have been committed to the Son by the Father. The witness of John, of the scriptures and Moses is claimed: but beyond all human witness is the fact that the works of the Father are being accomplished.

ii. Again, a division of the gospel is made up of a sign, the disputation arising out of it, and the witness of this disputation to the claims of Jesus. The use of the word sign is notable here. As far as the miraculous nature of the incidents is concerned, the walking upon the sea is as superhuman as the feeding the multitude: but the word sign is not applied to the former act, and, when the multitude express astonishment as to the mode in which Jesus can have reached the place where they find him without the aid of boats, he in his answer entirely ignores their question as to this miracle, and goes back to the previous feeding of the five thousand: this with its spiritual suggestiveness, which he expands into a discourse, is a sign: what is merely miraculous he passes over. — When from this sign Jesus presents himself as the bread of life he is met by the half-believing multitude with another miracle of feeding, the manna in the wilderness: and this, they suggest, was bread out of heaven, no doubt animated by the same suspicions of magic which appear in the other gospels in the form of demands for a sign from heaven. This leads to more emphatic claims of Jesus to be the Son who has come down from the Father in heaven. — Here becomes evident the division in the multitude before Jesus: it is the Jews who cry out at this claim. — Murmur not among yourselves. No man can come to me, except the Father . . . draw him. Jesus takes note of the divided opinion, and, as always, makes it depend upon a difference in the spiritual nature of those who accept and reject. The doctrine of bread of life is reiterated, the Jews persisting in pressing the literal sense of the figure. The incident ends with the differentiating power of the words of Jesus, causing some to go back, leading others to fuller recognition of the Holy One of God. (Compare page 1503.)

iii. The continuity of what is here presented as one division of the narrative is, in the ordinary versions, obscured by the insertion [vii. 53, after the words: Out of Galilee ariseth no prophet] of the incident of the woman taken in adultery: which is spurious. On this subject I quote the note from the Commentary of Milligan and Moulton. "The almost unanimous voice of modern criticism pronounces the narrative before us to be no genuine part of the Gospel of John. The section is wanting in the oldest and most trustworthy Mss. of the Gospel, and in several of the most ancient versions. It is passed by without notice in the commentaries of some of the earliest and most critical fathers of the Church. It is marked by an unusually large number of various readings, — a circumstance always highly suspicious. It is full of expressions not found elsewhere in the Fourth Gospel. . . . It interrupts the flow of the section where it occurs, — chapter viii. 12 connecting itself directly with that part of chapter vii which closes with ver. 52. Finally, Mss. which contain the section introduce it at various places, — some at the close of the Gospel; others after chapter vii. 36; while in a third class it has no place in John at all, but is read in the Gospel of Luke at the close of chapter xxi. These considerations are decisive." — These commentators point out that this want of genuineness as a part of John's gospel does not militate against the possible truth of the incident: the story appears indeed to have been in circulation from the earliest times. — The incident is here given.

[And they went every man unto his own house: but Jesus went unto the mount of Olives. And early in the morning he came again into the temple, and all the people came unto him; and he sat down, and taught them. And the scribes and the Pharisees bring a woman taken in adultery; and having set her in the midst, they say unto him, Master, this woman hath been taken in adultery, in the very act. Now in the law Moses commanded us to stone such: what then sayest thou of her? And this they said, tempting him, that they might have whereof to accuse him. But Jesus stooped down, and with his finger wrote on the ground. But when they continued asking him, he lifted up himself, and said unto them, He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her. And again he stooped down, and with his finger wrote on the ground. And they, when they heard it, went out one by one, beginning from the eldest, even unto the last: and Jesus was left alone, and the woman, where she was, in the midst. And Jesus lifted up himself, and said unto her, Woman, where are they? did no man condemn thee? And she said, No man, Lord. And Jesus said, Neither do I condemn thee: go thy way; from henceforth sin no more.]

iii. Read as a single section, we have in iii a series of utterances connected with the visit to the Feast of Tabernacles. It is a continuous series, in the sense that some of the later sayings are replies to trains of thought and disputation generated by the earlier sayings, these thoughts not spoken directly to Jesus, but noted by him in the conversations of the multitude among themselves. All through must be borne in mind the growing division between the multitude (wholly or half persuaded) and the Jews, or sometimes, the Pharisees (in open opposition). (a) The first claim of Jesus, based on objections of the Jews to his supposed illiteracy, is that his teaching is from above: recognisable by those who have the right nature. (b) There is a sudden turn in the incident made by the Master's abrupt question: Why seek ye to kill me? The general multitude repudiate this as a suggestion of some demon: Jesus in his answer is referring back to the persecution of the previous incident (i), and makes a legal defence of healing on the sabbath. (c) In the resulting division of opinion a difficulty is felt: they know whence Jesus is, but the Christ is not to be so known. Jesus meets this with the distinction: they know whence he is, but not Who sent him: He is known only by the one who is from Him. (d) The division among the people has become an overt separation between those who believe, and those who seek to take Jesus prisoner. On this last attempt is based the next saying: an enigma of the future [ascent to the Father]: Ye shall seek me, and shall not find me. (e) The next utterance is based upon one of the symbolic acts of the Feast, the pouring water upon the altar, amid music and sacred dances, in memory of the miraculous stream in the desert: He that believeth on me, as the scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water. I understand the words, as the scripture hath said, to apply only to the expression living water: the believer shall be a rock out of which shall flow the living water of prophecy (compare Zechariah, chapter xiv. 8; Ezekiel, xlvii). The division of feeling becomes so acute as to affect the very officers of the priests and Pharisees, and even one of their own number. (f) Another utterance is founded on the illumination of the temple court during the evenings of the Feast: Jesus is the light of the world. The Pharisees attempt to fasten upon him a verbal contradiction, in repelling which there is fresh identification with the Father. (g) The next claim is once more founded upon the attempt to arrest Jesus: I go away, and ye shall seek me, etc. There is also another enigmatic reference to the future, and the lifting up of the Son of man. (h) The last division of this prolonged disputation is produced by a wave of faith that seems to sweep over the multitude before the Master. Noting it, Jesus addresses those who are thus inclining to accept him: If ye abide in my word . . . the truth shall make you free. Thereupon they [i.e. the mixed multitude, including believers and opponents] repudiate the word make free, and claim freedom as Abraham's seed. Jesus advances claims that exalt him above Abraham; the disputation becomes more and more heated [note transition from They answered to The Jews answered], until the incident ends in an attempt at stoning.

iv. Here, as in i and ii, we find a sign — the healing of a man born blind, a division of impression in those who behold, leading in the present case to a prolonged attempt to explain away the facts, and the witness that all this brings to the claims of Jesus: he appeals to the healed man to believe on him as the Son of God. At the close the dividing line between those who accept and reject is expressed in the paradox: For judgement came I into this world, that they which see not may see; and that they which see may become blind.

v. The Parable of the Good Shepherd is sometimes associated with the previous incident. I understand it as a fresh starting point: in place of a sign, we here have a parable, and the usual disputation and division ensuing. It supports this view that the only other parable of this gospel is similarly the starting point of a section (III. iii). There is a reference by those who are disputing to the incident of iv, just as in iii there is a reference to the previous incident of i. It is obvious how this section supports the contention of the whole gospel: door is one more image of mediating revelation; again, the sheep hearing the shepherd's voice is a reiteration of the constant doctrine that the truth is recognised by those who are true. Here too is the most precise claim of equality with the Father: I and my Father are one: the horror of the Jews at this saying is met by an appeal to the language of their own law.

vi. A sign — the raising of one four days dead — and the witness, not only of others to Jesus, but of his own claim: I am the resurrection and the life. This incident accentuates the division among the people, so that priests and Pharisees hold councils of death. — Being high priest that year he prophesied, etc.: from this point to the end a minor feature of this gospel is the indication of unconscious fulfilment of prophecy (in this case, unconscious prophecy) in the incidents narrated.

vii. The purpose of this incident in the scheme of the book is less the direct testimony of the multitude, and more the fulfilment by these incidents of previous prophecy. [Compare page 728.] This is a form of 'witness.' — And Jesus answereth them, saying, "The hour is come, etc." I understand this answer to be directed, not to the incident of the Greeks, but to the whole of what has preceded. This wide acceptance marks the approach of the hour of the passion. Similarly, in the other gospels, the recognition by the disciples is immediately followed by the foretelling of the crucifixion. [Compare pages 1269–70, 1697.] — It is noticeable that Jesus, in this case surrounded by a favouring multitude, uses again the enigmatic reference to the future, If I be lifted up: and, when asked to explain, passes over the question, and answers in general terms, Walk while ye have the light. — But though he had done so many signs before them, yet they believed not. Here we have again [see above, notes to I. iv, v] John's comment upon the course of the narrative: an appropriate conclusion to the section treating of Jesus's appeals to 'the Jews' and their acceptance and rejection. The next paragraph, which is the actual conclusion, gives in the words of Christ his sayings as to acceptance and rejection.

III

It might be objected against the title I have affixed to this section (Signs and Witness, etc.) that there are no signs here recorded. But (1) though the word is not used, the Washing of the Disciples' Feet seems to be presented as a 'sign.' The spirit of St. John's writing is to emphasise, not the miraculous character, but the spiritual import of what he calls 'signs': this washing of the feet, though not miraculous, is like the sign or emblem of the prophets — an action with spiritual significance. — (2) The foretelling of Judas's treachery is of the nature of a 'sign': like the supernatural knowledge of Jesus in the incident of the woman of Samaria.

It is obvious how this section, which embodies the last intercourse between Jesus and his disciples, supports the thesis of the prologue: the whole is occupied with the relation of Jesus to the Father and to his disciples. No comment is necessary except as to the divisions here adopted. — i, ii. I have endeavoured by the paragraphing to bring out the vivid character of the narrative at this point. The solemn address to the disciples in elucidation of the sign of washing the feet seems to be twice interrupted by the emotion of Jesus at the thought of the approaching treachery of Judas; the second time his emotion leads to the saying, That thou doest, do quickly. Amid a sensation but imperfectly understood Judas retires. With a sense of relief there is a transition to ii. — iii. The words Arise, let us go hence clearly mark a break. And the parable of the Vine makes a striking point of departure for the following discourse of which the essence is the relationship of the disciples to their Master and to the Father, and this to the end of time. — iv. This intercessory prayer is the final commending of the disciples to the Father as the Master departs to his death.

IV

This portion of the gospel falls into three divisions as viewed from the standpoint of witnessing to the doctrine of the prologue. — i. The main 'witness' of this subsection is the witness before Pilate. When asked whether he is King of the Jews Jesus merely replies that his kingdom is not of this world. Upon Pilate asking again whether he is in any way a king, the answer comes that Jesus is indeed a king, born that he should bear witness unto the truth: everyone that is of the truth heareth my voice. Thus witness to the truth is kingship, and Jesus is King over those who listen. This is more a soliloquy than an answer addressed to Pilate: and when the judge proceeds to the question, What is truth? there is no answer. — All through the incident Pilate seems divided between a rude homage to the impressiveness of his prisoner, and a gross desire to express contempt of the Jews: hence the mock crowning of Jesus, and exhibition of him to the Jews crowned and scourged: to the last this spirit is continued, as shown by the inscription on the cross, and the refusal to alter it.

ii. The Crucifixion is here related chiefly with a view to the fulfilmen of prophecies which its details convey: this being a form of 'witness.' Hence the comment, He that hath seen hath borne witness, etc.

iii. Similarly the Resurrection is narrated in the form of a succession of 'signs.' And the gospel [proper] draws attention to this at its close: Many other signs therefore did Jesus, etc. It proceeds to reiterate how this gospel has been written with a purpose — that of persuading to recognition of the claims of Jesus.

Epilogue

The whole tenor of this part of the narrative separates it from the purpose of the rest. It has another purpose, to explain a saying of Jesus that has been misinterpreted to mean that the special 'disciple whom Jesus loved' should not die. When this explanation is complete, the narrative proceeds: And there are also many other things [not, signs] which Jesus did: and which are too numerous to relate. The whole is a personal reminiscence, not a part of the theological argument indicated by the prologue.

Page 1336, footnote. The words here made a footnote follow the conclusion of the narrative, before the words just quoted begin, And there are also many other things, etc. The words treated as a footnote are usually made part of the text, except that the clause, And we know that his witness is true, is considered an endorsement of the gospel, by the Elders of Ephesus, or others. But an endorsement is of no value without the names, or other designation, of those who endorse. I understand the whole footnote to be the comment of some reader, it matters not whom: the point being, not an external endorsement, but a recognition that the hero of this last-related incident, and consequently the 'disciple whom Jesus loved,' is the same as the author of the gospel: hence we may be sure, adds the anonymous commentator, that his testimony is to be relied on.

Notes to St. John's Revelation

The Revelation of St. John is in literary form a 'rhapsody,' to use the term applied in these works to the distinctive contribution of Hebrew literature, a new literary form made by the fusion of all other literary forms in one. [See page 1392.] The proper preparation for appreciating it is to study other rhapsodies of Old Testament prophecy, more especially the Rhapsody of Zion Redeemed, the rhapsodies of Joel and Amos, and the Vision Rhapsody of Zechariah. One point of literary distinctiveness may be remarked: in the Hebrew rhapsody, while all literary forms are fused together, it is usually the dramatic form that is most prominent: in St. John's Revelation the prevailing impression is that of epic succession of incidents, as narrated by the seer.

A modern reader, accustomed to such poetry as Dante's Paradiso, must always remember in approaching such a work as this that Hebrew literature rests upon the symbol rather than the image. [For a comparison see page 1448.] Dante's imaginative forms may be symbolic, but they will never cease to have the characteristic of imagery that they can fit into pictures. Hebrew symbolism is again and again incompatible with the pictorial: it is enough to instance the leading symbol of this vision — the Lamb, which, in the various presentations, could enter into no pictorial imagination. Still, on the shadowy background of dream movement (the natural basis of a 'vision'), the successive scenes of St. John's Revelation do appeal to the imagination as a sequence of dim but majestic pictures.

In interpreting symbolism, as with all the higher forms of allegory, the first critical requirement is restraint. Even with such a poet as Spenser it is only rude exegesis which identifies a particular personage with a definite idea: in the more mystic symbolism of the present poem it is a violation of true literary touch to seek a meaning for every detail of a complex presentation. Interpretation must stop at general suggestion. In handling mystic numbers our poet will speak of thousands upon thousands to convey unlimited hosts, of forty and two weeks, or a thousand two hundred and threescore days, multiples of the mystic number seven, to mark a shorter or longer period which he would emphasise as limited and destined to come to an end. But to seek a significance in the actual figures is gratuitous and risky exegesis.

The most important thing in connection with the symbolism of St. John is a point of literary effect, which further seems in the poem itself to be indicated as extending beyond poetic form into the underlying spiritual interpretation. This is that the symbolism of Revelation is the symbolism of Old Testament prophecy revived; the symbolic ideas being not merely revived, but at the same time varied, massed together, and intensified. Indeed, very few, if any, of St. John's symbols are drawn from any other source. Considered from the literary side this is the device of 'echoing,' which distinguishes all 'classical' poetry, — the special line of poetic succession in which each poet makes new creations out of detailed reminiscences of the poetry of the past. But in the present case this is much more than a literary device. The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy: one of the leading thoughts of St. John's work is that the mysteries of the old dispensation find their solution and fulfilment in the new: similarly, the forms of ancient prophecy combine to make the symbolic setting of the supreme revelation.

This revelation is a Vision, falling into seven 'visions,' as in the case of Zion Redeemed, or Zechariah's Revelation; the seven parts are however continuous, one developed out of the other, with no break: the distinction is one of analysis. It is most important for the interpreter to divest his mind of all idea of succession in time. As with Isaiahan rhapsodies [compare pages 1393, 1572], the relation of these seven parts is not that of temporal succession; each is complete in itself, and a complete presentation of the whole from one side. The connection of the seven is logical.

IV. Salvation: The kingdom of the world becoming the kingdom of Christ

V. The Seven Golden Bowls: Judgment Consummated, and the Mystery of Babylon

VI. The Word of God and the Thrones of Judgment

VII. The Lamb's Bride and the New Jerusalem

By a structure exactly analogous to that of Joel's rhapsody [see page 1420], and in a less marked degree to that of Zion Redeemed, the fourth or central section is the foundation of all the others, the first three working towards it, the last three founded upon it. As always, literary form is here pointing to the deepest spiritual interpretation. The above scheme of structure also suggests at a glance correspondence of parts: III exactly corresponds to V, as imperfect and perfect on either side of the dominating central section; similarly II and VI are analogous; also I and VII, the former before the movement commences, the latter after the movement of judgment is closed. There are in addition a prologue and epilogue: the former the Words to the Seven Churches; the latter, Seven Last Words.

On page 1709 I give a more detailed scheme of structure, in which more minute symmetry may be traced between the working out of the seven 'visions' or sections. This suggests to the eye how I and VII are separate from the rest; how the other five have sevenfold subdivision; how in all of them there is a marked break between the first four and the last three of each. Again, it will appear how IV takes an independent course; on either side of it III is closely parallel with V, and II with VI. The conspectus also brings out some other points: the cries of woe which emphasise the succession of phases; and parentheses, in which the seer himself meditates, or is addressed by the personages of the vision.

Prologue

The sevenfold prologue is partly involved in the vision of the Revelation, in the main outside it. Heaven is not said to open, but a phase of the Divine glory is visible, and charges are addressed to each of the Seven Churches of Asia. The literary form of this prologue is an echo of the opening section of the rhapsody of Amos [see page 698], in which Israel and Judah are presented as among the Seven Doomed Nations: particular addresses of doom are made to each of the seven peoples, these being bound together by recurrent (though varied in detail) formulæ of doom. So in the present case the charges to the particular churches are independent; but these are enclosed between recurrent formulæ at opening and close of each, the formula varied in details for each church. The opening formula describes the Divine speaker, the close is made up of promises and a cry of emphasis. The symbolism of these formulæ is largely, but not entirely, anticipation of the symbolism of the coming Revelation. The symbolism of the Divine manifestation is here chiefly from Daniel [page 674].

I

The Sealed Book and the Lamb

The opening phase of the vision is a starting-point, before the movement of judgment commences. It takes to the imagination the form of three symbolic pictures passing one into the other like dissolving views. First, Deity supreme is manifested, surrounded with all splendour, while all grades of authority and all forms of life move in a ceaseless round of adoration. Then a book sealed with seven seals becomes visible in the hand of enthroned Deity: a sense of oppression being felt that none can unseal the Book of Mystery, a comforting promise declares that the LION of Judah shall unseal it. As in the third picture we

The Lamb . . . as though it had been slain	Imagery of Isaiah liii. 7, and John the Baptist (St. John i. 29), considered as last and supreme of prophets.
Incense, the prayers of the saints	Psalm cxli. 2.
The number . . . ten thousand times ten thousand, etc.	Similar use of thousand in Daniel vii. 10; Psalm lxviii. 17: also compare, Saul has slain his thousands and David his ten thousands.

II

The Powers of Judgment

As the seven seals begin to be opened there is a commencement of movement in this rhapsody of judgment. But in this second section the judgment is only potential, not reaching the point of actual operation. Four symbolic Powers of Judgment successively appear: authority is granted them, but they are not here described as exercising the authority. With the opening of the fifth seal, souls slain are visible beneath the altar, crying for judgment: individually they are granted the white raiment of deliverance, but as a whole they are bidden to wait for their brethren. With the sixth seal there is a warning of prophetic horrors, up to the point of a breaking of the Day of Wrath. But at this point judgment is restrained; and the main significance of the section is unveiled: it is the Unsealing of the Book and the Sealing of the Saints. From the tribes of Israel are sealed numbers indicated by union of the mystic numbers twelve and thousand. Then, for a climax, a picture of a multitude which no man could number, out of all nations and kindreds; these are linked with the adoration of heaven, the Salvation cry of IV, and the imagery consecrated by Zion Redeemed to the return of the exiles to their home. At last the seventh seal can be opened: but there follows only a silent expectancy pointing forward to the visions to follow. [Note: II is the completing of I, III of II, IV of III; each section presents the whole mystery, though in different phases.]

The four horses and their riders	A combination of Zechariah's horses [spirits of ministration: compare page 731] with the colours made significant — and Jeremiah's four forms of Judgment (xv. 2–3), Death, Sword, Famine, Captivity. — Ezekiel's Mimic Siege, and insistence on eating bread by weight etc. (iv. 10–11), helps to interpret the third horseman.
v. The cry, How long?	The opening of Zechariah's Vision (i. 12).
The horrors of the Sixth Seal	A massing together of prophetic symbols of judgment: compare Joel ii. 2, 10, 30–31; iii. 15–16; Isaiah ii. 19–21; xxxiv. 4; Nahum iii. 12; Hosea x. 8.
The restraining of judgment until the saints are sealed	Exact echo of Ezekiel's Vision of Polluted Jerusalem (chapter ix).
Washed . . . robes . . . white in the blood of the Lamb	A combination of Isaiah's though . . . sins . . . scarlet . . . white as snow with Zechariah's Vision (iii. 4), where Joshua's filthy garments are changed for rich apparel in token of acquittal.
They shall hunger no more, etc.	Imagery from Isaiah xlix. 10.
Silence, at the opening of the Seventh Seal	So Zechariah's Vision (ii. 13): Be silent, all flesh before the Lord; for he is waked up out of his holy habitation. Also an echo of Exodus, chapter xiv. 13.

III

The Seven Trumpets

Judgment Imperfect and the Mystery of Prophecy

At last judgment may begin, or rather, pass from the potential to the actual. With the sounding of the first four trumpets we have judgment descending from above; with the fifth, judgment ascends out of the pit; with the sixth it passes from Euphrates [regarded as centre of the earth] along the four winds [the suggestion of four angels]. But with all this symbolic judgment are associated expressions of imperfection: the first four dooms are to injure the third part of nature, the fifth is enjoined not to kill but torment, the sixth is to kill but only the third part of men. [Contrast the corresponding sections of V.] Before the final trumpet sounds, a strong angel, with enhanced accompaniments of radiancy, makes proclamation with a great voice, while the seven thunders utter their voices: but the seer is to seal up what is thus uttered, and we only hear that when the seventh angel has sounded, then is finished the mystery of God, according to the good tidings which he declared to his servants the prophets. What is sealed up [to the prophets themselves] is made known to us, as the seer is directed to eat up the sealed book. We soon perceive how this whole section is concerned with the Mystery, or Gospel [good tidings] of Prophecy. Supreme symbols of the Old dispensation, echoes of prophetic story, make clear in what follows the conception of the prophets of the old dispensation exercising their warfare for God, with miracle and amidst persecution; when at last the symbolic prophets lie dead in the street of the great city . . . where also their Lord was crucified [compare, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets], after a time the breath of life from God entered into them [compare Ezekiel's Vision of the Valley of Dry Bones]; they go up to heaven in the cloud [like Elijah in the fire], while doom falls upon the city. When the seventh trumpet, which is to unseal the mystery, sounds, voices proclaim that which is the subject of the next vision: the kingdom of the world becoming the kingdom of Christ. Thus the Mystery of Prophecy is unsealed in Christ.

The Seven Trumpets	Fundamentally on Joshua, chapter vi; connected by Joel (ii. 1) with the day of doom.
Fire of the altar cast on earth as commencement of judgment	An echo of Ezekiel (x. 2).
The first three soundings	Echoes of the plagues of Egypt. For the mountain burning with fire compare Jeremiah's Doom of Babylon (chapters l to li). Wormwood in this sense is a favourite symbol of Jeremiah (ix. 15; xxiii. 15).
The fourth sounding and diminishing of sunlight	This is not so much the stock prophetic symbol of darkened sun (e.g. Amos, viii. 9; Joel, ii. 31) as the reversal of Isaiah's conception (xxx. 26) of light of sun as sevenfold, etc.
The star fallen from heaven	Echo of Isaiah's Lucifer (xiv. 12).
Smoke . . . locusts . . . like unto horses	For smoke in connection with doom compare smoke out of the north (Isaiah xiv. 31). The idealisation of locusts into an army of destruction is the great symbol running through Joel (ii. 1–11).
The horsemen of the sixth seal . . . with heads of lions	Perhaps an echo of the mystic army of Isaiah (v. 26–30).
The book eaten up, sweet in the mouth, bitter in the belly	An exact echo of Ezekiel (iii. 1).
The measuring reed	From Zechariah (ii. 1–5). Compare Ezekiel (xl. 5, etc.).
The two olive trees and two candlesticks	A leading point in Zechariah's Vision (iv. 11): there interpreted probably of union of priesthood and princedom in the restored community: here in a general way suggestive of the whole [spiritual] authority of the old or prophetic dispensation.

IV

Salvation

The Kingdom of the World becoming the Kingdom of Christ

We thus reach the central, which is also the foundation, section of the whole rhapsody: others deal with judgment, this will be found at the end identified with the idea of Salvation. It has already been proclaimed as the kingdom of the world becoming the kingdom of Christ.

For introduction, there is the momentary unveiling of the Ark of the Covenant; a foundation symbol of God, not as the creator of the whole universe, but as the divine ruler of a chosen people. The whole conflict of this divine rule with its foes is to be suggested; not (it must be carefully remembered) in historical stages, but in symbolical phases.

i. The conflict is displayed in its ultimate origin: the Seed of the Woman against the Serpent. Yet this manifestation has completeness: the child is caught up to heaven, the woman has her assigned place in the wilderness for a term that will end.

The sign of the woman with child	Isaiah's sign of the virgin [or woman] with child . . . bringing forth Immanuel. Though in its place an historic symbol (see page 1568), this has been spiritualised as a prophetic sign of Christ by Matthew (chapter i. 23). — The child thus born is identified with the Messiah of Psalm ii: who is to rule all the nations with a rod of iron.
Another sign in heaven . . . a great red dragon . . . his tail draweth the third part of the stars of heaven and did cast them to the earth	Here we find some primitive nature symbolism, which however has been closely interwoven with the imaginative conceptions of O.T. prophecy. [Compare such passages as Job's curse (iii. 8) and Isaiah's reference to Leviathan (xxvii. 1), Ezekiel's dragon of the sea applied to Egypt (chapter xxix) and note on page 1662.] Primitive imagination conceived of a dragon in the heavens associated with the phenomena of eclipses; also of the sea as a serpent or dragon winding about, and at times invading, the earth. This symbolism is here utilised for the leader of the fallen Angels [or stars: compare Isaiah xiv. 12]. The dragon is also identified with the Serpent of Genesis.

ii. The conflict now appears as the War in Heaven, between Michael and his angels and the dragon. This also embodies the whole conflict, by reference to the woe for the earth after the dragon and his angels have been cast down to the earth. [Compare the spirit of such passages as Ephesians vi. 12.] The victory is because of the blood of the Lamb.

iii. We now have temptation on earth, or relentless war between the dragon cast down and the woman and the rest of her seed. yet a conflict limited in duration by symbolic expressions of time.

The serpent casting out water . . . the earth helping the woman

Here there is again utilisation of primitive imagination: the primitive warfare between the ocean-serpent and the earth made symbolic of the spiritual warfare.

iv. The conflict now is presented as a conflict with world forces, symbolised as brute force, or power of a monstrous beast, set on however by the dragon.

The beast coming up out of the sea, etc.

This is of course an echo from Daniel's visions (vii-xii), but generalised: Daniel's visions suggest successive world powers, the terms of the present vision [horns, diadems, names of blasphemy] are those of world powers in general.

One of his heads . . . smitten unto death . . . his death-stroke healed

Probably an echo of Genesis iii. 15: It shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel.

And the dragon gave him authority . . . and there was given to him authority over every tribe and people and tongue and nation

Perhaps an echo of the devil's temptation (Luke): the kingdoms of the world . . . to thee will I give all this authority . . . for it hath been delivered unto me; and to whomsoever I will, I give it.

[Between iv and v is the first of the parenthetic passages: as it were, the seer, absorbed in the interest of the symbolised conflict, encourages himself. Herein consists the patience of the saints, they know their captors must at last be made captive.]

v. Another phase of the conflict is darkly shadowed: perhaps we may interpret, not world force, but world worship. The symbol is another beast, uniting the marks of the lamb [supreme symbol of the whole rhapsody] and the dragon: working miracles he causes all to worship the first beast, whose authority he exercises, establishing a badge lack of which excludes from all human intercourse. It is no longer external brute force, but worldly force organised as a false religion.

Another beast, etc.

The chief key to this dark symbolism is found in VI. iii; where we find vanquished together the beast . . . and with him the false prophet that wrought the signs in his sight, wherewith he deceived them that had received the mark of the beast, and them that worshipped his image. This false prophet is thus clearly identified with the second beast of this section: especially in view of the original meaning of the word prophet, one who interprets, or acts for another (compare Exodus vii. 1), and universal usage of the Greek word prophet. This assists the interpretation given above, as world religion and superstition in contradistinction to world force.

The number of the beast — The opening phrase, Here is wisdom, suggests a secondary application of the universal symbol, and one that is absent from the general significance. It therefore does not affect the literary interpretation, and is probably a temporary allusion of which the point is now lost.

vi. At last the conflict of Church and World is presented from the other side; we have the Followers of the Lamb arrayed for conflict, with attendant symbolism of harping and song that none can learn but themselves, and the name of the Father [in place of the mark of the beast].

They are virgins — The whole context suggests that virginity is here used as a symbol: sanctification; they are set apart for the conflict. It is only a plural modification of the final symbol of the Lamb's Bride.

[A triple cry prepares for the grand climax of vii: the first proclaims the hour of judgment as come; the second points forward to the subject of VI; the third denounces doom on the worshippers of the beast.]

[Once more the seer, parenthetically, sympathises with the conflict, recording the voice that proclaims the near salvation: From henceforth . . . Blessed, etc.]

vii. The issue of the conflict: one sitting on the cloud like unto a son of man [compare opening of prologue: Behold he cometh with the clouds]: who reap the ripe harvest of the earth: those that come victorious from the beast sing the Song of Moses . . . and . . . of the Lamb. Thus the initial salvation of God's people from their Egyptian foes and the consummation of salvation emphasise the unity of this whole section.

The sickles . . . vintage . . . winepress — Once more an example of the massing of symbolism. The sickles are an echo from the final conflict in Joel's rhapsody (iii. 13): note that there also is the combination of harvest and winepress — the treading the winepress is a symbol from the great Vision of Judgment in Zion Redeemed (Isaiah lxiii. 1–6) — the final detail, even unto the bridles of the horses, is echoed from Isaiah's Assyrian flood (viii. 8).

Another sign . . . seven angels having seven plagues — Merely a link between this section and the next, as frequently in this rhapsody.

V

The Seven Golden Bowls

Judgment consummated and the Mystery of Babylon

The last vision presented Salvation: this returns to the predominant theme of Judgment. The same temple in heaven opens, this time to display the seven angels coming, in hierarchical splendour, to pour out the seven last plagues from the golden bowls. In close conformity to III we have successively the four outpourings of judgment above, then judgment beneath, then judgment at Euphrates. In contrast with III there are now no notes of incompleteness in the doom which is described, and in the last section is reached the climax, It is done. In IV five sections made prominent the opposing forces, and only two the heavenly hosts and victory: here six sections describe successive dooms, it is only in the last section that the opposing force appears under the name of BABYLON, and at great length is elaborated the Mystery of Babylon. [Just before the final outpouring there is another parenthetic exclamation of warning and watchfulness.]

The Seven Golden Bowls — The regular prophetic symbol, the cup of the Lord's fury; especially in Jeremiah (xxv. 15).

The outpouring — Suggestive throughout of the Plagues of Egypt, intensified. Especially: iii rationalises the first Egyptian plague (compare Wisdom, xi. 6); iv is a counterpart to III. iv, and echoes the plague of hail mingled with fire. The hail appears again in vii, where it seems to be combined with an echo from Zechariah's Vision (v. 7: the weight of a talent).

vi. Drying up of Euphrates — way for kings from the sunrising — This seems to be a link with VI. vi, a preparation for the final war of Gog and Magog. — The only point of Har-Magedon seems to be that the holy land is to be the theatre of the final world combat: so the valley of Jehoshaphat in Joel's rhapsody.

Babylon — Under this one name is, in this vision, the whole adverse force concentrated. In the long Mystery of Babylon that follows, the details identify this mystic 'Babylon,' not only with the Babylon which was the chief topic of Prophetic Doom song, but with the other enemy cities of prophetic literature, especially maritime Tyre. [Compare Rejoicing over Fallen Babylon in Isaiah xlvii — Jeremiah's Doom of Babylon (l–li), especially, My people, go ye out of the midst of her (li. 45) and the epilogue (li. 63–4) in which a stone is cast into Euphrates — Isaiah's Doom of Tyre (xxiii) — Ezekiel's Doom of Tyre (xxvii)]. — Possibly the seven mountains on which the woman sitteth may be a link to connect this Babylon with (imperial) Rome: but of course only as one of many cities. The preceding words, Here is the mind which hath wisdom, favour a particular interpretation (compare above, note on IV. v): the details that follow however are not favourable to it.

VI

The Word of God and the Thrones of Judgment

Yet another Vision of Judgment is necessary: this has been displayed in various aspects, now it is to be brought out how the whole is the work of the Supreme Word of God. By the link of the white horse he is seen gathering to himself the various Powers of Judgment which appeared in II; and now Judgment will be fully enthroned. After an introduction which is anticipation of VII [and a parenthetic rapture of the seer at the message he receives], brief sections display the overthrow by the Word of all the forces of preceding visions: Beast, False Prophet, Dragon. Then (v) there is the first enthronement, and the first resurrection with the millennium of the blessed while Satan is bound. [Again, a parenthesis celebrates the blessed hope.] The sixth section (as in II, III) is a backward movement: Satan is loosed, and the final struggle of Gog and Magog takes place. With vii

there is the final judgment of all living: after which death and Hades are cast into the lake of fire, which is the Second Death.

ii and vi contain the chief symbol not already used — the war of Gog and Magog	This is condensed from Ezekiel's Gog of the land of Magog (xxxviii–ix): a prophetic conception of dim struggle in the infinite distance of time and place. The detail of summoning birds to the supper of God is itself an echo (xxxix. 17).
The Thrones of Judgment and the Books of Life	From Daniel's Vision (vii. 9; xii. 1–2).

The Lamb's Bride and the New Jerusalem

All judgment at an end, we return to the peace of the first vision: a new heaven and earth; the new Jerusalem descending as a bride adorned for her husband; the river and tree of life, leading to the final thought of reigning for ever and ever.

A new heaven and earth	From Zion Redeemed (Isaiah lxv. 17).
The Lamb's Bride — and gates of precious stones — gates open continually — measuring reed and dimensions	Songs of Zion in Zion Redeemed (Isaiah liv. 5; liv. 11–12) combined with elaborate Vision of Ezekiel (xl–xlviii).
River of water of life — trees of life — monthly fruits for healing of nations	From Ezekiel (xlvii. 1–12) with a possible echo of the Garden of Eden in Genesis.

BRIEF SUGGESTIONS ON BIBLE STUDY

Books

The position is taken in this work that the literary study of the Bible is an independent study, and should, while in process, be kept distinct from distracting questions that belong to studies of a different type. (Compare the Preface, page vii; and pages 1367–9.) Two other works of the editor offer assistance in this department. The Literary Study of the Bible (D. C. Heath & Co., Boston: London, Isbister & Co.) for professed students of literature discusses the morphology of Sacred Literature, while for the general reader is designed the Short Introduction to the Literature of the Bible (D. C. Heath & Co., Boston and London). The essential matter of these two books is contained in the Introductions and Notes of the present work.

When we pass to other kinds of Bible study, we pass into a region of controversy, and students will do best to seek advice from those with whose views they are in general sympathy. A few suggestions are here made for those who have no other advisers.

In the opinion of the editor the late Dean Stanley's History of the Jewish Church (Murray: Scribner), though necessarily not reflecting the most modern historical views, remains the most important presentation of the Bible in its literary and historical aspects. The editor desires to express his great personal obligation to this work, from which he has received more inspiration for Bible study than from any other source. This may be supplemented by such as the following:

GEORGE ADAM SMITH'S Historical Geography of the Holy Land (Hodder & Stoughton).
SHAILER MATHEWS'S History of New Testament Times in Palestine (Macmillan).
R. W. WADDY-MOSS'S From Malachi to Matthew (Methodist Publishing Company, London).
TOWNSEND MACCOUN'S Holy Land in Geography and History (Revell).

The Oxford University Press (Oxford and New York) has put forward Helps to the Study of the Bible, bound up with one of its editions of the Revised Version, which may be obtained separately. These are a copious collection of all kinds of information, including maps, concordance, chronological tables, etc., and will largely supersede other works for one who desires general information as to what may be called "ordinarily received views" on all sides of Bible study.

For the results of modern historical schclarship the following are recommended:

S. R. DRIVER'S Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament (T. T. Clark: Scribner).
B. W. BACON'S Introduction to the Books of the New Testament (Macmillan).
The Polychrome Bible (Dodd, Mead & Co.) conveys results of historical analysis to the eye by variations of colour.
C. F. KENT'S Student's Old Testament (six volumes: Scribner) conveys such results by a logical and historical arrangement.

A Bible Dictionary of some kind for reference is indispensable. A single volume edition of the Hastings Bible Dictionary is announced; a "Standard" single volume dictionary is announced by the Funk and Wagnalls Company.

Commentaries on the Bible are innumerable, and represent the most varied views. Some of those intended for popular use are vitiated by their adoption of the Authorised Version text; which necessitates a large part of the comment being taken up with correction of the text. A commentary is in preparation under the editorship of PROFESSOR SHAILER MATHEWS (Macmillan), founded on the Revised Version, with the more important marginal corrections.

Progressive Bible Study

From the literary standpoint a few suggestions are here offered for those who have the responsibility of directing progressive Bible Study.

1. The first stage in the study of the Bible, especially where the students are young people, should be strictly limited to the Stories of the Bible. These should be taken purely as stories: other aspects of the matter being left for later treatment. Two volumes of the Modern Reader's Bible (Bible Stories: Old Testament — Bible Stories: New Testament) may be put into the hands of the class; but the arrangement of matter in the present edition makes the teacher independent of these.

2. The second stage should train in familiarity with other literary forms — oratory, wisdom, lyrics, drama or rhapsody — by means of a few illustrations of each, thoroughly mastered. A volume of the Modern Reader's Bible (Select Masterpieces of Biblical Literature) contains suggestions, and illustrations printed in their proper literary structure. The present edition however contains all that is required.

3. The third stage is based on the important principle of the 'book' as the literary unit. It matters little what books of Scripture are selected. The teacher should in a single lesson give the class their first impressions of a book. Then it should be studied in detail, with the help of the introductions and notes of the present volume, or whatever other aids may be desired. But before passing from the book the teacher should again present the whole at a single view. No principle of literary study is more important than that of grasping clearly a literary work as a single whole.

4. The fourth stage should be devoted to a higher literary unit, the grasp of the great divisions of Scripture — History, Prophecy, Poetry, Wisdom — each as a whole. The arrangement of the present edition is especially designed to assist this. [Further assistance may be obtained from the editor's Short Introduction to the Literature of the Bible (D. C. Heath & Co.).]

5. The final stage is to realise the unity of all Scripture: the conception of the Bible as a whole. Compare the Preface to this work, pages viii–ix.

[A somewhat fuller discussion of this matter is given in Appendix II of the Short Introduction mentioned above.]
